Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of colored people of the United States, praying that the elective franchise may be granted to the colored people of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of citizens of Howard county, Missouri, praying that Dr. Comstock's system of phonetics and elocution, and the French system of weights and measures, may be taught at the Military Academy of West Point; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, in favor of the repeal of the import duty on printing paper; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COWAN presented a petition of non-commissioned officers and privates of the veteran reserve corps, who reenlisted for three years prior to the issuing of orders depriving the enlisted men of that corps of such bounties as were offered for reenlisting men at the time they reenlisted, praying an investigation into the subject; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. HARRIS presented a memorial of Delia A. Jacobs, praying an extension of the patent granted to her husband, Jesse Fitzgerald, on the 28th of August, 1849, for a machine for dressing tree-nails; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

Mr. POMEROY presented a petition of citizens of the United States praying an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fully recognizing the obligations of the Christian religion; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RAILROADS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 761) extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is unfinished business of the morning hour which I feel it my duty to insist upon. I find that I must do as other gentlemen do, insist upon the business which is in my charge, and as that is unfinished business of the morning hour I object to taking up anything else until it is disposed of.

Mr. RAMSEY. I hope the Senator from Vermont will allow this bill to be acted upon. It is a local bill which will not take up much time.

Mr. COLLAMER. I object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The objection prevents its being taken up by unanimous consent; but the motion of the Senator from Minnesota is in order, and that is to postpone all prior orders and take up the bill named by him.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I hope the motion will be withdrawn, and that we shall be allowed to make our reports.

Mr. RAMSEY. It will take but a few minutes to pass the bill, and it is the only bill I think which I have asked the Senate to take up.

Mr. WILKINSON. I hope the Senate will agree to the motion of my colleague to take up this bill. An amendment has been proposed to it by the committee which makes it necessary that it should go back to the other House. We have asked but very few favors here this session.

The motion was agreed to—ayes twenty-four, noes not counted.

The Senate accordingly, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 761) extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes.

Mr. RAMSEY. I presume it is unnecessary to read the original bill, the Committee on Public Lands having reported a substitute for it.

The reading of the bill was dispensed with by unanimous consent, and the Secretary read the amendment proposed to be inserted as a substitute for it, as follows:

That the quantity of lands granted to the State of Minnesota, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State, as indicated in the first section of an act entitled "An act making a grant of land to the Territory of Minnesota, in alternate sections, to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said Territory, and granting public lands, in alternate sections, to the State of Alabama, to aid in the construction of a certain railroad in said State," approved March 3, 1857, shall be increased to ten sections per mile for each of said railroads and branches, subject to any and all limitations contained in said act and subsequent acts and as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the first proviso in the first section of the act aforesaid shall be so amended as to read as follows, to wit: Provided, That the land to be so located shall in no case be further than twenty miles from the lines of said roads and branches, to aid in the construction of each of which said grant is made; and said lands granted shall, in all cases, be indicated by the Secretary of the Interior.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That any and all lands heretofore reserved to the United States by any act of Congress, or in any other manner by competent authority, for the purpose of aiding in any object of internal improvement or other purpose whatever, be, and the same are hereby, reserved and excepted from the operations of this act, except so far as it may be found necessary to locate the route of said road through such reserved lands, in which case the right of way shall be granted, subject to the approval of the President of the United States: Provided, further, That any lands which may have been granted to the Territory or State of Minnesota for the purpose of aiding in the construction of any railroad, which lands may be located within the limits of this extension of said grant or grants, shall be deducted from the full quantity of lands hereby granted, and that any lands which may have been so granted shall be strictly applied in accordance with the terms and conditions of said act or acts, unless subsequently modified by law.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the sections and parts of sections of land, which by said acts and this grant shall remain to the United States, within ten miles on each side of said roads and branches, shall not be sold for less than double the minimum price of public lands when sold, nor shall any of said lands become subject to sale at private entry until the same shall have been first offered at public sale to the highest bidder at or above the minimum price as aforesaid: Provided, That actual bona fide settlers under the preemption laws of the United States may, after the proof of settlement, improvement, and occupation, as now provided by law, purchase the same at the increased minimum price: And provided, also, That settlers under the provisions of the homestead law who comply with the terms and requirements of said act shall be entitled to patents for an amount not exceeding eighty acres each, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby granted shall be subject to the disposal of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, for the purposes aforesaid, and no other. And the said railroads and branches shall be and remain public highways for the use of the Government of the United States, free of all toll or other charges upon the transportation of any property or troops of the United States.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the lands hereby and heretofore granted to said Territory or State of Minnesota shall be disposed of by said State for the purposes aforesaid only, and in manner following, namely: when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior that any section of ten consecutive miles of said road is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, as a first-class railroad, and the said Secretary shall be satisfied that said State has complied in good faith with this requirement, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents for all the lands granted and selected as aforesaid, situated opposite to and within a limit of ten miles of the line of said section of road thus completed, extending along the whole length of said completed section of ten miles of road, and no further. And when the Governor of said State shall certify to the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary shall be satisfied that another section of said road, ten consecutive miles in extent, connecting with the preceding section or with some other first-class railroad, which may be at the time in successful operation, is completed as aforesaid, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents for all the lands granted and situated opposite to and within the limit of ten miles of the line of said completed section of road or roads, and extending the length of said section, and no further, and so, from time to time, until said roads and branches are completed. And when the Governor of said State shall so certify, and the Secretary of the Interior shall be satisfied that the whole of any one of said roads and branches is completed in a good, substantial, and workmanlike manner, as a first-class railroad, the said Secretary of the Interior shall issue to the said State patents to all the remaining lands granted for and on account of said completed road and branches in this act, situated within the said limits of twenty miles from the line thereof, throughout the entire length of said road and branches: Provided, That no land shall be granted and conveyed to said State under the provisions of this act on account of the construction of any railroad or part thereof that has been constructed under the provisions of any other act at the date of the passage of this act, and adopted as a part of the line of railroad provided for in this act: And provided further, That said lands, granted by this or prior acts, shall not in any manner be disposed of or incumbered, except as the same are patented under the provisions of this act; and should the State fail to complete any one of said roads or branches within eight years after the passage of this act, then the said lands undisposed of as aforesaid, granted on account of said road or branches, shall revert to the United States.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That as soon as the Governor of the said State of Minnesota shall file or cause to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior maps designating the routes of said road and branches, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from market the lands embraced within the provisions of this act.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the United States mail shall be transported on said road, under the direction of the Post Office Department, at such price as Congress may by law provide: Provided, That until such price is fixed by law the Postmaster General shall have power to fix the rate of compensation.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the provisions of this act shall also be construed so as to apply and extend to that portion of the line authorized to be vacated by the joint resolution approved July 12, 1862, entitled "A joint resolution authorizing the State of Minnesota to change the line of certain branch railroads in said State, and for other purposes," notwithstanding the vacation thereof by said State, as though said joint resolution had not passed, and also to the line adopted by said State in lieu of the portion of the line so vacated.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move to amend the amendment in the sixth section by inserting after the word "aforesaid," in the twelfth line, the words "not exceeding ten sections per mile."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move further to amend by striking out the word "ten," in line thirteen of the same section, and inserting "twenty;" so as to read "within a limit of twenty miles of the line of said section."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. In line twenty-four of the same section, I move to strike out "ten" and insert "twenty."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. In line twenty-six in that section, after the word "further," I move to insert "not exceeding ten sections of land per mile for all that part of said road thus completed under the provisions of this act and the act to which this is an amendment."

Mr. COWAN. I think this an important amendment to make here.

Mr. RAMSEY. It has been considered by the committee.

Mr. COWAN. It is widening the scope of this grant from ten miles to twenty miles. It is of considerable importance, I think.

Mr. RAMSEY. It is in keeping with the legislation of Congress up to this time, equalizing the grant made to this road with the grant made to other roads.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move further to amend the amendment in the sixth section by striking out the proviso from line thirty-six to line forty-one, and inserting in lieu of it the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall interfere with any existing rights acquired under any law of Congress heretofore enacted making grants of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of railroads.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move further to amend the amendment by striking out in the forty-third line of the same section the words "or incumbered" after "disposed of."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of the Senate to the material feature of this bill. The grant of 1857 gave to the Territory of Minnesota the alternate sections to the extent of six miles on each side of these railroads. This bill proposes to extend it to ten miles on each side, and to allow the deficiency to be made up within a limit, not of fifteen miles, but of twenty miles on each side of the roads. At the last session of Congress, for the northern part of Wisconsin, because of the difficulties of settling that heavily timbered country, I advocated a similar extension of the grant to the Wisconsin road, and at this session I have favored a similar extension in the northern peninsula of Michigan, because of the peculiar features and character of the country, and the difficulty in settling and improving it. But these roads, several of them at least, in Minnesota, run through as good land as the Government owns, a very desirable portion of country, and now the question to be decided by the Senate is merely whether we are willing to extend the grant from six miles to ten miles. My own judgment is that the increased cost of the construction of railroads justifies this extension, and upon that ground I am going to vote for the bill, but I have thought it my duty to call the attention of the Senate to its important feature.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the bill by adding the following additional sections:

And be it further enacted, That the time mentioned in the act entitled "An act making a grant of lands to the State of Iowa, in alternate sections, and in the construction of certain railroads in said State," for the completion of the railroads named in said act, be, and the same is hereby, extended two years.

And be it further enacted, That the last clause of the second section of an act entitled "An act to regulate the compensation of registers and receivers of land offices in the several States and Territories in the location of lands by States or corporations under grants from Congress, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to read "a map of the change shall be filed with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, within three months after the said change of location shall be made."

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, its title was amended by inserting the words "and Iowa" after "Minnesota."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, from the Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred a communication of J. G. Knapp, in reference to the transmission of printed matter relating to agriculture and seeds through the mails to the Territories, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; which was agreed to.

He, also from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 746) to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855, and for other purposes; reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of B. F. H. Witherell, a legal representative of James Witherell, deceased, late a judge of the Territory of Michigan, praying compensation for adjusting titles to land in that Territory, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 579) to repeal a portion of a joint-resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, reported adversely thereon.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 777) changing the name of Emil Cohen, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 547) for the relief of Jean M. Lander, widow of F. W. Lander, deceased, reported it without amendment.

Mr. VAN WINKLE, from the Committee on Finance, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 477) to authorize State banks having branches to become national banking associations; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 707) to provide for the publication of the opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 758) amendatory of the acts relative to the Attorney General's office, and to fix the compensation of his assistant and clerks, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 778) in relation to the appropriation of private property to the public use, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 779) to regulate the taking of depositions in certain cases, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 80) directing a district or circuit court to be held at the city of Erie, in the State of Pennsylvania, reported adversely thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 609) to prescribe the mode of designating citizens of the United States who shall serve as jurors in the circuit and district courts of the United States, reported in favor of its indefinite postponement.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (S. No. 478) in relation to the Naval Observatory, which was read, and passed to the second reading.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the fifth, and disagreed to the first, second, third, and fourth amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; and had agreed to the sixth amendment of the Senate to that bill, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the first, second, third, and fourth amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution of the House (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register, and had disagreed to the fifth amendment of the Senate to that resolution.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were then signed by the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 690) to revive certain provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 3, 1815, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 738) relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels;

A bill (H. R. No. 781) granting to the Michigan City Harbor Company the use of Government piers in said harbor for the purpose of protecting said harbor;

A bill (H. R. No. 783) concerning the collection district of Salem and Beverly, in Massachusetts; and

A bill (H. R. No. 784) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States," approved May 6, 1864.

DISTRIBUTION OF BOOKS.

Mr. POWELL. The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 82) in relation to the distribution of books and documents, have instructed me to report it back and recommend its passage, and I ask that it be acted on now. It will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that the undistributed portions of the books and documents heretofore printed or purchased for its use by order of either House of Congress, previous to the Thirty-Seventh Congress, and now deposited in the Interior Department and elsewhere, shall be distributed to members of the present Congress, under the direction of the Joint Committee on Printing. The committee are to divide the books in question into parcels equal in number to the whole number of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates from Territories, and as nearly equal in value and importance as possible, and to distribute them to the Senators, Representatives, and Delegates, by such method as may be found most feasible and proper.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to postpone all prior orders, and take up House bill No. 775. It is a bill that affects some five hundred people of my State in regard to their homes, and unless it be acted on soon I have no hope that we shall secure its passage. I hope that the Senate will consent to take it up now.

Mr. COLLAMER. I must again desire the Senate to dispose of the unfinished business of the morning hour. I think it will take but a very short time. I begin to find that it is not worth while to have a piece of unfinished business. It does not stand near as good a chance as does a motion to suspend all prior orders. If it was my privilege to do so, I would move to suspend the prior orders and take up the unfinished business of the morning hour. I hope gentlemen will allow it to be taken up.

Mr. SUMNER. The business to which the Senator from Vermont refers, I presume, is the resolution appropriating $25,000 for a painting. I stated the other day that I should feel it my duty to oppose that resolution, and to some extent, perhaps, to debate it.

Mr. COLLAMER. The question is not up.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not now debating it. I am giving that as a reason why it should not be proceeded with now when the Senator from California has the floor and has moved to take up another matter.

Mr. COLLAMER. The amount of it is, then, that if any gentleman has the floor this is never to be considered. That is the Senator's argument.

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is the result.

Mr. CONNESS. I dislike very much to antagonize any proposition that I have charge of here against any in charge of the honorable Senator from Vermont, and I am constrained now to withdraw my motion so that he may get action on his joint resolution.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not desire the Senator to withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are still in order.

Mr. BROWN. I move that all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill (S. No. 377) granting lands to the State of Missouri to aid in the construction of certain railroads in said State. I will state to the Senate that I have not occupied any of its time with local bills heretofore. This bill is very similar to many that have been passed for other States. It is getting late in the session, and unless we can take it up now I fear it will not have much chance. I leave it to the courtesy of the Senate. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Public Lands, and I move now to take it up.

Mr. GRIMES. I reported a few minutes ago a bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs in relation to the Naval Observatory, which I was anxious to get the Senate to consider. There is a vacancy at this time existing in the Naval Observatory, and it is important to pass the bill for that reason.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator can always get up his naval appropriation bills, but I shall have no other chance for my bill.

Mr. GRIMES. It is not a naval appropriation bill. If there is any objection to it, I will suspend at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri withdraw his motion?

Mr. BROWN. No, sir; I should be glad if the Senate would grant me the courtesy of taking up the bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. I feel it to be my duty to object to taking it up, and to insist that the unfinished business of the morning hour be proceeded with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. I give notice that I shall move to take up the bill to-night.

PAINTING FOR THE CAPITOL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no other business of the morning hour, the unfinished business of the last morning hour is before the Senate, and it is the joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) authorizing a contract with William H. Powell for a picture for the Capitol.

Mr. SUMNER. I am sorry that my friend from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] feels obliged to press this proposition. I do not like to vote against it. Still more, I am reluctant to speak against it. But satisfied as I am, after careful reflection, that it ought not to pass, I shall proceed to express briefly the grounds of my opposition.

I have already, when it was called up the other day, stated that I did not think this the time for us to enter upon the patronage of art. Of course such patronage is beautiful and most tempting. It may seem ungracious to arrest it, but I submit confidently, that at this moment, with our national debt accumulating at the rate of millions a day—with our brave soldiers still unpaid—with a drain upon our resources at every point, it is not advisable to enter upon the patronage of art, beautiful and tempting as it is.

There is much to be done in order to complete the national Capitol in all its parts. Let the work proceed until this sublime structure stands forth, worthy in all respects of the destinies which it enshrines. But I think we should hesitate at this time to enter upon any ornamentation which is not essential to the work. If you order one costly picture you will be called to order another, and where will this expenditure stop? Better wait for the days of peace, soon to come, I trust, when your means will be greater, and you will approach the question in a calmer mood.

Thus far I have said nothing of the artist. But such a vote as is now proposed is an act which selects one artist for especial honor and leaves all others unnoticed. It is like a vote of thanks to officer in the Army or Navy. Are the merits of this artist so peculiar and commanding that he should be taken and all others left? I doubt. At least I know that there are other artists in the country who deserve well of those who undertake the patronage of art. Are you ready, in this off-hand way, without any inquiry, without even hearing their names, to discriminate against them all? I put these questions in no spirit of criticism, and certainly in no unkindness to the artist whom it is proposed to honor, for whom, let me say, I have a sincere regard. There is already one picture by him in the Capitol. A second order would be more than enough.

Then again, are you sure that the subject selected for a picture at the present time would be such a maturer and more chastened taste could approve? This is a period of war. We are all under its influence. But I doubt if it be desirable to keep before us any of the pictures of war, especially of a war with our own fellow-countrymen. There are moral triumphs which are more worthy of commemoration by art. I need only refer to the proclamation of emancipation, which belongs to the great events of history.

I send to the Chair an amendment, to come in at the end of the resolution:

Provided, That in the national Capitol, dedicated to the national Union, there shall be no picture of a victory in battle with our own fellow-citizens.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senator from Vermont has pressed this resolution this morning. I think we ought not to devote a moment to a measure of this character at this time, and, in fact, I think we ought to abandon most of the disputed questions, and act now only on those measures that are essential to the country. I shall vote against the amendment proposed by my colleague, and vote against the original resolution; and I rise more especially to say that I disagree with my colleague altogether in the proposition that no work of art shall grace the Capitol of this country that represents anything of the present war of a military or naval character. I do not believe in that doctrine. It has been put before the Senate once before. While the world stands, I want every achievement of the Army and of the Navy for the liberty and unity and perpetuity of this country to be written if possible on every foot of our territory, and on the bending arches of the sky, so that men can read it everywhere. I do not wish to disown in art, in science, in anything worthy of preservation, the noble deeds of the heroes of the Army and Navy of this country.

Mr. COLLAMER. Honorable Senators seem to repeat over and over their regret that I have pressed this measure. I have not pressed the measure. I do not propose to press it. They complain of the time at which it is presented. I did not choose the time. This was a House joint resolution. It came here; it was reported from the committee from respect to the House themselves; and on their view of the merits of the case the committee reported the resolution. I called it up in the regular order of business with a desire to have a vote, saying not one word about it. I have occupied no time on it. Whatever time has been taken with it has been by the opposition to it. I do not propose to take much, if any, time with it now. But as gentlemen seem to think it rather strange that at this time it is asked for, I will say a word.

Mr. President, we have statues of civilians, busts of judges of the Supreme Court, pictures of our Presidents, pictures of the battles of the Revolution; but look where we may, anywhere about this Capitol, and not merely about the Capitol, but through any of the Departments in this city, and where will you find a single line of a pencil which commemorates either the actions of the members of the Navy or their persons? Not a portrait of them is to be found. Civilians, lawyers, statesmen, heroes upon land, are represented, and the battles of the Revolution are commemorated; but you will not find a single stroke of the pencil or any production of art anywhere which commemorates the action of the individual heroes of the Navy, or the naval battles of our country. It seems to me that this is slurring over and casting into oblivion and contempt that which adorns the brightest pages of our history, from the time that Burke spoke of the enterprise of American seamen to this day. While our history chronicles the glorious deeds of the Navy, they are not commemorated by art. It seems to me the time has now come when some sort of attention should be paid to them. I think we can find, somewhere in our history, from the days of Truxton down through the last war with Great Britain, when it was said our Navy fought its way into reputation and redeemed itself from prejudice, and in the events of this war, down to the most recent enterprises of Lieutenant Cushing, a proper subject for a painting which shall recognize the existence of a Navy in this country.

Then, again, as to the subject; that is to be settled upon, according to the resolution, between the committee and the artist. That is all we can ever do as to that. As respects the artist himself, gentlemen have seen specimens of his productions. They are in the Rotunda. We have all seen them. Most of us know the artist of whom the Senator from Massachusetts speaks, certainly with very great respect and justice. I think we are as competent now to judge whether he is a proper man to perform this service as we ever shall be.

As respects the time, it seems to me that during war is the very time when we should by our votes show that we have gratitude enough to remember, and that we have honor enough to perpetuate and commemorate, the actions of that branch of the public service in which so much of heroism and patriotism has been displayed.

Mr. HOWE. Before this vote is taken I beg leave to trouble the Senate long enough to say that if there were any one proposition which could make the original resolution more distasteful to me than it is in itself, it would be the proviso moved by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.]

I regard this war as a war made upon the people by their enemies. It is not the first of the kind. I trust in God it is the last, as it is the bitterest and the most relentless. Every victory achieved by our armies in this war I regard as a victory achieved by the people over their enemies, and those victories are not the least resplendent that have been known in the history of the world, and they are the very victories of all others that I will never consent shall be winked out of sight. They are the victories with which, as I understand them, God has had more to do and man has had less to do than any victories that have heretofore been achieved in the contest between those original enemies, the people and the aristocrats, if you please to call them so; and so, therefore, if we are to commemorate any victories whatever by painting, by poetry, or in any other way, let these victories be not excluded by any vote of ours. They never shall be by any vote of mine.

But, sir, I cannot consent to vote for the resolution. Glad as I would be to see this magnificent pile decorated by some work which should commemorate the gallant deeds of our Navy, I cannot vote for this now. I have known in my life spendthrifts who, having mortgaged their homestead to its full value, would still, if they had credit left, borrow money to add another decoration to it. I never thought the example worthy of the imitation of sensible men, nor could I commend it to the nation. This house of ours now is under mortgage for $2,000,000,000. I do not want to vote for a proposition to borrow $25,000 more to add another decoration to it. I have seen a picture commemorating an event in our naval history that I would be glad and I would be proud to see owned by the nation, and see it adorning this very building; but we do not absolutely know that we own the building. We know there is an immense army within a few miles of this Capitol disputing our title to it. I think we had better have our title quieted, and then I will agree to vote for money to decorate the building.

STATE GOVERNMENT OF LOUISIANA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the unfinished business of Saturday is now before the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire that that be informally laid aside while the vote is taken on this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the unfinished business the Senator from Kansas, not now in the Chamber, [Mr. LANE,] is entitled to the floor. The unfinished business is the joint resolution (S. R. No. 117) recognizing the government of the State of Louisiana.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit a motion that the pending order be dispensed with with a view to take up the bill which was made the special order for to-day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion cannot be interposed without the consent of the Senator entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator [Mr. LANE, of Kansas] is not here. I did not know whether the Chair would wait for him.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks he must be in his place to entitle him to the benefit of the floor. The Senator from Ohio moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend the internal revenue law.

Mr. POMEROY. I am satisfied that if we can take a vote on this question at this time my colleague does not desire to make a protracted speech, and he told me this morning he would yield the floor to take a vote. If we can take a vote on the Louisiana question now my colleague will yield the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. I assure the Senator it is utterly impossible to take the vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there could be a vote taken on the Louisiana question within an hour or two hours I would not object, but I know from statements made to me that it is impossible to get a vote without sacrificing the day. Therefore I must insist on my motion.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have not heard any objection to taking a vote on a House joint resolution called up on my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio interposed a motion which takes precedence of that matter.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there could be a vote on either of the propositions, either the picture proposition or the Louisiana proposition, without further debate, I would not interpose.

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it there will be no further debate about the picture resolution.

Mr. SUMNER. I have another amendment to move.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is for a vote, I suppose.

Mr. SUMNER. I shall want the yeas and nays.

Mr. COLLAMER. That I do not object to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I insist on my motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am sorry that my friend from Ohio conceives it to be his duty to make this motion. I am satisfied that it is a waste of time to take the course he proposes. The tax bill has just been printed. It is laid upon our tables this morning for the first time. There has been no opportunity to read it. Senators have not yet read that important bill. We can act upon it, I am satisfied, much more speedily after we shall have had time to look it over.

Again, sir, the matter which has been under consideration for several days now, the recognition of the existing State government in Louisiana, has so far progressed that the Senate was ready to vote upon it on Saturday night, and a vote was only prevented by dilatory motions made—I wish not to say anything offensive, but still the truth ought to be spoken—made in a factious spirit, avowedly made for the purpose of delay. It was manifest upon that occasion that a majority of the Senate, two thirds of the body, desired action; and I ask, shall one third of this body be permitted by factious opposition to delay an important bill of this character? Its merits are not under discussion at this moment, I know. If, sir, we can hold that measure before us, if the Senate, a clear majority of which has expressed itself by vote after vote in favor of action upon the Louisiana case, will say to this factious minority, "Upon you belongs the responsibility of the public business of the country; we will continue to sit, commencing now, until you cease your factious opposition," I hope that no Senator here acting upon the responsibility he owes to the country will be willing by mere motions of delay to continue the matter much longer. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] shakes his head. I ask that Senator if he is prepared by factious opposition to delay the public measures of the Congress of the United States in a time of war, and of great peril to the public interests.

Now, sir, I hope that a majority of the Senate will stand by the proposition which is under discussion, a proposition upon which this body is ready to vote, and was ready to vote on Saturday night when it was delayed by these dilatory motions. I am sure the Senator from Ohio will make greater progress in his bill by allowing us to dispose of this measure now than by taking that up and postponing the measure which is now under consideration. He can hardly expect that on so important a question as this a majority of the Senate will agree to allow a minority to control them. The minority would be very glad to have the bill of the Senator from Ohio or any other bill taken up. But if it is of importance to lay a foundation for the restoration of this Union, for a peace that will be worth having, we must fix at some time, and now in the opinion of a majority of the Senate the time has come when we should recognize the existing government of the loyal people of Louisiana.

I trust, sir, that the motion of the Senator from Ohio will not prevail. I know that he considers it his duty to make the motion as chairman of the Finance Committee, but there is no question but that his measure will be taken up and acted upon, and I am sure that by proceeding with the regular order with the understanding that it shall be persisted in till factious opposition cease, we may get a vote before the sun goes down.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have made this motion from my sense of public duty, and I am satisfied that I can convince a majority of the Senate that it is indispensable to the public business that this motion should be agreed to. I shall vote from my present stand-point with great pleasure for the resolution in regard to Louisiana, but at the same time I do not regard that measure of vital importance. The same question will be presented to us on the 4th of March next, on the application of the gentlemen claiming to be elected Senators, when we shall have ample time and opportunity to discuss the whole question about the State of Louisiana.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him and to state that the same question cannot be presented after the 4th of March.

Mr. SHERMAN. It can be as to the admission of the Senators.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But the report of the Judiciary Committee, upon which we are acting, takes the distinct ground that Senators cannot be admitted until by the joint action of both Houses of Congress the State government is recognized, and that requires the action of the other House; there must be legislative action.

Mr. SHERMAN. However that may be, let me state the condition of the public business. At this hour we are within five days of the close of the session, and we have not acted upon a single appropriation bill finally. I have now upon my table three bills, each of which must be read and considered in detail. One is the tax bill. Everybody knows the importance of acting upon that, and that it will give rise to debate. It affects every industrial interest of this country; it covers fifty-eight printed pages, with a multitude of amendments. I regret as much as the Senator from Illinois can that this bill has been sent to us at so late a period, but the House of Representatives had the exclusive power to originate the bill, and they did not send it to us until last Monday. The Committee on Finance were in almost continuous session during the last week deliberating upon the bill, and they reported it at the earliest moment practicable. We cannot expect that the Senate will act upon it and dispose of it in less than two or three days. It must pass; it is one of those measures that demand the attention of the Senate as against all other propositions.

Then I have in my hand the Indian appropriation bill, a bill of fifty-two printed pages, and although it will not take as much time as the tax bill, it is a volume of itself, and it will take two hours to read it at the Clerk's desk. I have also in my hand another bill which must be acted on, which has not even been considered by the House of Representatives at this moment, but which will be sent to us in a day or two—the civil appropriation bill—containing all the miscellaneous appropriations, and all the appropriations for the civil service of the Government; a bill which usually occupies the Senate two or three days.

Then behind that we have the tariff bill, which must be passed in order to conform our tariff to the new internal revenue bill. I have on my table, also, the Army and Navy appropriation bills, ready to be presented to the Senate for another stage of their advanced progress.

Under these circumstances I cannot, with my sense of public duty, allow the Louisiana question to consume more time. I have nothing to say in regard to the conduct of Senators who choose to discuss that measure. They perform what they believe to be their conscientious duty. They must answer to their constituents and to their consciences for their course. I have no censures to cast on them. I know that it is now indispensably necessary to the public business that the tax bill should be taken up and considered, if we intend to pass it at this session, and any delay, in my judgment, may lead to the defeat of several of these bills. It will now take six clerks every hour from this time until the adjournment of Congress to engross and enroll these various bills, so as to pass them through their several stages. Every letter and every page of these bills has to be enrolled on parchment before the bills can be signed by the Presiding Officer and sent to the President, and all this work must be accomplished before noon of next Saturday.

Under these circumstances I appeal to Senators on their responsibility not to postpone action on these important measures which must receive the sanction of Congress before the adjournment, or else compel the necessity of an extra session. I have looked into the history of the sessions of Congress for several years, and I do not find that at any period there was such a vast accumulation of public measures demanding attention as there is during this week. I must, therefore, insist upon my motion, and I trust that it will not be voted down, and that we shall not waste this day in discussion. I know—and I assure Senators that when I say I know it, I mean what I say—that there are Senators here who deem the measure in regard to Louisiana so important that they will insist upon their right to discuss it, and therefore it will take time, and in this way, on a measure not unimportant, but of comparative unimportance, you may endanger the passage of bills that are necessary to the conduct of the public business during the next year. All that can be said, if the Louisiana question shall be postponed by the action even of a minority of the body, is that the question goes over to the next Congress, when it may be considered fully and carefully after all the discussion that any gentleman desires to give it.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, this is not the first time that I have risen here to resist an attempt to force upon an unwilling people a constitution to which they never consented. It is an old story with me, and I have not changed my ground or my opinion upon that subject now because some of the party with whom I generally act have fallen from grace, as it were, and gone over to the old Lecompton doctrine of the party who endeavored to force upon Kansas a constitution to which the people never consented, but which they abhorred.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is the constitution of the people of Louisiana.

Mr. WADE. The people! How long have you, sir, been of the opinion that it was the people who wanted it? Whence comes this new-born zeal of the Senator from Illinois? How long is it since he believed that it ought to be recognized as a State by the Congress of the United States? Sir, it is the most miraculous conversion that has taken place since St. Paul's time.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have believed it ever since I investigated the facts.

Mr. WADE. Ever since you investigated the facts, and now you are in a great hurry! Why did you not investigate the facts while we were adjourning over for two and three weeks at a time and doing nothing? The question was before you then. Can you answer me that? I should like to hear the answer. Whence, I say again, this new-born zeal of the Senator from Illinois at the heel of a Congress, when we are pressed with business which is important and essential, and which we must do, to bring before this body a question going to the organization and foundation of the Republic? You have pondered over it all winter, and your mind was made up entirely adverse to what it is now. How do you know but that your first view of the subject was the true one? Why so zealous at this second thought of yours?

You and I did not differ formerly on this subject. We considered it a mockery, a miserable mockery, to undertake to recognize this Louisiana organization as a State in this Union. If I am not greatly mistaken, the Senator from Illinois himself not three weeks ago argued and voted and reported from the Judiciary Committee that it was not a State which ought to be recognized or its votes counted for President of the United States. How does he get along with conduct so palpably inconsistent, so at war with itself?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator, I presume, does not mean to misstate me. He never heard me argue or report or vote or say that the State government of Louisiana should not be recognized. I voted against receiving its electoral vote, and I voted against it because it had not been recognized. Now, I propose to put it in a condition where it may cast electoral votes, and do all other acts belonging to a State.

Mr. HOWARD. Why not recognize it, then?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Why do I not recognize a Territory before it is made into a State? I will answer all these objections, but I do not want to be drawn into a discussion of the merits of the question on a motion to postpone one order of business to another. I think I could satisfy the Senator from Ohio himself that he is resisting the will of the people of Louisiana, and he is the Lecomptonite on the present occasion, and I will prove it by the record.

Mr. WADE. I do not doubt that the gentleman does not like to discuss the merits of the question now. Did he not open the way to the discussion of its merits?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No.

Mr. WADE. Did not the Senator say it was a vital and essential principle which he was advocating in this instance that could await no delay? Was that no allusion to the merits? Isay to that Senator he does confess that he voted that Louisiana was no State, that its vote should not be counted for President of the United States, the strongest test that could be applied to the question. Why did he do that? Does he undertake to draw a distinction between counting the votes of a State for President of the United States and recognizing its Senators and Representatives on this floor and in the other House? A Jesuit cannot see the distinction. There is none. The Senator did adjudge it not to be a State, and he adjudged it right. I was with him, two thirds of the whole Senate were with him, that it was not worthy to be counted as a State in this Union. And yet when the question has not been debated, for I believe there have been but two or three speeches made on the side that I maintain, the Senator undertakes to rise and say that we acted factiously, because on Saturday night, after ten o'clock, he refused to let the Senate adjourn, and insisted and was determined upon getting the question then. He had made his speech upon it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No.

Mr. WADE. Yes; the Senator had spoken on it. At any rate he made a long report in its favor, and he wanted every Senator here to come right up on Saturday night late, a rainy night, too, and allow the question to be taken. I told him he could not have it, and he never should have had it. In olden times when rebels were here intent on their accursed measures to strike down democracy and republicanism, and thrust down the throats of an unwilling people a constitution for which they never voted, and which they abhorred in their hearts, I stood here and made a successful "factious" opposition according to the idea of the Senator from Illinois. I glory in it. I thank my God that we did make a factious opposition, if you call it factious. It had the effect to prevent a brave people from being hampered by central authority here, to prevent the President's edict being announced as the law, and the people being enslaved by a constitution to which they had never given their assent.

Sir, I shall deal with the same proposition now precisely as I did then. It will not do to tell me that because a President whom I helped to elect has taken it in hand, if he has taken it in hand, to enjoin it on this Congress, I am to recognize it. I will view it under his mandate precisely as I did under that of Mr. Buchanan or Mr. Pierce. When the rights of the people are touched, when the foundation of this Government is sought to be swept away by executive usurpation, it will not do to turn around to me and say that this comes from a President whom I helped to elect, or that the measure is supported generally by my own party. I say, sir, that this question goes to the very foundation of republican government. If the President of the United States, operating through his major generals, can initiate a State government, and can bring it here and force us, compel us, to receive as associates on this floor these mere mockeries, these men of straw who represent nobody, your Republic is at an end.

Sir, I have heard a great deal about this pretended election in Louisiana, that did not come from Major General Banks, and I pronounce the proceeding a mockery. It is not pretended that there could be drummed up from the riff-raff of New Orleans and sent into the vicinity under the mandate of a major general more than about six thousand votes, where over fifty thousand were formerly polled.

I regret as much as the Senator from Illinois or anybody else, that the people of Louisiana have not manifested their desire to come back into the Union; and until a majority of them do so it is impossible that you can make a republican government of it. What, sir, talk of organizing a republican State, a democratic community, to be one of the integral members of this Union, out of a people a great majority of whom are absolutely hostile to you and to your assertion of jurisdiction over them! We all understand that according to our fundamental principle of government nothing less than a majority can rule. If these seceded States are not willing to accept that rule, you have in them now the only government you can have in the nature of things, a military government under a military governor, and it is better for them than the mockery of the form of a free State under the shadow of military power.

Talk not to me of your ten per cent. principle. A more absurd, monarchical, and anti-American principle was never announced on God's earth—

Mr. SHERMAN. I must interpose—

Mr. WADE. But, Mr. President, I will not go into that. I see that my colleague, who is charged with the important business of the session, that is to provide ways and means for carrying on this war and carrying on this Government, is the advocate here of substances and not of shadows and mockeries. He has shown to the Senate that it is absolutely essential that we betake ourselves to the substantial business of the session, and not play around this mere mockery any longer.

We are told that it is important to dispose of this Louisiana question. Is it not exceedingly important that we shall have here as associates for four or five days, side by side with us in this Senate Chamber, two men from Louisiana, representing nobody and nothing except the will of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States? It is important that we should have them here for four or five days to neutralize the vote of Illinois, to neutralize the vote of Ohio, to neutralize the vote of the State of New York! Sir, it is an insult to the people of those great States and of all the other States in the Union to admit these men on this floor to neutralize and to outvote us who do profess to represent the people of our States. The Senator from Illinois thinks it is all-important that these gentlemen should be here to help us out with our business for the residue of the session. I am sorry that he is an advocate of such measures.

He says I am taking a dilatory course. Am I? Why did he bring up his other important measure of building statues and garnishing the tombs of your judges, of your Jeffreys', and detain the Senate with that when he knew that we had hardly time to do our legitimate business? I hope the Judiciary Committee will betake themselves to more useful legislation than all this. But, sir, I do not propose now to argue the question; but if you will have the question up I will argue it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Ohio does not propose to argue the question after occupying about half an hour in denunciation of those who disagree with him, talking about usurpations and about other matters that are not before the Senate. After indulging in this strain of remark, he sits down, not proposing to argue the question! He has been arguing it, or rather I should say he has been denouncing persons who disagree with him. I do not think that will accomplish much in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. WADE. Did not the Senator denounce us as factionists?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I did not allude to the Senator from Ohio at all. I believe he made no motion on Saturday night, and made no speech.

Mr. WADE. Yes, I did; and I should have made more if necessary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I certainly did not hear from him; and he generally speaks in such a tone that his voice is heard. I think he made no motions on Saturday night.

Mr. WADE. I did.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If he did, they were made in a quieter way than they are to-day. Now, sir, it is manifest that we are losing time by this motion which has been interposed by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] If he will let us go on with the Louisiana resolution, I am quite sure we can finish it to-day, and then it will be out of the way. I think it will be economy of time to do it.

I am not to be drawn off, although I think I should be justified in replying right here to the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] and showing, as I think I can show, that he himself is resisting the wishes of the loyal people of Louisiana, and standing in the way of the reorganization of that State government. I think it would be very easy to show to other persons, if not to the Senator from Ohio, that there is very great propriety in not admitting Senators here or not receiving electoral votes from a State which is declared to be in insurrection before we have removed the impediment to their acting as a State government, while it would be very proper afterward to receive them; but all that would be apart from the consideration of the question now before the Senate. I assure the Senate from my experience here that it is economy of time to proceed with this matter and settle it. We have already lost half an hour in this discussion. I trust the Senate will vote against the motion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] and I believe he will lose nothing by it, but that the public interests will be subserved, and the public business will be expedited by taking that course.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senate will vote to take up the bill suggested by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] It is a bill of great importance, as are the bills which are connected with it, upon which we are to act between this and the close of the session. I do not regard the joint resolution which is so strenuously urged upon our attention by the Senator from Illinois as a measure upon which it is necessary for the Senate to act at all, at this session, at least. The subject-matter has not been discussed before the people of the United States. Our constituents at home at this time are, in the main, very ignorant of the nature and qualities of this State government in Louisiana which it is now attempted to set up as a State of the Union. I think it is their right to be permitted to consider this question between this and the coming session of Congress, so that they will be able to express their views to their representatives here in this Chamber and in the other House. This is a Government of public opinion, and if there ever was an occasion on which it was necessary that the voice of the people should be heard, and should prevail, it is this occasion, and this is the subject.

Mr. President, I confess that these arrogant charges of the Senator from Illinois of factiousness against the minority that do not see fit to swear in his words upon this measure, grate rather harshly upon my ear. I am sincerely opposed to the passage of the measure of which he has so suddenly become the advocate. I feel it not only my privilege, but my duty, to use all honorable and fair means to prevent that measure becoming a law, and I can assure that gentleman that all the clamor he may raise here against me for factiousness will not deter me from performing this duty. I do not recognize his right to stand here and charge me with faction. Who has given him the commission to stand up and accuse his brothers in this Chamber of criminality? for factiousness is such in the eye of the public. Who has given him a commission to stalk into this Chamber and assume to call up and in a most schoolmasterly way lecture gentlemen who belong here, and who, some of them, at least, may fairly claim to be his equals and his peers? I will set up no such claim for myself. I am willing that the intellect and the political character of the Senator from Illinois may be sold at what he deems them worth, if they can be so sold, but I beg to assure him at the same time that I shall perform my duty here according to my own conscientious convictions.

The Senator from Illinois assumes the high prerogative of charging his brethren here with faction. How long ago was it that that Senator made his voice heard upon this floor in denunciation of the whole proceedings of the Executive in regard to the readmission of these two States, Louisiana and Arkansas? There has not been, and is not now, upon this floor a single Senator whose sarcasm has been so biting against the Executive, whose denunciation has been so unscrupulous, vociferous, and sweeping, as that of the Senator from Illinois in reference to these same acts of military usurpation, as he called them, and which acts he now undertakes to set up as a foundation for the establishment of the government of a State.

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise to a point of order. I never like to make a point of order. I trust Senators will allow a vote to be taken on my motion. Discussion of the merits is not in order.

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly, I will allow the vote to be taken with the utmost pleasure; but I trust my friend from Ohio will not expect me to sit here very quietly and silently under these unfounded, and I had almost said ungentlemanly, charges of the arrogant Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think enough has been said on both sides now.

Mr. HOWARD. That Senator shall at least know that there is one member of this body who will not accept such unfounded rebukes.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to say one word just here, and that is in relation to this people's government of Louisiana. If I am out of order in doing so, the Chair will remind me of my duty in that respect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair it is not in order to discuss the Louisiana question on this motion.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I do not mean to discuss that question, but simply to suggest the point I wish to make in voting for the motion of the Senator from Ohio, and against the consideration of the measure suggested by the Senator from Illinois. I hold in my possession a paper indicating the names of the members of the Legislature of this State that we are called upon to recognize; and it shows that twenty-five, or twenty-seven, or thirty of those gentlemen who now constitute that Legislature, are office-holders under this Government or the government of the State, which is the same thing.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I remember last summer that good fortune threw me in the path of a distinguished gentleman just returned from Louisiana. I think he had been present at the sittings of the convention whose work finds such an advocate in my friend from Illinois; at any rate he had been in New Orleans at the time in the discharge of important public duties. In reply to an inquiry with regard to that convention, he said compendiously, that it was "nothing but a stupendous hoax"—yes, sir, nothing but a stupendous hoax, and the product of that convention—

Mr. SHERMAN. I must again rise to a point of order, and I do it against the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who is one of the oldest Senators here. We must certainly enforce the rules of order, and a question of this kind is not debatable to the latitude to which the discussion has gone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The practice of the Senate is one way and parliamentary law is the other.

Mr. SHERMAN. I insist on the parliamentary law.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The parliamentary law does not allow the merits of a question to be discussed on a question of the priority of business. That is undoubtedly the parliamentary law; but the practice of the Senate is the other way. The Chair if called upon to decide must rule according to the law.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts will understand the Chair that he is not at liberty to discuss the merits of either bill upon the question of proceeding to the consideration of one. That is the parliamentary law.

Mr. SUMNER. And yet I presume that I may allude in a general way to the character of the measures that are in question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks so, because that may be a reason why the measure proposed to be taken up should be proceeded with or not.

Mr. SUMNER. I knew the Chair must think so; and it was only in that way that I was speaking when I was interrupted by my friend from Ohio. I was quoting what was said to me by a distinguished citizen with regard to the convention which produced—

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the member be kind enough to tell, if he is at liberty to tell, who the distinguished citizen is that said it was all a humbug?

Mr. SUMNER. He did not call it, humbug. He called it a stupendous hoax.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. GRIMES. I only wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Maryland. If he is anxious to obtain the names of those who were in New Orleans when the convention was held and who do entertain the opinion stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, I can furnish him with a large number, and I will say furthermore in this connection that if the Senate will give a committee I will undertake to prove and I will prove that the voters whose votes were polled in the outlying parishes at Thibodeaux and Plaquemines, and other places, were carried in Army transports to those places where they polled the votes, being discharged soldiers and persons belonging in New Orleans, and were brought back to New Orleans, and were not residents of the places where they purported to vote.

Mr. SUMNER. I doubt not that my friend from Iowa is right, but I understand that it is not proper to discuss the merits of the proposition on this preliminary motion, and I do not design to discuss it. I was simply characterizing it, and I was going on to say that in my opinion the proposition which the Senator from Illinois is so earnestly pressing upon the Senate, when we consider its origin and character, is in itself very little different from a stupendous hoax. I say nothing about the convention, for I was not there. I did not see it. On that point I simply cite the testimony of another. But the proposition of the Senator is before us, and we are familiar with its nature. Every moment gives us new glimpses of the violence and fraud with which it is associated. Perhaps this expression I have quoted is hardly grave enough in speaking of such a proposition, where military power and injustice to a whole race have been enlisted in forming the constitution of a State, in defiance of the self-evident truths of the Declaration of Independence. The United States are bound by the Constitution "to guaranty to every State a republican form of government." Now, when called to perform this guarantee it is proposed to recognize an oligarchy of the skin. The pretended State government in Louisiana is utterly indefensible whether you look at its origin or its character. To describe it, I must use plain language. It is a mere seven-months' abortion, begotten by the bayonet in criminal conjunction with the spirit of caste, and born before its time, rickety, unformed, unfinished—whose continued existence will be a burden, a reproach, and a wrong. That is the whole case; and yet the Senator from Illinois now presses it upon the Senate at this moment to the exclusion of the important public business of the country. For instance—

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I must insist on the order of the Senate being enforced or abandoning my motion at once and withdrawing it. If Senators are determined to discuss the proposition I shall withdraw the motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let it be withdrawn.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks this range of debate is out of order.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senators must see now that to take up this controverted question, in the face of the statements made here, is to exhaust the expiring hours of this session on a controversy in which the members of our own political party are divided. I appeal to the Senate to dispose of that which is indispensable to be disposed of, and then if we have any time to talk afterward I am perfectly willing to hear all that can be said about Louisiana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TRUMBULL called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the vote is taken I desire to say that I feel a deep interest in regard to the State governments of Arkansas and Louisiana, and I should like very much to see those States recognized and the members representing them admitted; but as a member of the Committee on Finance, I know the importance of taking up the measure referred to by the Senator from Ohio, and I shall therefore vote for his motion.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 34, nays 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Wade, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Doolittle, Harris, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—12.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, before going on with the tax bill, I move to take up the action of the House of Representatives upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion by Mr. SHERMAN it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the amendment of the House to the sixth amendment of the Senate thereto, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. COWAN, Mr. WILSON, and Mr. CARLILE.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th of June, 1866, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their second and twenty-fourth amendments.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the eighteenth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with the following amendment: in lieu of the words stricken out by said Senate amendment insert the following: "Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That no midshipman shall be appointed for any district not represented in Congress."

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the House to the third, sixth, twenty-first, and twenty-second amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the seventeenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out "one million" and insert in lieu thereof the words "five hundred thousand," and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-third amendment of the Senate and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: after the word "bunting," in line thirteen of said amendment insert the words "of American manufacture."

JOHN SHERMAN,
JAMES W. GRIMES,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JUSTIN S. MORRILL,
F. A. PIKE,
SAMUEL S. COX,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the following report, made by Mr. Howe on Saturday last:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from the second amendment.

T. O. HOWE,
THOMAS A. HENDRICKS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. G. BLAINE,
R. MALLORY,
G. S. ORTH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed the following bills and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 37) to prevent officers of the Army and Navy, and other persons engaged in the military and naval service of the United States, from interfering in elections in the States;

A bill (S. No. 347) for the relief of Rebecca S. Harrison;

A bill (S. No. 393) to authorize the corporation of Georgetown to levy certain taxes;

A bill (S. No. 439) to change the name of Dorsey Edwin William Towson, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, to that of Dorsey Edwin William Carter;

A bill (S. No. 454) supplemental to an act entitled "An act to annex a part of the State of New Jersey to the collection district of New York, and to appoint an assistant collector to reside at Jersey City," approved February 21, 1863; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 112) for the relief of James B. Royce.

PROPOSALS FOR TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. POMEROY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish the Senate with an abstract of the proposals for transporting military supplies from Fort Leavenworth, westward, opened December 31, 1864, by Captain Henry C. Hodges in pursuance of published notice thereof, together with all communications received by the Secretary of War or Quartermaster General relating thereto, and their opinions or decision thereon.

J. AND O. P. COBB AND COMPANY.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the Committee on Claims to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 80) for the adjustment of the claim of J. & O. P. Cobb & Co., of Indiana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; and it was signed by the Vice President.

RECESS.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, it was ordered that to-day, at four and a half o'clock, the Senate will take a recess till seven o'clock p. m.

Mr. SHERMAN. To avoid the repetition of the order, I move that hereafter during the present session the Senate take a recess every day from four and a half till seven o'clock p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I move that on and after tomorrow the Senate meet daily at eleven o'clock a. m.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope not. We cannot do our committee business and meet at eleven o'clock and have a night session besides.

Mr. WILSON. We have a great deal to do.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I know we have; but we must attend to committee business.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the motion.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. DAVIS. Is not the tax bill now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. To save time, as the amendments of the committee are reached in the reading of the bill by the Secretary each will be acted on in order.

Mr. DAVIS. Before the bill is read I move to postpone it indefinitely, and upon that motion I propose at this time to give my views generally against the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the amount of our public debt, and the rapidity of its growth, is the wonder of the world. The number of men who have been mustered into this war, and the number who have been mustered out of it by death, in some form, and the burden of taxation which it has brought upon the people, have no parallel in all history; and still the cormorant of this war cries aloud for more men, more money, more taxes!

I deny that the people owe to the Government the last man and the last dollar, or anything; on the contrary, all that is owing between them is by the Government to the people. Our Government was made by the people themselves, and for themselves. It was made to secure to all life, liberty, property, and the pursuit of happiness, and not to aggrandize the Government or the governors. The great aim of its creation was to achieve freedom, not empire; to protect all, to oppress none. It was organized by a fundamental law, a written Constitution, which delegates to it all its powers by plain language, and then not only impliedly, but expressly, in the simplest words, withholds to the people and the States respectively all the powers which it had not delegated to the Government. The Constitution is the great power of attorney from the people to their governors, by which and within which their agents, the governors, act for them. If the agents transcend their powers, such acts impose no obligations, legal or moral, on the principal, the people. Their power of attorney is published to and read by the world, all its delegations and restrictions of power are universally known, and the rule of law that the acts of the agent outside of his power are void, exists not only in our Constitution and the operations of our Government, but is recognized by every civilized nation in all their affairs. The people of the United States are not bound to furnish men or money to their Government to prosecute any unconstitutional military enterprise, or to execute any unconstitutional policy, or to do any unconstitutional act whatever; and if by the enforcement of usurped powers the Government has contracted debts, the people are under no obligation to pay those debts. All money borrowed, debts in any mode created by the Federal Government to destroy State governments and institutions, to subvert the liberties of the people, and to despoil them of their property, were without authority; and those who gave their services, their money, and property, to such unconstitutional purposes acted in their own wrong, and must take the consequences. But the Government had the right, and it was bound to suppress the insurrection by the exercise of all its constitutional powers; and such portion of the public debt as was created for that object, by the use of constitutional means, was properly incurred, and ought to be paid. The people may apportion the debt between what was rightfully and what was wrongfully created; the former they will pay, the latter they will not pay. They will not repudiate their own debt, they will decide in accordance with truth, principle, and justice, that debts created by their agents without their authority are not their debts, and that they will not pay them.

In the light of these principles, I will give a rapid résumé of the administration of the Government, and particularly in the State of Kentucky, for the last three years, to afford some means for forming a general idea what portion of the public debt has been created to effect unconstitutional purposes, and therefore should not be paid, nor any tax be imposed to pay it, or interest upon it.

The military administration in Kentucky has been a tissue of the most shocking abuses of power, and requires a thorough and searching investigation by a select committee of the two Houses of Congress; and I will proceed to state some of the facts upon which I base this assertion. During the last three years there has been no general election in that State in which military officers of the United States have not interfered in manifold and flagitious modes—by intimidating the election officers to strike the names of candidates to whom they objected from the poll-books; by prescribing oaths to voters essentially different from those provided by law, and requiring them to be taken as the condition of voting; by forcing qualified and loyal voters from the polls by armed soldiers, unless they would vote for particular candidates; by forcibly seizing upon and destroying the poll-books, and imprisoning or driving the officers from the places of holding elections; and by arrays of soldiers, and threats and acts of violence generally.

Early in that period wrong and outrage were visited upon the people of Kentucky in those and many other forms by a soldiery and their commanders whose duty it was to uphold them in the possession and enjoyment of all their rights and liberties; and during the latter part of it, in number, diversity, and enormity, those wrongs and outrages were greatly augmented. Throughout the past year, in defiance of an arrangement made by the Governor of Kentucky with the President and Secretary of War, that slaves of that State should be taken into the military service of the United States only by being regularly enrolled and drafted, or by the agreement of both master and slave, and as fast as mustered in should be taken out of the State to camps of instruction, recruiting officers to enlist negroes were sent with general license into the slaveholding counties, and their proceedings were of the most violent and disorderly character. These officers were numerous, and all from other States or foreign countries. They generally had neither the intelligence nor disposition to exercise those powers with any propriety; on the contrary, they acted as though their business was not only to recruit slaves, but especially to insult and outrage their owners and families, and to do everything possible to demoralize slavery in the State. Enrolling was early discontinued; the recruiting officers spread over the country, under promises from superiors that when they raised a company they should have a captain's commission, and after getting two or three slaves to join them would sweep from farm to farm, making their recruits the effective agents of their work, and invading every household, workshop, or field, that promised further accessions, and beguiling, constraining, and forcibly dragging away the great mass of men slaves, without any regard to the remonstrance of owners, or the nature of their employment. It often happened that the drivers of wagons, and other vehicles, in towns, villages, and on the highways, were seized and forced away by these roving recruiting parties, and the property with which they were charged left without protection. The owners' exigencies for labor were never regarded, but whatever might be the urgency of their present demands, all men and half-grown boys were taken when any allurements, or false promises, or threats could wring from them a seeming consent, and in many instances by positive force. Large portions of the State were thus rifled of their most effective labor, and the consequence was mechanical orders were left unexecuted, fields uncultivated, and crops ungathered, causing a heavy loss to the State and ruin to many persons.

If there had been a regular enrollment of the slave military population of Kentucky, and only its fair quota taken into the service, more than half of this lost labor might have been saved to the State, and most of the great loss averted. But not only slave men of military age, but many who were over age, who were physically incompetent, who were under age, as low as ten and twelve years; young women dressed in male attire, and women and children, were carried off by these marauders. Some recruiting agents entered largely into the substitute trade, selling their negro recruits to provost marshals and other military officers, who again sold these living chattels as substitutes, both in and out of the State, making enormous profits. One provost marshal in Covington was said thus to have acquired and disposed of about eighty of these negro recruits beyond the number for which he accounted. Our Governor and some of our local military officers have been engaged in ferreting out all the negro recruits from Kentucky, as far as practicable; and I am informed they are having success to an extent that will demonstrate an enormous swindle of the Government by some of its military officers. They report to me, more than eight hundred negroes recruited from my county, and only two hundred and five credited to it.

These prowling bands of negroes, sometimes with white officers more vicious and degraded than themselves, and often without any white man, moved actively over the country, from house to house, with musket and bayonet, indulging in disorderly excesses, extorting whisky with presented arms, forcing white men, by threats of violence, to drink and tip glasses with them, and defenseless women to cook for and wait upon them at table, and shouting at and insulting white persons of both sexes who were traveling the highways saying nothing and offering them no insult. For these and other breaches of military discipline and the Articles of War, their superior officers ought to have had them and their immediate commanders arraigned before a court-martial, and some of the most guilty executed as an example to the others. But those officers were so perverted by base objects as to give a license to such revolting disorders; and those who committed them soon learned that not reprobation and punishment, but immunity and reward, awaited them for any assault upon slave property and every outrage upon its owners.

Last spring and summer, in a large portion of the State, many of its best citizens were pounced upon by military squads, and arrested without warrant, or charge, or pretext, or explanation; and it could not have been otherwise, because they had committed no crime, no offense, except to oppose the policy and measures of the party in power. The judgment of the nation would yet blast a party which would avow a difference of political opinion to be a crime, and try and punish it by arbitrary arrests, spurious military courts, usurped power, and despotic will. To make specific charges that had no foundation in truth was too desperate and dangerous a game; but as the punishment of innocent men was resolved upon for vengeance, example, and intimidation, it was determined, as it would be without guilt, so it must be without charge. Freedom from arrest except upon a warrant charging an offense and sued out upon oath and tried by jury according to the course of the common law, is guaranteed by express provisions of the Constitution to all persons not in the military or naval service of the United States; but that common and ruthless assassin of constitutional limitations and of the rights and liberties of the people, military necessity, was the only authority to do the atrocious work, and was of course summoned to strike down those great principles.

Most of the men thus arrested were hurried off to military headquarters at Louisville, and there thrown into close prison. In vain they demanded the charges against themselves, or to know what offenses they had committed, or what law they had violated, and to be confronted with their accusers and the witnesses against them. Their cases were decided without trial, in secret places, when they were not present, and upon ex parte statements, and punishment by sentence of exile to distant States, or across the rebel lines, and by other modes unknown to the law, was awarded against them. Attempts were made to extort money from them generally. Some of them were discharged after being held a considerable time in prison, and others had sentences of exile to remote localities commuted to nearer and more agreeable places; but these results were almost invariably wrought by the magic power of money. General intimidation and money were the ends sought by these lawless and oppressive proceedings, and many of their victims were forced to pay from $500 to $1,500; and a large amount of spoils, wrung from innocent and outraged men, was said to be divided among several conspirators. Certain it is that men in the military service of the United States for no other legitimate purpose than to uphold the Constitution and laws and the rights and liberties of the people, have continuously outraged them by the false accusation, arbitrary arrest, despotic punishment, and shameless plunder of a large part to break the spirit and debase and enslave the whole.

The military authority in that State has prostrated the freedom and independence of the press within it by forbidding the newspapers to publish, not matter of a nature to give aid and comfort to the rebellion, but from even a narrative of its own administration. The Lexington Observer and Reporter, the Danville Tribune, and other papers which opposed secession and rebellion, and sustained the appropriation of men and money to put them down, it suppressed by interdicting their publishers from bringing into the State paper and other necessary material. Their only offense was opposition to the reelection of Mr. Lincoln. For the same cause, the Cincinnati Enquirer, the Columbus Crisis, the Chicago Times, and other prints, were excluded from the State by military orders, sustained by a rigorous military surveillance. These papers were contraband of war in Kentucky, but were allowed a free circulation in the other loyal States. The object was to cut off from the people of that State all the channels of information relating to public affairs that did not carry streams, clear or foul, flowing for the reelection of Mr. Lincoln.

A favorite and frequent mode of exhibiting its power in Kentucky by the military authority was to press horses for the service. This would frequently break out as an epidemic disease, and though its causes could not always be detected, they could sometimes. The approach of a general election always engendered two or three of those epidemics at short intervals between them; and when favorites of the military authorities had large contracts with the Government for the delivery of horses this epidemic would appear extensively in their localities in very active form. Frequently on court, gala, church, and other public days, when large numbers of the people, men and women, had assembled at the county towns and other public places, it would suddenly manifest itself in a very virulent form without any premonition. About noon all the roads leading out would be picketed to prevent egress, and the press-gangs would sweep actively along every street and highway. All the horses hitched to carriages, buggies, wagons, or under saddle would be seized, which would bring up the whole multitude, male and female, men, women, and children, in a general state of excitement, confusion, and alarm; restoration would be made to the few avowed Lincolnites, and the others would be told, "You shall have a certificate for your horses, payable at the end of the war, on proving your loyalty;" or, "The forces are going on a raid, and when they return your horses will be restored to you." Then, again, the press-gang would be started out widely through the country, and they would seize horses at work in the fields, on the highways, and at the most conspicuous places, proclaiming that the disloyal were to have no compensation, but only the loyal at the close of the war, on proving their loyalty. The country would become excited and apprehensive. Then comes along the contractor or his agents, and the farmers, in the doubt and perplexity intentionally produced by this disorderly and oppressive conduct of the military authorities, would sell their horses to contractors who were favorites, if not partners, with those officers, for something like half value. There were always enough of minions of power besides the military to put in circulation that this treatment was only for the disloyal, and the sure mode to get immunity from it was to become loyal; and their standard of loyalty was, first, to support all Mr. Lincoln's measures, and afterwards to vote for his reelection. This was a part of the administrative policy in Kentucky, the Procrustes's bed to bring men to the proper political standard.

Kentucky has a large and important trade with Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, and other northeastern States; and it is carried on not only by merchants and traders, but, to Ohio particularly, by farmers also. The aggregate of this trade amounts to many millions annually, and there are a great number of men engaged in it. To Cincinnati alone thousands of the farmers of Kentucky carry traffic to get their own supplies. The military authorities saw the power that they might acquire by seizing upon the trade between Kentucky and other States, and they determined to pervert it to purposes of party corruption, oppression for political opinion, and enriching their friends and favorites. They made an order that no person in Kentucky should buy, sell, or barter out of the State, without a written permission, to be signed by a board of trade to be appointed by itself. They refused to appoint fair and responsible men, men of good position, property, and integrity, to these boards; and they studiously sought out extreme political partisans, many of dishonest lives or doubtful character, who never had any industry or business, or were incapable of conducting it successfully; insolvents who could make no reparation for damages resulting from their abuse of power, and whose mendacity was paralleled by their ignorance; men better fitted to be dealt with under the vagrant laws than to dispose of the high questions of loyalty and constitutional liberty, and of political economy and commerce among the States. Even foreigners, speaking diverse languages and knowing but little of ours, were upon these boards of trade. Such of them as had any solvency and respectability were often engaged in business themselves, or had relatives and friends that were; and their interests were to be promoted by withholding permits to trade from other men, and thus excluding competition. It is charged and believed that at many points certain parties, by selling these permits to trade, realized large sums of money.

The managers of railroads and the officers of boats received stringent orders to transport no goods, or other property, unless the owners had a trade permit from one of these boards; and a strict military patrol was established to seize every article that was being moved without that sanction. These boards of trade were intended to adopt, and the men appointed to them were only equal to adopt, but a single rule to guide their action: "Is the applicant for a permit in favor of Mr. Lincoln's reelection?" Their small and benighted intellects, their purchased and groveling souls could not appreciate or comprehend any other standard of loyalty. Their touchstone, their universal question was, "Who do you support for the Presidency?" and if "McClellan" was the reply, then the rejoinder was, "You are disloyal and can get no permit to trade." Some boards inquired what State or county officers the applicant had voted for at the previous election, and if he answered for some candidate who was not a supporter of Mr. Lincoln a permit was inflexibly withheld from him. But when applicants would agree to sell out their principles and innate sense of duty and vote for the reelection of Lincoln, and thus barter away true loyalty to their country, they received therefor the largest permits to trade.

In a great many instances, before the boards of trade were inaugurated, the local provost marshals would keep watch upon the highways leading to commercial points on the Ohio river to intercept farmers who had loaded two-horse wagons with their limited surplus products to barter for their family supplies; and would arrest them in their humble, but to them important adventures. They would inform the farmer that he was engaged in a contraband trade and had forfeited his property to the Government; but would end the imbroglia by taking his loading at half value, and themselves go to market, make the sale, and pocket the produce. In other cases the provost marshals would inform farmers who wished to go on these trading expeditions that they were forbidden, without their permits, and thus by falsehood and fraud sell their spurious licenses to honest and uninformed men.

The people of Kentucky made prompt and earnest protest to the proper authorities against these oppressive and nefarious restrictions upon their legitimate commerce; but they were heeded not. Fortunately for them there were other parties nearly as deeply interested in it as themselves; the people of Ohio, and particularly of Cincinnati. Our neighbors of that free State at length rose in revolt against this great iniquity. The voice of Cincinnati came up in general and earnest protest, and the President then swept it away; but not until it had brought heavy loss to many of the best and most loyal men of our State.

But the most hardy and profligate attempt of the military authorities in Kentucky and their fellow-conspirators to oppress and plunder the people of that State, and to enrich themselves, was a scheme put on foot by them to coerce all the feeders of hogs last fall to sell to their agents at from three to four dollars per hundred less than the market price. They assumed to take the possession and control of all the slaughter and packing-houses in the State. One firm applied to them to know for what sum of money they would allow him to kill and pack; they inquired of him the number, and when he answered thirty thousand, they replied three dollars the hog. He rejoined, "That is rather steep;" to which they said, "That is the best we can do;" and the matter was dropped. These confederates divided the State into six or eight districts, appointed a principal agent for each district, and he employed sub-agents in each one to purchase all the hogs in it. They established the prices at seven dollars and fifty cents and eight dollars per hundred, according to quality, when hogs were selling at that time at Cincinnati at over eleven dollars per hundred. The conductors of railroads and boats received stringent military orders that no hogs were to be carried but upon their order. They laid an embargo upon all the packing-houses in the State, except one or two, which they took possession of, and made arrangements to operate them on their own account. They caused it to be announced all over the State that the Government wanted all the hogs in it, and that they were purchasing and intended to kill and pack for the Government. When any of these daring swindlers were told by feeders that they would not sell to them, their answer was, We will pull down your pens and drive all your hogs, except what are necessary for the consumption of your families, to our slaughter-houses, and give you a certificate to be paid for them by our prices at the close of the war, upon proving yourselves to be loyal. You have the option to take our prices in money when we get the hogs, or certificates at the same prices to be received by you when peace is made, upon proof of your loyalty. They, by this fraud and intimidation, carried out by the basest prostitution of military authority, were enabled to purchase a great many hogs at these low rates before they could be arrested in this gigantic swindle.

The people of Kentucky remonstrated against it promptly and earnestly, though unavailingly; but mutual interest again brought their neighbors of Cincinnati to the rescue before they had suffered long. One hundred thousand hogs of Kentucky were about to be diverted from their natural market, the packing-houses of Cincinnati, and their owners, and her board of trade also, assaulted this plundering conspiracy against a great interest of the two States. But the anticipated enormous profit on that number of hogs, and as many more that would be driven to Louisville, had so excited the imaginations of the conspirators with the vision of sudden wealth that they made great efforts to carry their iniquitous scheme into full effect. Major Simonds, then stationed at Louisville, was the adjutant to direct the execution of this grand piece of military strategy, and he was resolved, if possible, to secure its large fruits to himself and his fellow-conspirators. He withstood all the earnest appeals made to him to cancel it; but Colonel Killeburne, then at Cincinnati, was applied to, and issued a military order to that effect. The confederates strove hard to have this proper and just order rescinded by a still higher military authority, but without success; and though baffled in the main, they struggled desperately to make their iniquity as profitable as possible. A man of intelligence and character, who was Mr. Lincoln's supporter, and voted for him, informed me that he got a copy of Colonel Killeburne's order of rescission and carried it to Major Simonds at Louisville, and thus coerced him to annul his order organizing this grand scheme of extortion; and, procuring a copy of the annulling order, he went to the telegraph office in Louisville to have it dispatched to Cincinnati. But he found that the gallant Major Simonds, like an experienced and capable commander in that mode of warfare, had anticipated him, and laid an embargo on the wires for the transmission of any news of the overthrow of the monopoly. The trader had the ready wit to cross the river into Indiana, and sent his dispatch from Jeffersonville. So daring, wily, and potent have villains become in this day of our country's calamity, that they could not be arrested in this scheme to plunder two States without great and persevering efforts, and not until they had robbed honest and loyal men of many thousands, which they had hoped in a few days to augment to hundreds of thousands.

The day before the late presidential election, being county court day in my county, the McClellan and Lincoln parties both held meetings of their friends in Paris. Each party had in attendance their speakers. General Burbridge, with his suite, attended the Lincoln meeting. About two o'clock, when the McClellan meeting was under full operation, and the Lincoln meeting was about to organize in front of the court-house, a messenger proceeded to the hall, near a quarter of a mile off, where the McClellan meeting was being held, shouting that the rebels had just made a raid into town. At the same time the military had picketed every street leading out, and squads of soldiers were scouring the public square and the whole town, pressing every horse belonging to a McClellan man that they could lay hands upon; while if a horse belonging to a Lincolnite was seized he was restored to the owner on his declaring his loyalty to the President, and his purpose to vote for his reelection. The body of the crowd were the supporters of McClellan, and their meeting was broken up, as was intended, by these military outrages; while the Lincoln meeting proceeded without being disturbed, but receiving a large accession of spectators by the dispersion of the other. Four speeches were made in the Lincoln meeting, the last by General Burbridge, in these words:

"Fellow-citizens: I am no politician. I am no speaker. You all know me. I am a fighting man. But I can tell what I am for; I am for Lincoln if he was the worst man in the world. I would be for him because he was elected by the people. You all want pay for your negroes, horses, &c.; and I will say to you, mind how you take care of your record; all who voted for Lincoln will be paid for them at the end of the war; but, by God! mind how you take care of your record! The vouchers will pass through my hand; not a damned cent will you get unless your record is clear. I understand there is some objection as to my manner of treating guerrillas. I will speak it out. Ah! I see before me a citizen who was reported killed this morning; but I am happy he is alive. Had it been so, by God! I had intended to have taken four of the best citizens of the county, those who have sons in the confederate army, and have hung them to-day. And I say now, by God! [pointing and looking around over the crowd] mind how you act, or some of you will be hung before to-morrow night. I intend to take five thousand horses next week. There are but two parties to this war, one for us and the other against us; and no man shall stay in the State after the election who is against us. Mind how you make out your record!"

I have known General Burbridge from his early boyhood. I knew his parents. His father was a patriot, a man of honor, and a gentleman. His mother was a cultivated and true and noble specimen of the highest order of the American woman. From such a parentage the character of General Burbridge received its early impress. He was gentle, modest, temperate, brave, and humane, and true to friend, principle, and country. He was reared in Mr. Clay's school of politics, and was faithful to his illustrious leader and the great principles which he taught. He was an educated man and soldier; and at the beginning of the rebellion he drew his sword for his country, only to assert and maintain "the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was." This noble and true sentiment possessed and ruled him in all his conversations and actions for the first two years of his military service. In an evil hour he surrendered himself to the counsels and control of malignant and bad men. His subsequent abuse of power is his misfortune, their crime.

General John B. Houston, of Lexington, had been placed upon a McClellan electoral ticket for Kentucky. He entered actively into the canvass, and made many speeches of surpassing power. I heard several, and, as I am informed and believe, among the most extreme. In language there was no violation of decorum; and in matter, statement, and argument, nothing that transcended the truth or the freedom of speech guaranteed by the Constitution, and claimed and exercised always before this war, without question, by every American citizen, from the foundation of the Government. At the dead hour of the second night before the election his house was, by the order of General Burbridge, entered by a squad of armed soldiers, and he was aroused from what ought to have been secure slumber in his own castle, and without time to make any preparation, dragged away from his family and his home, on the general's sole order of judgment of banishment to a distant State, and forbid, on his journey of exile, to hold converse with any person under pain of instant military punishment, to be inflicted by his accompanying guard, but in what form, or to what extent, he knew not. There was no charge made against him, no explanation for this act of outrage and tyranny. The provocation was the number, ability, and effect of his speeches in favor of McClellan, and against the reelection of Mr. Lincoln. The purpose was to intimidate the supporters of McClellan and keep them away from the polls.

Such were the auspices under which Kentucky went into the presidential election. Two or three days after the election, Colonel Woolford and Lieutenant Governor Jacob were seized at their respective homes, by the order of that same military chieftain, also in the silence and gloom of the night. Both these men had commanded regiments in the United States Army, and had poured out their blood in support of the Constitution, the Union, and the enforcement of the laws. What heinous crimes had these scarred defenders of their country committed? They had committed the crime of crimes. They had made speeches against Lincoln and for McClellan. But they had moved about every day among their neighbors, in the image of their God, revealed by the light of that sun which He created, strong in their own innocence, and covered, as they thought, by the shield of the Constitution and the laws. The crime was not of their doing, but of those who planned and ordered their seizure and banishment; and therefore it was committed when darkness shrouds the world. Woolford was held for two months in ignoble imprisonment, far away from his home, and in such mystery and exclusiveness as to have produced in the minds of his friends and the public the most painful apprehensions for him. Jacob was conducted by his military escort into the mountains of Virginia, where there is a wide and wild space between the lines of the two armies, the very home of the guerrillas of both sides, and without any provision being made for him, left upon a rock to perish or survive as his fortune and fate might decide. As to both of these men, the animus of their oppressors was malignant hate, punishment, vengeance, and beside, as to Jacob, his hoped-for murder by some chance hand.

At the previous August election the office of chief justice of the court of appeals was to be filled by popular election in a district consisting of about one fourth of the State. Judge Duvall, the incumbent, was announced as a candidate for reelection. He is a man of talent, legal learning, and spotless integrity, and had filled the office for the full term of eight years. He had performed his duties with eminent ability and with unsurpassed impartiality and rectitude. He had always in his conversations denied the constitutionality and policy of secession, but at the same time expressed his belief that peaceful counsels would be a better remedy than war with which to treat the discontents of the southern States. All conceded that his judicial opinions and conduct as a member of the court were wholly uninfluenced by his belief of the impolicy of military coercion. The question of the existence of "the confederacy of the southern States" had come twice before his court for its judgment, and that tribunal decided unanimously that it had no existence, either de jure or de facto, and was to be considered as a nonentity. He had been present at every term of the court, and had never been disturbed or questioned in the exercise of the duties and powers of his office. But he was a candidate for reelection; an ultra and active friend of the Administration had become a candidate in opposition. In the early period of the rebellion that opponent had been in strong sympathy with the rebel States, and openly opposed their military coercion. He had aided in fitting out his son for service in Jeff. Davis's army; and on hearing of the first battle of Bull Run, he drove from his residence in Covington to a suburban village, as he then expressed himself to some friends, to have room to shout his exultant joy over the discomfiture of his country's arms. But he had grown worldly wise, and to Mr. Lincoln—

"Crooks the pregnant hinges of the knee,
That thrift may follow fawning."

To palm this man upon the people, who were known by ten to one to prefer Duvall, General Burbridge, the Saturday before the election, sent telegraphic dispatches to the sheriffs of every county in the district, there being over twenty, to have the name of Duvall stricken from every poll-book. This illegal and tyrannical order was obeyed by many of the sheriffs, but was condemned by some, as it should have been by all, and Duvall was voted for in some of the counties. The name of another man, of eminent ability, legal learning, and virtue, was, without his consent, attempted to be placed before the voters of the district within thirty-six hours before the election; and although this could be effected in but about half the district, yet so strong was its opposition to the Administration candidate that he was defeated, receiving less than one eighth of its vote. The purpose and the hope was to make no formal opposition to the people voting for Duvall until it would be too late to put another candidate before the district, and then to force the withdrawal of his name by the order of the commanding general, and thus to smuggle an unfit and obnoxious man into the highest court of the State. But upon this nefarious scheme a people still free put their veto.

Duvall, nor Houston, nor Woolford, nor Jacob, had committed no crime or offense, civil or military; they had violated no law. Against two of them there was no charge, and against the other two the pretended charges were so futile and absurd as to show the proceedings against them to be equally lawless and tyrannical. Every American citizen has a perfect constitutional right to oppose the pending and all wars in which the Government may engage; and he has the same right to examine and condemn all its war measures and policy, and all the acts of the Government, whether in peace or war. This right, this liberty, is part of the heritage which our fathers won by their swords, and endeavored to secure to themselves and their posterity by a written Constitution. The men who subvert it or obstruct it are usurpers and tyrants, and ought to receive the punishment due to such enemies of their country. But those true patriots opposed not the war, but the policy and measures upon which it has been conducted. I do also, from the depths of my soul, and I believe that from this source has originated the most of its tremendous cost of blood and treasure, of crime and misery.

This is but an outline of the military administration of the United States Government in the State of Kentucky, a State that adhered to the Union, and supported the Government in its darkest days of peril and trial, and through all its varying fortunes; that has sent about one half of her military population to "the harvest of death," to uphold "Union and liberty" in the inviolability of the Constitution and enforcement of the laws alike everywhere in loyal and rebel States, upon the governments and armies and adherents of both Abraham Lincoln and Jeff. Davis. That is the "national life" which she entered into this war to preserve. That is her criterion of all loyalty.

For a more precise understanding of the inflections of the Constitution, and of the wrongs and oppressions of the people of Kentucky by the Federal Government, I will here group some of the principles of the instrument which creates that Government:

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States."

"Congress shall have power" "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or officer thereof."

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

"The judicial power of the United States, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

"No bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed."

"No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

"Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

"The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State," &c.

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed," &c.

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

"A well-regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people, to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed."

"No soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law."

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation."

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

"The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people."

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

"This Constitution, and laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

"The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution," &c.

"The President," * * * "before he enter on the execution of his office, shall take the following oath or affirmation:

"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

These provisions are a synopsis of the Constitution, which embody its most essential principles and its sanctions. It, and the laws of Congress made in pursuance of it, are the supreme law of the United States, and of all the States. Observance of it at all times, in peace or war, is the duty, the fealty, of every citizen of the United States. All the officers of the Federal and State governments take an oath to support it, that of the President being that "he will, to the best of his ability, preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States." This Constitution, and the laws passed in pursuance of it, are "the national life," and those who infract them are destroying that national life. State constitutions and laws, national law, and all other law in conflict with the Constitution and laws of Congress, fall before their paramount authority. Their operation is perennial, and there is no power short of revolution that can subvert, impair, modify, or suspend them. This done, or attempted, with force, by any of the departments or officers, civil or military, of the United States, would be treasonable. There is not a principle comprehended in this synopsis of the Constitution that has not been violated by the officers, civil and military, of the Federal Government during this war, many of them with appalling frequency, and each time by trampling under foot some liberty of the citizen and cruelly oppressing him. A far less amount of usurpation and tyranny by those invested with powers of government has in Europe caused the oppressed people to rise in their strength and overthrow thrones and dynasties; and if at this day attempted in any country on that continent but Russia would produce another regicide and revolution.

How can it be accounted for that our people, so intelligent, lately so free and so devoted to their liberties, should look upon such strange and oppressive freaks of power with apathy, with stolidity? Several forces have operated to bring them to this condition of quiescence.

1. Their strong attachment to the Union and their resentment of a rebellion that was commenced to sunder it; and their hope, which has lived from day to day, that the rebellion would soon be suppressed, and then the disorders and oppressions inaugurated by the men in power, on the pretext of saving the "national life," would cease, and law, order, and liberty would again resume their sway.

2. The popular form of our Government, and the consequent division of our people into parties which make their great demonstration at each presidential election. The people have come to tolerate but two parties, and every man who seeks to take part in public affairs is constrained to join one of them. The candidate for the Presidency of each party is its chosen leader, and receives from those who have elected him to that position a much larger and more unscrutinizing and hearty support than a hereditary monarch can obtain from a party. They give their time, their money, their energies, all that they have, to his election. If he is elected they regard themselves as the "king-makers," and their highest obligation is to sustain him whom they have put in power, and to defend his acts and administration against all comers. The party is consolidated, and is continued from one presidential election to another, its leaders, in the mean time, planning, combining, and machinating for the next one. The party is in possession of the Government, and the President must maintain a good understanding with its leaders to command the support of its lesser rank and file. Its great purpose becomes to carry the next and succeeding presidential elections. It permeates the whole country, and absorbs not only all Federal elections, but all State and local elections, and the entire concerns, political, business, and religious, of the nation. It establishes for itself a higher law than the Constitution, and requires to itself from its followers an allegiance paramount to that which they may render to the country. It allows no question of its candidates, purposes, or policies; no investigation, much less opposition, to its measures; no condemnation or exposure of the delinquencies of its men in power and office. Absolute obedience to its will, unfaltering support of its candidates, defense of all its officials, or if some of them are very great rogues, oblivion to their crimes, form the standard established by the all-dominating party, and the decree against all who will not live up to it is "Off with his head!" A party great in numbers, intellect, audacity, and wickedness, so schooled and disciplined, has not only sustained, but has been ceaselessly urging on this monstrous maladministration which I have sketched. It seems deluded and debauched with the idea that it is the party of permanence; or if not that, unreasoning and reckless, it seizes the occasion of its accidental possession of power to glut its selfish and frenzied passions, all unconscious that the mutations of human affairs will yet bring its hosts under the domination of another party now their victims, but when their masters that it will be stimulated to vengeance by the memory of cruel oppressions and find the amplest warrant for its indulgence in the usurped powers and diabolical precedents with which the present Administration teems from day to day.

3. Another cause of the apparent deadness of the country to its strange and fearful condition is the potency of the almost fabulous amount of patronage wielded by the President in a million civil and military offices, the incumbents all holding their places at his will, and his annual disbursement of more than one thousand million dollars. Such a vast patronage, with the enormous influence created by it, cannot be contemplated by an intelligent mind without amazement and fearful apprehension for the safety of constitutional government and popular liberty. This great fountain of honor, profit, and power, is distributed into a countless number of streams, of every size, which are carried widely over the United States, but irrigate and fertilize only for those who support the President and the party. Each recipient has more or less of friends and retainers whom he enlists in the cause of his patron. Thus a vast army of spoilsmen, who are to stand or fall with the party and its chief, are organized and paid. These are among the most unscrupulous and active supporters of the Administration, and notwithstanding its flagitious dereliction to all its high trusts, they are eternally vigilant to denounce and intimidate all opposition, and would make its power permanent if they could.

4. Another potent cause that keeps down the upheaving of the people against their oppressors is the possession and control by the Administration and its party of the whole military power of the United States, and all the States, regular Army, volunteers, and State militia, and the disarming of all the people beside.

The framers of the Constitution contemplated and provided for but two kinds of military land forces, the regular Army and the militia of the States, to be mustered into the service of the United States as occasion might require. Congress is expressly empowered "to raise and support armies." I concede that the mode may be by ordinary enlistment, or by the acceptance of organized corps of volunteers, but I controvert the position that Congress has the power to organize the whole military population of each State, and conscript, or authorize the President to conscript, the whole or such portions of it as he may will. Congress has no power to draft or conscript soldiers in executing the power to raise armies. That was one mode of detailing State militia for military service, but not of raising regular armies, when the Constitution was adopted. Congress is empowered by the Constitution—

"To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

If it had been intended to confer on Congress the power to draft or conscript the military population of the United States at its discretion and will, a power to call forth the militia for these purposes would have been superfluous. Congress is also vested with power—

"To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

In the United States, the militia is the soldiery of the States, the regular Army and volunteers that of the Federal Government. The existence and organized continuance of this State soldiery is provided for by the Constitution; and Congress is clothed with the power to require its service "to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." It cannot be supposed that when the framers of the Constitution empowered Congress "to raise armies" without any limitation, they intended to confer a power that would enable it at will to annihilate the militia, the only military force of the States. That would be the inevitable sequence if Congress could draft or conscript men without any limitation to raise armies; but it would not be, if the modes of raising armies by Congress were restricted to receiving enlistments and volunteers. Those processes would be too slow ever to annihilate the militia of a State by exhausting its military population. Enlistments and volunteering were the only modes of raising armies practiced or known when the Constitution was adopted; and as they might sometimes prove too slow for the exigencies of the Government, the provision was introduced empowering Congress to call forth the militia of the States "to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

But Congress has assumed, usurped, the power to pass a law to organize into one class the whole military population of the United States, and to authorize the President to draft from it, from time to time, such parts, or the whole, as he might will. This annihilates by congressional legislation the militia of the States and subverts their legitimate military force that duty would require and the Constitution would authorize to be used for the protection of their own government and their reserved rights, even against the Government of the United States. And to consummate the policy of overthrowing the entire reserved rights, powers, and sovereignty of the State of Kentucky, and the border slave States, during the continuance of the war at least, all men who would not sustain the war policy and measures of the President, have had their houses to be entered by soldiers, and their arms to be taken therefrom, and also from their persons. Thus it is that this provision of the Constitution becomes a dead letter:

"A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed."

This is a most invaluable liberty guaranteed to every American citizen. A people in the full enjoyment of the right of trial by jury, and all armed, are free, and cannot be reduced to slavery. In our country, happily, the people are generally divided into opposing political parties of something like proximate numbers. All, whether belonging to the party in power or the opposition, alike have the constitutional right to keep and bear arms. The free exercise of this right is indispensable to the safety of those in opposition, and it is equally necessary to the preservation of the liberties of all. It is impossible that half, or any great proportion of the people of a country, should be enslaved without that soon becoming the fate of the whole. That party which preserves its own liberties necessarily achieves the same for the entire nation. If the present opposition had been fully armed it would have held in check those in power, constrained them to an observance of the Constitution and laws, and prevented those wrongs and oppressions which have made their own Government the scourge of so many of our people. It would have compelled a moderation, justice, and magnanimity in the prosecution of this war that would have brought back the rebels with the perfect conviction that the old Union and Government was far better for them than any other they could possibly obtain. Why was that opposition disarmed? A just, patriotic, and constitutional administration of the Government would never attempt to subvert the right of the opposition, of all the people, to keep and bear arms. It is a right formidable only to tyrants, usurpers, and oppressors.

Story, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, says:

"The right of the citizens to keep and bear arms has justly been considered as the palladium of the liberties of a republic, since it offers a strong moral check against the usurpation and arbitrary power of rulers; and will, generally, even if these are successful in the first instance, enable the people to resist and triumph over them."

Chancellor Kent, on a large survey of the whole subject of the liberty of the press, not only as to the Government and its measures, but as to all the concerns of society, takes this strong position:

"It has become a constitutional principle in this country that every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that right, and that no law can rightfully be passed to restrain or abridge the freedom of the press."

The only responsibility to which those who abuse that right can be held is by proceeding against them in court for libel upon some person. As to the measures of Government this freedom is without limit and can be held to no responsibility. By a provision of the Constitution, already quoted, all military or other arbitrary arrests are prohibited. No citizen can be deprived of his liberty except upon a warrant charging against him the commission of a crime or offense defined by law, sued out upon probable cause, from a magistrate empowered by law, and supported by oath. If any person be arrested even in this formal mode, the Constitution and the law allow him as his right to apply at once to the courts, or judges, for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the person detaining him, commanding him to produce before the court or judge the body of the prisoner, with the day and cause of his caption and detention, to do, submit to, and receive whatsoever the judge or court awarding the writ shall consider in that behalf. If the imprisonment is not authorized by law, the prisoner is then and there discharged, and goes forth from his prison-house a free man. If his detention is by authority of law, he is held for trial by a civil court, should a grand jury prefer an indictment or presentment against him, and is then entitled "to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State or district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

I have sketched in part American liberty and some of the bulwarks built up by our fathers for its protection and perpetuity. They had been, centuries before, embodied by our British ancestors in Magna Charta; and ages prior to that era were born in herculean vigor as part of the Anglo-Saxon common law. They were the first inspirations of the irrepressible and indestructible principle of liberty implanted by divinity in the soul of man which had been given to the world since the republican days of Rome. If humanity should prove true to them and to itself they will never perish, but be rendered into every language to disenthral all nations and regenerate them as often as they relapse into slavery. Though these great principles, in our day and country, have been struck down by partricial hands that should have defended them, their fall is but for a time; their immortal truth and energy will sooner or later triumph over all their enemies, and vindicate the memory of the great men who commended them to the acceptance of the world by making them parts of our Constitution.

But the most important of these liberties, and without which all the others would fail, is the trial by jury in criminal cases. Justice Story says truly:

"It was from very early times insisted on by our ancestors in the parent country as the great bulwark of their civil and political liberties, and watched with unceasing jealousy and solicitude." * * * "The great object of a trial by jury in criminal cases is to guard against a spirit of oppression and tyranny on the part of rulers, and against a spirit of violence and vindictiveness on the part of the people. Indeed, it is often more important to guard against the latter than the former. The sympathies of all mankind are enlisted against the revenge and fury of a single despot, and every attempt will be made to screen his victims. But how difficult is it to escape from the vengeance of an indignant people roused into hatred by unfounded calumnies, or stimulated to cruelty by bitter political enmities or unfounded jealousies. The appeal for safety can, under such circumstances, scarcely be made by innocence in any other form than by the severe control of courts of justice, and by the firm and impartial verdict of a jury sworn to do right, and guided solely by legal evidence and a sense of duty. In such a course there is a double security against the prejudices of judges, and against the passions of the multitude who may demand their victim with a clamorous precipitancy. So long as this palladium remains sacred and inviolable the liberties of a free Government cannot wholly fall."

That great English jurist, Justice Blackstone, pays this warm and splendid tribute to the trial by jury in England, in referring to the eulogy of Montesquieu on English liberty, and his regretful concession that it too must perish:

"A celebrated French writer, who concludes that because Rome, Sparta, and Carthage have lost their liberties, therefore those of England in time must perish, should have recollected that Rome, Sparta, and Carthage, at the time when their liberties were lost, were strangers to the trial by jury."

All the truest and most enlightened friends of human rights, the world over, speak in similar terms of the value of the trial by jury. If anything more were wanted to fix indeluctably in the American mind and heart the spirit to preserve it, our terrible experience in this war of the oppressions resulting from its overthrow and the substitution of that destroying agency of all liberty, that alien monster to our system of civil government, the court-martial, will surely supply it.

On the provision that "private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation," Justice Story remarks:

"This is an affirmation of a great doctrine established by the common law for the protection of private property. It is founded in natural equity, and is laid down by jurists as a principle of universal law. Indeed, in a free Government almost all other rights would become utterly worthless if the Government possessed an uncontrollable power over the private fortune of every citizen. One of the fundamental objects of every good Government must be the due administration of justice; and how vain it would be to speak of such an administration when all property is subject to the will or caprice of the Legislature and the rulers."

This great principle has been often violated in many States by the United States authorities during this war; and in Kentucky the extent and enormity of its infractions stand unequalled in all the annals of despotism. But the great rights and liberties of the people, which are the only ends and objects of legitimate government, and to which our fathers attempted to give permanent existence and inviolability in our country by incorporating them in the Constitution as part of the supreme law, which also requires all Federal and State officers to take an oath to support them, have been disregarded and outraged by this Administration with a wickedness and audacity never before approached in any free country in the so early morning of its life. In executing measures and a policy to overthrow slavery; to subjugate not only the slave States, but all the people of every State who opposed that policy and those measures; and to aggrandize, enrich, and perpetuate the power of their party, thus making war upon the Constitution and the liberties of the people, a large, doubtless the largest portion, of the public debt has been incurred. I recognize no obligation on the part of the people to pay that portion of the public debt; and when the war is over, as I hope it soon will be, and the frenzy produced by it has passed away, and given place to calm reason; when the country has come back to coin, the medium of the world, and the only constitutional money; when the public debt will exceed $5,000,000,000, and its annual interest $300,000,000; and the expenditures for the Army, Navy, and other public service will be $300,000,000 more, the man is mad who expects the people to pay that large portion of the public debt created in derogation of the Constitution. The United States owe the State of Kentucky this day for slaves, horses, and military supplies, the destruction of property, the occupation and waste of houses, farms, and fields, hundreds of millions of dollars; and before she is burdened with additional taxes it would be more just and decent to pay off that debt, or at least a portion of it. The Government has repudiated and is daily repudiating untold millions of debt it owes to the people of the United States. The people do not yet belong to the Government, nor to the holders of a spurious public debt; but whenever they are taxed to the amount of $600,000,000 annually to keep up the Government, and to pay accruing interest to its bond-holders, they and all they have will belong to both Government and bond-holders. They will never be able to pay the principal, and all they can make and save by drudging labor and severe economy would be required annually to pay tribute to their masters for indefinite ages. That is a slavery to which they will not submit.

Our system of Federal and State governments is the happiest combination for the freedom of the people and the power of the nation that has ever been conceived by man. Its principles and compromises were adjusted to those ends by great men, instructed by the ripest experience, animated by the purest and most enlarged patriotism, upon profound deliberation. The succeeding generations have shown no ability to improve them. To take charge of and preserve this combined organization of liberty and power demanded of the people an extraordinary amount of intelligence, virtue, courage, and patriotism. Washington and his compatriots were ever solicitous and exerting themselves to educate and bring up their countrymen to that high standard; while their groveling successors have been resorting to every unauthorized and foul means to break their free and proud spirit, to degrade their patriotism to a mercenary and base partisanship, to inure them to the exercise of arbitrary power by daily assaults on their rights, and thus to fit and prepare them to take passively and permanently the yoke of a military despotism. Our Government and Union were organized for peace and its triumphs, not for war or conquest, or the practical absolutism of vast armies. Its founders did not anticipate, and therefore did not organize, any special powers to meet such an emergency as this great rebellion. They refused to make a provision in the Constitution to coerce States, and from what was said on that particular subject in debate in the Convention and contemporaneous expositions, it is clear that they never contemplated that remedy for any State disorder. They left with the people and States respectively all powers not delegated by the language of the Constitution to the Federal Government. The States have the exclusive authority over their domestic institutions and local affairs. The General Government was built upon the States, and, with the forethought that if from any cause it should be overthrown, they and their governments should remain organized, and should resume all the sovereignty and rights which they might delegate to the Federal Government. They established plain limitations and restrictions upon the Government which they formed, and built up in the Constitution as part of it a great tribunal of law and reason, and having placed it high above the conflicts and passions of party, clothed it with the august functions of holding the Government itself to its constitutional moorings, confining its departments and officers within the pale of their powers, and adjudging the validity of the constitutions and laws of all the States. Those sages, devoted to liberty and peace, did not make any provision for the decision of questions or the redress of wrongs by the sword; but provided that all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; controversies to which the United States shall be a party; controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, should be decided by the United States courts. All other questions and wrongs were left to be determined by the sovereign people in national convention.

The State governments were intended to uphold and support the General Government in the possession and exercise of all the powers conferred on it by the Constitution, and at the same time to be the especial defenders of the States respectively and of their people, in the possession of all powers not delegated by the language of the Constitution to the Federal Government. Yet the most of the State governments have not only abandoned their great and particular trust, but have betrayed their constituents by bringing all their power to aid those who hold the United States Government to subvert all States rights and authority. The convention of Governors at Altoona was a treasonable conclave, not only against the Constitution and liberties of the American people, but also against the States.

The passion and degeneracy of the day has not only struck the Governors and governments of the States, the Executive of the United States, and the two Houses of Congress, but what is, if possible, more deplorable, also the chiefest hope of the nation, the Supreme Court, the great power that was designed to give order, coherence, stability, and interpretation of our complex system of Federal and State governments. That court should be composed of men of the most eminent judicial statesmanship, with immovable fidelity to the Constitution as their crowning qualification. But it has among its present members doctrinaires, whose sublimated philanthropy and appreciation of human rights furnish them with a higher law than the Constitution, and others, who are absorbed and awed by the popular frenzy produced by this great rebellion. The Constitution provides:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State," &c.

In the face of this positive prohibition, Congress formed the State of West Virginia, exclusively within the boundary and jurisdiction of the State of Virginia; and that court has decided West Virginia to be a State in the Union. To countenance and sustain the unnatural and futile attempt to bring up the negro to a community of civil, political, and social rights with the white race that is now being made over the country with frantic energy, that court has recently shocked the sentiment of the nation by introducing to the bar of that court two negroes, denominated lawyers, who had no business in it.

National law does not attempt to regulate and control civil war, other than that all its battles and military operations shall conform to the humane modes of all modern war. Outside of this it establishes no principles, nor does it define any of the rights of the parties to such a war. Every nation that is so unfortunate as to have a civil war in its bosom, except as to the matter of military operations, carries it on according to the will of the parties to it, uninstructed and unrestrained by national law. If that law were not thus silent, not it, but our Constitution would give the rule. It provides for all the forms and the whole subject of civil war. In addition to the powers to lay and collect taxes, it has these provisions:

"The Congress shall have power" "to raise and support armies," &c.; "to provide and maintain a Navy;" "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic violence."

These are all the provisions of the Constitution which bear upon the subject of civil war in any form. There is no other law applicable to them in our country. They establish legislative powers which belong only to Congress. They could not be conferred upon or shared with the President, as constitutional powers, without an express provision to that effect. All the authority which he can rightfully exercise in relation to the matters embodied in those provisions he derives from the laws of Congress, and is bound by their requirements; and if those laws should be repealed he would be left without any power over their subjects. Congress alone has power to declare war, and everybody concedes that the war which Congress is empowered thus to make is war against a foreign nation. That court has so ruled in three prize cases. That is the only war referred to in the Constitution by that term. Such a war, a war between foreign nations, only carries with it belligerent rights, both on land and on sea; but a conflict of arms, a war, if you please, to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, repel invasions, or to quell domestic violence in a State, is a domestic trouble—an internal war—in which the laws of nations regulating belligerent rights have no application. They can never apply until the insurgents have established their independence, and become in fact a foreign nation. Until that consummation the insurgents are invested with no belligerent rights, and are liable to be prosecuted and punished as criminals under the municipal laws. While they have arms in their hands they may be pressed and pursued with our whole military and naval power; they may be shot down in battle, held as captives, and their resources may be cut up and crippled by all the modes known to civilized warfare; but neither they nor the United States have any belligerent rights, as they are known and recognized by the laws of nations. Nor are insurgents or rebels of such a hybrid nature that they are subject to the laws of nations which regulate the rights and responsibilities of independent nations at war with each other, and at the same time to the punishment denounced by the civil and military laws of the United States as her citizens for their crimes. To make them at the same time subject to two codes generally discordant and often conflicting would be eminently absurd, and without any warrant in the Constitution. If States are declared by a law of Congress and the proclamation of the President to be, and in fact are, in insurrection or rebellion against the United States—and they mean the same, a rebellion being but a great insurrection—and there be a large portion of their people opposed to the rebellion and loyal to the United States, to give belligerent rights to the United States against such States would make all the people of all the loyal States, at least, and all the people of the rebel States, alien enemies of each other, and subject to all the acts and consequences attendant upon such a condition among foreign nations. When the armies of the United States should occupy and hold the rebel States, all the property belonging to such States would vest in the United States by right of conquest. The property of every citizen of the United States resident in a rebel State, however loyal himself, situated in a loyal State, would be forfeited to the United States. A multitude of other consequences, violative of our Constitution and shocking to reason and common sense, would ensue. The Supreme Court has applied this doctrine and these consequences to this insurrection.

Mr. President, if the people of the United States were assured that their Government would continue permanently what it has been practically for three years, a military despotism reared upon a prostrate Constitution, who but paid mercenaries would defend it? Who but slaves and cravens would not rush to its overthrow? But for the general hope that when the war ceases it will be brought within the scope of its constitutional powers, and that those who have so wickedly perverted it will be ignominiously driven from their places and power, the upheaving of the still liberty-loving masses of the people would ere this have commenced.

Now, Mr. President, what inducements have the people of the United States, and particularly of Kentucky, still further to pile up the enormous weight of taxes, beneath which, although paid in a currency so greatly depreciated, they can hardly now live? The Government has had too many men and too much money in this conflict. If it had had largely less of both it would not have made such a continuous and successful war upon the Federal and State constitutions and the liberties of the American people; and more taxes will enable it to carry on that war with renewed vigor and success. The problem is not now the destruction of negro slavery, but the enslavement of the white man, and the perpetuation of the power of the party whose chosen mission has been to effect both by the vast patronage and armies intrusted to it. The first approaches its consummation; if the second is averted it must be by the great diminution of the armies and the expenditures of the Government, and the manifestation by the people of their firm purpose to maintain their Constitution and liberties, come what may! To regenerate the State governments, and the Government of the United States, its legislative, executive, and judicial departments, and to rescue the country from military despotism, is the great work, and it can be performed only by its sovereign power, the people!

Mr. HALE. I rose when the Senator was in a certain part of his speech laying down a proposition which he said everybody conceded. I simply wanted to say that I was not included in that "everybody." I do not concede any such thing. The proposition was that everybody conceded that the power given by the Constitution to Congress to declare war applied to a foreign war and not to a civil war.

Mr. DAVIS. That was not the proposition. Mr. HALE. That was the way I understood it.

Mr. DAVIS. That was not the proposition.
Mr. HALE. Will the Senator state what it was?

Mr. DAVIS. The proposition I laid down was that everybody conceded that Congress had no power to declare war except against a foreign nation.

Mr. HALE. That was not the way you read it.
Mr. DAVIS. That is the way I wrote it and read it, and that is the way it will stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, to postpone the bill indefinitely.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will now be read, and the amendments will be acted on in their order.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, amended as hereinafter set forth, namely:

That section four be amended by striking out the word "five" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ten."

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out lines eight and nine, as follows:

That section four be amended by striking out the word "five" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "ten."

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to know what that proposition, striking out five and inserting ten, is. Is it doubling some tax?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that owing to the peculiar nature of this bill, Senators ought to have before them during its consideration the law of last session, and then they can see at once what is proposed to be stricken out. This section—section four—provides for five revenue agents at large. The House of Representatives proposed to increase the number to ten. We were not satisfied of the necessity of the increase, and hence we leave it at five.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would advise that each Senator be provided with a copy of the law of last session if he wishes to understand this bill. With that law before him there will be no difficulty in understanding it.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out from line ten to line twenty, as follows:

That section eight be amended by striking out, after the words "shall appoint" the words "with the approval of the said Commissioner, one assistant assessor, who shall be a resident of the district of said assessor; and in case of a vacancy occurring in the office of assessor, by reason of death or any other cause, the assistant assessor," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "on the recommendation of the said Commissioner, one or more assistant assessors, who shall be residents of the district of said assessor; and in case of a vacancy occurring in the office of assessor, by reason of death or any other cause, the senior assistant assessor."

And in lieu of them to insert:

That section eight be amended by striking out, after the words "within each of which the," the words "Secretary of the Treasury, whenever there shall be a vacancy, or the public interest shall require, shall appoint, with the approval of the said Commissioner, one assistant assessor, who shall be a resident of the district of said assessor," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "assessor, whenever there shall be a vacancy, shall appoint, with the approval of said Commissioner, one assistant assessor, who shall be a resident of such assessment district. And hereafter no more than one assistant assessor shall be employed for any one assessment district."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines thirty-two, thirty-three, and thirty-four, as follows:

That section fourteen be amended by striking out the word "fifty" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "twenty-five."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following words in lines thirty-eight, thirty-nine, forty, and forty-one:

By inserting after the words "reasonable charges for," the word "advertising;" and by striking out all of the first proviso; and by striking out the word "further" in the second proviso.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is utterly impossible to understand this bill in this way. We might just as well pass it without acting on any of the amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senators can understand the bill by having the law of last session before them.

Mr. ANTHONY. It is impossible to follow the Clerk as he is reading the bill and refer to the act of last year.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can explain the amendments.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think if the chairman of the Committee on Finance would explain the amendments it would be better.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do so.

Mr. ANTHONY. It seems to me a most remarkable way to report a bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill was sent to us as it is, and we had to do the best we could with it in a very short time. I will state that section twenty-five fixes the compensation of collectors.

Mr. ANTHONY. I suppose that this is the portion of the bill relating to the machinery of the system.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will explain generally what the amendments as to the machinery are, we could either assent to them or not understandingly.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state that upon the Senate reassembling at seven o'clock I propose to make a detailed statement of the material changes, but as to these smaller amendments I would rather state them as we go along. This is probably a more important amendment than appears on the face of it. The twenty-fifth section of the present law fixes the compensation of collectors. Among other provisions it allows a collector a commission of one half of one per cent. on all sums collected above $400,000. That was found in very rich districts like those in the city of New York an enormous compensation, and therefore the House of Representatives put in a provision that where the amount exceeded $1,000,000 only one eighth of one per cent. should be allowed.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is there not a limit to the amount of compensation in all cases?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not in this regard. There is in regard to assessors.

Mr. ANTHONY. I thought the law provided that in no case should the compensation of collectors exceed $10,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not affect this provision. The last clause which we strike out of the item by this amendment allows them to charge for advertising, which we did not deem a proper charge.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the words just stricken out to insert as lines forty-two, forty-three, forty-four and forty-five, the following:

That section twenty-two be amended by inserting after the words "and approved by the proper" and before the word "officer," where they occur in three places in said section, the word "accounting."

Mr. HOWE. I am under the impression that this clause from line forty-two to line forty-five is transposed. I wish to call the attention of the chairman to it. It should be inserted before line thirty-five, it seems to me.

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly it is a transposition in printing. The next amendment should be inserted before this one. The printers have got it in afterward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That transposition will be made according to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HOWE. Before the vote is taken on the insertion of those lines I wish to suggest that the word "officer" should be "officers," should be plural instead of singular.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That change will be made.

Mr. HOWE. After those words have been adopted, will it be in order to modify or add to them?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be in order to insert additional words without modifying the text of this amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I do not wish to modify these words, but I wish to move a further amendment, and I suppose I may as well do it now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better first go through with the amendments of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The usual order is first to go through with the amendments of the committee before receiving amendments from individual Senators. The question is on this amendment of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is a somewhat important amendment. It is very difficult to amend a law in the way here proposed by the House of Representatives, as I shall show this evening. It almost deterred me from examining this bill. But the purpose of this amendment I will state very briefly. According to the old law the vouchers, for clerk hire, &c., were to be passed upon by "the proper officers of the Government." The question came up for decision, who were the proper officers of the Government? The Commissioner of Internal Revenue was a proper officer of the Government in one sense, and it was construed that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue should be the auditor to audit and pass on these accounts. I think myself it was a very ridiculous construction; but to remove all ambiguity we propose to insert the word "accounting," so that these vouchers must pass under the supervision of the accounting officers of the Treasury, being of course the Auditor and Comptroller.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on inserting the lines in italics, lines forty-two, forty-three, forty-four, and forty-five, preceding line thirty-five.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line one hundred and seventy-five the following:

That section forty be amended by inserting after the words "appointment of a successor" the words "Provided, That in case it shall appear to the Secretary of the Treasury that the interest of the Government shall so require, he may, by his order, direct said duties to be performed by such other one of the said deputies as he may in such order designate."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the word "amended" in line one hundred and eighty-eight the words "by inserting after the word 'distiller,' where it first occurs the words 'before distilling any spirits,'" so as to make the clause read:

That section fifty-three be amended by inserting after the word "distiller," where it first occurs, the words "before distilling any spirits;" by striking out after the word "any," and preceding the words "still or stills," the word "additional;" by striking out after the word "used," and preceding the words "shall be erected" the words "as aforesaid," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "for distilling;" and by inserting after the words "shall be erected," the words "or used."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike from the clause amending section sixty-one the following words, in lines two hundred and thirty-three, two hundred and thirty-four, two hundred and thirty-five, and two hundred and thirty-six:

Also by inserting after the word "warehouse," and before the words "and no drawback," the following words: "and the same fees shall be allowed for exports as are allowed to exporters for like services in the custom-house."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following proviso in lines two hundred and seventy-seven, two hundred and seventy-eight, two hundred and seventy-nine, two hundred and eighty, and two hundred and eighty-one:

Provided further, That no man between the ages of twenty and forty-five who is not enrolled for military duty, or regularly exempted from enrollment or draft for physical disability, shall be entitled to a license as a peddler.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert before the word "town" in line three hundred and twenty-one the words "State, county," so as to make the clause read:

Provided, however, That persons appointed by any State, county, city, township, or district, or the officers thereof, to procure the enlistment of volunteers or the substitutes to fill the quota of such State, county, city, township, or district, for the military service of the United States, shall not be considered substitute brokers: And provided further, That such person or agent shall receive no compensation except that which is given by such State, county, town, city, or district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the Senate took a recess till seven o'clock p. m.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D Session.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 72.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock p.m.

COLORED BENEVOLENT ASSOCIATION.

Mr. DIXON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider at this time Senate bill No. 451, to incorporate a Colored Union Benevolent Association in the city of Washington.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The motion can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the bill (S. No. 451) to incorporate the Colored Union Benevolent Association, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to declare Gorden Snowden, Charles Brown, James Wright, Sandy Alexander, Henry Logan, Charles Wilson, Henry Brooks, John Shorter, Joseph Shorter, and their associates and successors, a body politic and corporate by the name and title of the Colored Union Benevolent Association, located in the city of Washington, with the usual powers and privileges of a corporation. The objects of the association are to be to provide for the care and comfort of such members as shall be sick, disabled, or dependent, and of the families of such members, in cases where the proper officers of the association shall deem it expedient, and also to provide for the decent interment of such persons as may die in membership of the association, or belonging to the families of such members.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL COMPANY.

Mr. DIXON. I also ask that by unanimous consent the bill to incorporate the Continental Hotel Company of this city may be taken up and acted upon.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 764) to incorporate the Continental Hotel Company of the city of Washington. It proposes to declare Lewis Delmonico, of New York city, B. B. French, Henry D. Cooke, John W. Forney, of Washington city, Stephen Flanagan, William Overfield, junior, J. Warren Brown, of Maine, Thornton Smith, George D. Kellogg, and George Plowman, of Philadelphia, and their associates, and all persons who now or hereafter may be holders of the stock, a body politic or corporate by the style of the Continental Hotel Company, with the usual powers of a corporation, for the construction of a hotel in the city of Washington, with such supplementary buildings as may be adapted to and form part of the general plan and design thereof, and with power to furnish and equip it for the accommodation and use of any parties who may be desirous of renting and occupying it.

The capital stock of the corporation is not to exceed $2,000,000, divided into twenty thousand shares of $100 each.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the bill by adding the following as an additional section:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time hereafter alter, amend, or repeal this charter.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the further consideration of this bill be indefinitely postponed. I think that the Congress of the United States, in this the last week of the session, when there is so much business to do, could be better employed than in considering a bill to incorporate a hotel company. I therefore move that the bill be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I listened to the reading of this bill with some care, and I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to the fact that there is no provision in it requiring this incorporated company to entertain guests without reference to color. [Laughter.]

Mr. SUMNER. But the Senator knows perfectly well the rule of the common law on that subject. A hotel has no right to refuse any respectable person.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If that rule of the common law applies to hotels, it applies clearly to railroad companies with more force.

Mr. SUMNER. I know it applies to railroad companies.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But the Senator thought it necessary to detain the business of the country in making such a provision applicable to railroad companies, and I thought he had overlooked it in this bill.

Mr. SUMNER. It was because the occasion had occurred with regard to the railroad company. That company, it is notorious, has persevered in violating the law.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and had agreed to other amendments of the Senate to the said bill, with amendments, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KASSON, Mr. H. WINTER DAVIS, and Mr. MALLORY, managers at the same on its part.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate to the said bill; and

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate thereto, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President; and

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. HARRIS, and Mr. NESMITH.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 82) in relation to the distribution of books and documents; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had now better proceed with the business regularly in order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. There is not a quorum.

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, there is.

Mr. HOWE. There is not a quorum here, I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and there is a private bill which has been lying on my table for some time, which has passed the House, which I should like to take up and act upon now.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I give way to the Senator, there are others here that have similar requests to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order of business is called for, and no other business can be entertained except by unanimous consent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to appeal to the Senator from Ohio to allow at least half an hour of the evening sessions to private bills and little matters of that sort.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better proceed with the regular order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If all the rest of the time is to be given to public measures, we shall not be able to act on private bills at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order being called for, the Chair can entertain no motion except to postpone it, and the Senate will resume, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill, beginning at page 14, line three hundred and twenty-two.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was after line three hundred and twenty-six to insert the words, "all licenses herein provided for shall take effect on the 1st day of May next;" so that the clause will read:

"52. Insurance brokers shall pay twenty-five dollars for each license. Any person who shall negotiate or procure insurance in behalf of another person or party for which he shall receive any pay, commission, or compensation, shall be regarded as an insurance broker under this act," and the licenses herein provided for shall take effect on the 1st day of May next.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this amendment. It appears to me that it does not express what is intended by the committee. The intention was that the provision in reference to licenses shall take effect on and after the 1st day of May next; but this would seem to confine all that to the 1st of May next.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is an amendment to the entire section relating to licenses. This provision is to be added after that section. It says:

And the licenses herein provided for—

That is, in the section—

shall take effect on the 1st day of May next.

I think the amendment is correct.

Mr. COLLAMER. That does not change the license system now in operation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 14, after line three hundred and thirty-three, to strike out the following clause:

That section eighty-three be amended by inserting after the words "within his district, monthly," the words "within ten days from the 20th day of each month," and by inserting after the words "such duties within" the word "a said," and by striking out after the words "ten days," following the words "after demand in writing delivered to him in person, or left at his house or place of business, or manufactory, or sent by mail."

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to make some general observations to the Senate in regard to the financial condition of the country, and especially the details and merits of this bill, and I may as well avail myself of the present occasion to say what I have to say. It will save time.

The late period of the session at which the House of Representatives sent us this bill precludes full discussion upon any of the important questions presented in it. The House is jealous of its exclusive prerogative of originating revenue bills, but it ought at least to give us an opportunity to exercise our undoubted power to amend them. This important measure, affecting every industrial interest of the country, declaring in its title that it is to provide revenue to support the Government and pay interest on the public debt, containing fifty pages of printed matter, every line demanding an examination of the previous law, was sent to us within two weeks of the close of the session. The Committee on Finance have worked diligently to prepare it for the consideration of the Senate, and now, during the closing week, with all the hurry incident to the closing days of the session, with the appropriation bills still pending between the two Houses, we must urge the Senate to pass judgment upon the numerous provisions of this bill rather than to discuss them.

After the first careful reading of this bill, and considering the many important changes proposed in it, I was inclined to recommend that the Senate postpone it until the next session rather than by hasty legislation to run the risk of new errors; but the necessity of the Government for new sources of revenue, the loss of revenue caused by defects in the present law, the constructions put upon parts of it by revenue officers, and the palpable failure to enforce the present law, especially as to incomes, induced your committee to report it back with several important amendments, and especially to provide for such an examination of the whole subject of internal taxation as will enable us to legislate in the future with fuller information. It may expedite our action to submit at the outset a few general remarks as to the necessity which compels us to impose upon our constituents the system of internal taxation provided for by this bill and the act of the last session.

Under the practice of Congress of dividing financial measures into numerous bills, all of which are considered separately, without any connection with each other, there seems no appropriate time to consider the "budget," or the general financial estimates and plans of the Government. Yet it is obvious that when it is the chief duty of Congress to provide ways and means to carry on the Government, some general principles ought to be adopted and applied to all our financial measures. "When at peace the United States had an ample source of revenue in a moderate rate of duty on imported goods. This tax was so light as never to be felt by our people, and its incidental effect in protecting our domestic industry made this tax a blessing rather than a burden. But the rebellion changed all this. We had either to submit to have our existence as a nation destroyed by a haughty, but base, ignorant, and defeated oligarchy, or we had to assume with war its unavoidable incidents, taxation and debt.

The people of the United States having definitely determined to prosecute war, it only remained for Congress to provide the ways and means to carry it on. It is manifest now, as I then urged, that it would have been better at the first session in 1861 to have reduced to the lowest possible standard all expenditures and to have provided a system of internal taxation. It is easy now to see the errors of the past. None of us appreciated the magnitude of the contest—the enormous armies demanded and the vast sums required for the contest. I still think that with parsimonious economy and heavy taxes from the beginning, we might have borrowed money enough on a specie basis to have avoided a suspension of specie payments; but when it came we were without a currency and without a system of taxation. Gold disappeared and was hoarded by banks and individuals. It flowed in a steady stream from our country. By the sub-Treasury act we could not use the irredeemable bills of State banks, and with the terrible lessons of 1815 and 1837 staring us in the face, no one was bold enough to advise us to make as a standard of value the issues of fifteen hundred banks founded upon as many banking systems as there were States. Under these circumstances we had but one resource.

We had to borrow vast sums, and as a means to do it we had to make a currency. This was done by the issue of United States notes. Subsequently, to unite the interests of private capital with the security of the Government as a basis of banking, we established a system of national banks, and upon this currency, as a medium for collecting taxes and borrowing money, have waged a war unexampled in the grandeur of its operations, and, as I trust, soon to be crowned with unconditional success.

Such a war has not been conducted without vast expenditure. Our actual expenditure during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864, was $865,234,087. The estimated expenditure for the current fiscal year is $895,729,135, upon the basis of the present laws. Much more than one half of this sum has been already expended. To this sum you must add every dollar you provide for by new laws, and this grim fact must not be overlooked for a single moment when you are making new appropriations. Every dollar of this must be paid in the form of taxes; and that is not the worst of it—it must be paid now. We must get the money either by making it, by borrowing it, or by collecting it from our people. If we could postpone the borrowing until after the war is over it would be easy, but we must have it now; and we must devise the means of getting it before we can sympathize with the poor clerk, the brave soldier, or the needy contractor. Until then your sympathy is mockery. Your very measures of relief may add more to the distress of all whose livelihood depends upon a fixed salary.

I repeat that there are but three modes of raising this money: one is by printing your notes, calling it money, and compelling your people to take it; another is by issuing your bonds or promises to pay in the future; and another is to collect the money in the form of taxes from the people. That all these modes may be resorted to is proven by the history of all modern nations when involved in war. As the first is the easiest it is apt to be resorted to first; but it is a doubtful expedient at any time, always dangerous, and soon exhausted. If pressed too far it destroys loans and taxes, and national bankruptcy is the inevitable result. A limited amount of this money was indispensable to us as a medium of exchange. It is like some medicines, necessary in certain cases and in moderate quantities, but when taken in excess, sure death.

Paper money issued by a Government is called a loan, but it has none of the elements of a loan except the promise to pay. There can be no loan without a lender, and his act must be voluntary. In the middle ages Governments resorted to "forced loans," a contradiction of terms. A forced loan was merely an unjust and unequal tax. I choose to regard United States legal-tender notes not as a loan merely, but as money, lawful money, which the citizen is compelled to receive, that which now fixes the standard of all value. Whether the power to issue it is derived from the power to coin money or to borrow money, or whether it is inherent in any Government clothed with the attributes of sovereignty, are questions we need not now discuss. We have exercised the power. It is now the currency of the country, the measure of value, and we can only regulate its form and amount, and provide for its redemption.

While we can and have made our paper money the unit or standard of value, we cannot fix the price or value of any other commodity, whether gold, silver, or food. This attempt has been made by many Governments in different ages, and has uniformly failed. The standard of value may be fixed by the Government, but a higher law fixes the relative value of all commodities as measured by this standard. We may by our tariff or tax law affect the relative value of commodities, but we cannot by direct legislation fix the value of any commodity either in gold or paper money. When the attempt has been made the result has usually been to advance rather than to decrease the value of this commodity. All our efforts to fix the value of gold, as measured by our currency, have failed. We may make penal the purchase and sale of gold; we may deny the use of our courts to enforce such contracts; we may prohibit the exportation of gold; we may deter sales of gold by heavy taxation, yet, after all, the price of gold rises or falls as our national credit rises or falls. So far as our legislation produces revenue or strengthens our Army it produces a fall of gold as measured by our standard. So far as it merely discourages trade in gold or any other commodity it increases its market value. We may as well recognize as an axiom of political economy, proven by the experience of all nations, by every form of government—despotic, monarchic, or republican—that the relative value of all commodities is beyond the power of legislation. We may fix the standard of value, we may fix the tax upon the commodity, and there our power ends. And especially is this so of gold, which has value in all civilized nations of the world, and, except with nations for a time involved in war, is every where the standard of value.

It is therefore manifest that the first duty of Congress is to keep our lawful money at a standard of value as near as possible to the standard of gold; and this can only be done by limiting the amount and by making it valuable to pay taxes or loans. It can only be redeemed by the Government by taxes or duties, and every tax or duty, however oppressive to the individual, which withdraws for a time our paper money, brings it nearer the standard of gold. The power to make money by issuing legal-tender bills is now exhausted. More than enough is now outstanding to supply a currency. The issue of $100,000,000 more would not only increase our debt to that amount, but would add even a greater sum to our expenditures by the increased price of commodities consumed by the war, while the imposition of an equal amount of taxes gives value to our currency, and thus reduces the price of commodities we are compelled to buy.

An increase of paper money benefits the taxpayer now at the expense of the soldier. It reduces the purchasing value of the pay of the soldier, while by debasing the currency it is easier for the tax-payer to pay a specific sum. In the end, however, the tax-payer loses, by the increased cost of food and clothing and transportation, which must finally be paid for in gold.

I assume, then, that while the necessity for raising these vast sums is still imperative, yet one mode of doing it, and that the easiest, is exhausted. Loans and taxes are our only resource. A loan must be voluntary. It may to some extent be induced by patriotism. In this contest thousands of patriotic people—women, children, poor and rich alike—have loaned their savings to the Government from the purest of motives. The admirable system of distributing this loan by going out from the money centers to the remote hamlets and villages, gathering from the small savings of the people rather than from the garnered treasures of the rich, has proved a wonderful success. Yet, after all, to borrow money you must appeal to the self-interest of the lender. A great nation borrowing money will be tried by the interested tests applied by the pawnbroker to his shivering victim. The more it wants to borrow, the more it must pay. The terms upon which we now borrow prove that we have pressed this resource as far as is expedient. Tested by the present standard of gold, we now pay seven and three tenths per cent. for three years, and twelve per cent. afterward, until the debt is paid in gold. We promise to pay $1,000 in gold at the end of eight years, with interest for five of these years at six per cent. in gold, and for three years at seven and three tenths in currency, and we receive for this promise, which must be fulfilled to the uttermost, $1,000 in currency, which will buy our soldiers no more food than $500 in gold. But this is not all. We stipulate that this property lent us shall be exempt from all the burdens which this war casts upon all other property, of State, county, and municipal taxes. This simple statement shows that this process of borrowing is exhausted; that we dare not extend it except for the highest object of national existence. When I see the money thus borrowed expended on trivial objects, I cannot but look forward to the slow and hard process by which it must all be repaid in gold, with interest accumulated and accumulating, through the agency of collectors, by the inquisitorial process of this bill, and from the labor of the poor. And if, Senators, you have thought me hard and close as to salaries and expenditures, I trust you will do me the justice to believe that it is not from any doubt of the ability of our country to pay, or from the base and selfish desire for cheap reputation, or from a disinclination to pay my share, but because I see in the dim future of our country the same uneasy struggle between capital and labor—between the rich and the poor, between fund-holders and property-holders—that has marked the history of Great Britain for the last fifty years. I do not wish our public debt increased one dollar beyond the necessities of the present war, and the only way to prevent this increase is to restrict our expenditures to the lowest limit consistent with the public service, and to increase our taxes to the highest aggregate our industry will bear.

These general principles induce me to support many of the taxes proposed in this bill. I regard the proposed tax on sales as indefensible in principle; yet, as a temporary expedient to raise revenue, I will vote for it. The increase of the postage on letters is only to make the Post Office Department self-supporting, and to preserve the proportions between the old rate and the price of labor and commodities. The changes in the income tax are necessary to prevent a repetition of the shameless and wholesale evasions of the special income tax. This is the only tax imposed on accumulated property, the only tax on money in State and Government securities. It is the one that should have been paid most cheerfully, but its assessment and collection was a disreputable farce.

A still more important feature of this bill is the section to compel the withdrawal of State bank notes. As the volume of currency affects the price of all commodities, I have no doubt the amount of such paper money now outstanding adds to the cost of our purchases $50,000,000. The refusal of Congress, at the last session, to pass restrictive measures to compel its redemption has seriously affected the value of our currency. The national banks were intended to supersede the State banks. Both cannot exist together; yet, while the national system is extending, the issues of State banks have not materially decreased. Indeed, many local banks have been converted into national banks, and yet carefully keep out their State circulation. They exact interest from the people on this circulation, and yet avail themselves of the benefits of the new system. They transfer their capital to national banks, issue new circulation upon it, and yet studiously keep out the old. They issue two circulations upon the same capital. It is far better at once to abandon the national banking system than to leave it as a cloak for outstanding State issues.

If the State banks have power enough in Congress to prolong their existence beyond the present year, we had better suspend the organization of national banks. As the first friend of this measure in the Senate I would vote to-day for its repeal rather than allow it to be the agency under which State banks can inflate our currency. And the power of taxation cannot be more wisely exercised than in harmonizing and nationalizing and placing on the secure basis of national credit all the money of the country.

Many of the taxes proposed by this bill are not in accordance with established rules of political economy founded upon the experience of European countries. We are new beginners in the science of taxation. The object now is less to equalize taxation than to increase revenue. All other questions must await the necessity put upon us by war to levy in the most expeditious mode the largest possible taxes, and to do this we must extend it to nearly all articles of production and consumption.

It may be truly said of some of these taxes that they are mongrel. We can only reply that we need the money now, and must look more to the result of the tax in revenue, leaving to the future to make such changes as experience proves to be just and proper. Taxes levied now must be paid by those at home who do not fight, while, if postponed, they will fall in a measure upon those who have fought. Taxes collected now can be paid in a depreciated currency, while, if postponed, they must be paid in gold. Taxes paid now not only tend to reduce the present price of commodities, but by reducing the sum to be borrowed enable us to borrow on better terms, while taxes withheld now largely increase the sum to be levied hereafter. What we pay now we pay without interest; what we postpone for the future we pay threefold in accumulating interest. The war has given vast activity to all classes of industry, and has yielded enormous profit to those who are in business. It is proper that now they pay to the Government their full tax on these profits before they are consumed by expenditure. A tax system fully enforced now will enable us to relieve our people from many taxes when the reaction of peace shall lessen the profits of industry. We cannot increase our taxes after war—we must be prepared to reduce them. Taxes are more cheerfully paid now in view of the mountain of calamity that would overwhelm us if the rebellion succeed, but when we reach the haven of peace, when the danger is past, you must expect, then you must expect, discontent and complaint. The grim specter of repudiation can never disturb us if we do our duty of tax-paying as well as our soldiers do theirs of fighting. I therefore conclude that every dictate of policy, every sentiment of patriotism, demands of us the largest taxation now to be fearlessly assessed and impartially collected.

But it is impossible to consider the subject of internal taxation without some reference to our tariff laws. Though this bill does not change the present duties on imported goods, yet the same general principles must be applied to tariffs as to excises. The object now of our tariff laws should be to raise revenue. In times of peace we may discriminate in favor of our industry, we may abandon taxes to increase our commerce. Now our industry is sufficiently protected by requiring customs duties to be paid in gold, and we are in no condition to protect our commerce from foreign competition, because our vessels are the prey of English pirates. Our immediate want is revenue, and especially revenue payable in gold. We are committed to the payment of nearly sixty millions in gold annually, and must rely upon customs duties to pay this sum. We cannot forego this revenue without destroying the national credit, the value of our bonds, the basis of our currency. We cannot affect these without seriously impairing our manufactures and our commerce. I repeat that we must now frame our tariff laws solely with a view to revenue. All incidental protection or benefit to any industry must now give way during this war to the immediate and pressing need of revenue.

A different principle prevails in Great Britain, and in her present position of peace, with all her great wealth employed in commerce and manufacture, it is founded upon the highest wisdom. The principle adopted by her is thus stated by Sir Morton Peto, pages 24 and 25:

"If a customs duty, however moderate, imposed for a financial object, prevents trade with a country which would otherwise receive your goods in exchange for its products, it is surely better to remove the duty which imposes the obstacle to commercial intercourse than, for the sake of a small revenue, to preclude the possibility of commercial exchange."

"But the first object of legislation in regard to customs duties should be, not to tax all articles which do not come within the class of raw materials or food, but on the contrary to tax those articles alone which can be taxed without injuriously affecting our trade with other countries, and to tax such articles only to such an extent as will not injuriously affect their consumption by our own people."

Upon this principle, and another equally simple, not to impose duties on the raw materials of industry and the first articles of food, was based the policy of Sir Robert Peel, which reduced the number of articles charged with duties from eleven hundred and sixty-three, in 1841, to forty-four, in 1862; and, sir, if we were at peace, with our currency restored to its normal condition, I should be very willing to discriminate in favor of our own commerce and manufactures. Although representing an interior State chiefly engaged in agriculture, yet I have always felt that the prosperity of our industry and section finally inured to the benefit of the whole nation and of every part. I therefore have supported the present tariff law, framed with a distinct view to discriminate in favor of our home industry, and I would now only so far modify the present duties when to do so will increase the revenue. If by lowering the duty we can increase the revenue, it should be done. If by increasing the duties on any article we can increase the revenue without diminishing in a greater degree the consumption of that article, it ought to be done. During war, when our industry is fully employed in repairing the waste of war, increased importation may become a vast injury by exhausting us of gold and food, which must then be sent to pay for luxuries. We send abroad that which we most need, and receive that which we can do without. The true principle for a nation in our condition, struggling for its existence, is so to frame its tariff laws as to produce the greatest revenue from the least importation. When the war ceases, our armies are disbanded and our soldiers retire to the ordinary pursuits of industry, then the English rule should be applied of levying the requisite duties on the fewest articles, and with a view to increase your commerce and protect your industry.

With this general statement, I approach the consideration of this bill. I am not entirely satisfied with it, but I am sure it will improve the present law and add some new sources of revenue. When the machinery of collecting is perfected, which can only be done by experience, the whole of these taxes will be revised. They will be arranged into classes and schedules and simplified. Its success will depend mainly upon the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. If he will perform his full duty, and enforce it upon all his subordinates, we will realize during this calendar year $300,000,000 of internal revenue, an ample basis of public credit, and which will in a short time rapidly reduce the public debt. If our military and naval forces complete their great duty within this year, our present system of national finance will, I confidently trust, very soon enable us to commence the reduction of our national debt, and within the period required in Great Britain after her wars with Napoleon, enable us to resume specie payments. We have resources in this country, when united and at peace, far greater than any nation of modern times. Our accumulated wealth is not to be compared with that of Great Britain and France, but a bountiful Providence has given us sources of wealth far greater than either of these powerful nations ever had. The cotton now permeating through our lines already affects the price of exchange. What will it do when the full stream is opened? Petroleum, a flowing mine, is already exported to the amount of thirty-one million gallons a year. Our mineral resources are scarcely touched, and our young sister, Nevada, is exciting our fancy with mountains of gold and silver; and dry statistics inform us of a product there of gold and silver equal to the product of the world fifty years ago. The South is to be opened to new industry, and millions of laborers from Europe and from Asia are meeting on our favored shores to help develop our resources. We have taken our place among the great nations, but as we have attained our military position only after hard, exacting toil of military discipline, after defeats and discouragements, we can maintain our financial position only by the hard process of taxes and economy. I wish to see evil predictions of our enemies, at home and abroad, all belied. They prophesied disunion, we will show them Union. They prophesied bankruptcy, we will see them begging for our bonds, our cotton, petroleum, and gold. Then we can provide for our public debt. Then we may with safety prosecute with vigor the Pacific railroad. Then we may, without injury to our credit, enter upon the magnificent projects for the building of ship-canal. Then we can restore our commerce on the high seas, now driven under foreign flags by British pirates. Then we may revive old doctrines about the American continent being no longer the home of European kings. Now our duty is dry, hard, exacting, but it will be the more cheering when in the future our self-sacrificing patriotism in the great crisis will enable our country to enter upon its new career without a stain upon its financial honor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foor.) The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out, after line three hundred and thirty-three, the following clause:

That section eighty-three be amended by inserting after the words "within his district, monthly," the words "within ten days from the 20th day of each month," and by inserting after the words "such duties within," the word "and," and by striking out after the words "ten days," following the words "after demand in writing delivered to him in person, or left at his house or place of business, or manufactory, or sent by mail."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill, as follows:

That section eighty-four be amended by striking out the words "eighty first" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "eighty-second," and by striking out the words "eighty-fourth" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "eighty-fifth."

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to know whereabouts that is and what it means.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will take the bill and the copy of the law of the session he will see what the amendments are.

Mr. COLLAMER. I cannot read two bills at one time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have tried them, and I think it is impossible.

Mr. SHERMAN. The best way is to keep the two together before you as we go along with the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. The only way is for the Senator from Ohio to explain it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will explain any amendment that any Senator desires as he goes along.

The Secretary continued the reading, and read the next paragraph, as follows:

That section eighty-six be amended by striking out the words "deposit at the time of sale" after the words "freight from the place of" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "manufacture," and in the next following paragraph by striking out the word "that" where it first occurs and inserting in lieu thereof the word "the."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suggest that to understand the bill at all it must be read by the Secretary in connection with the old law. It may take a little longer to do so; but I suggest that the old law be read as if it were the bill before the body while we are considering this class of amendments.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have no doubt if the honorable Senator from Ohio will consent, and will take the time, he can explain to us what those changes are, and when he says that such a one is merely to correct a mistake or an error in the old law, that will be satisfactory.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall be satisfied with that.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment now pending to section eighty-six is simply an amendment of phraseology. If Senators will turn to the old law, page forty-six, they will find that deductions may be allowed in certain cases.

"1. Freight from the place of deposit at the time of sale to the place of delivery."

The change proposed here is to strike out the words "deposit at the time of sale," and to insert "manufacture;" so that it will read:

1. Freight from the place of manufacture to the place of delivery.

This is the only amendment to section eighty-six.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no doubt that is very clear, but still I cannot understand it.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill, as follows:

That section eighty-seven be amended by striking out after the words "accurately setting" the word "for," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "forth," and after the words "description of the manufactured article," by striking out the words "the proposed market for the same, whether foreign or domestic," and by inserting after the word "assessor," and preceding the word "assistant," the word "or."

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know how that section will read if amended in that way. It is impossible to understand the bill in its present shape.

Mr. GRIMES. I will send to the Secretary, and ask him to read, that section (eighty-seven) which is proposed thus to be amended. It will be seen that it is a section of nearly a page in length, and this clause of the bill proposes to strike out certain words in certain places in that section.

Mr. JOHNSON. That I understand very well; but I want to know, if it can be done, and I suppose it can, if it is not better to read the section as it will be after it is amended as proposed.

Mr. SHERMAN. We should never get through with the bill in that way, and then we would not understand it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot understand it in its present shape. We might just as well pass the bill as it is reported as to consider it in this way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will explain it, and try to make myself understood. The bill before us provides:

"That section eighty-seven be amended by striking out after the words "accurately setting" the word "for," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "forth."

That is a mere verbal correction. Then it goes on:

And after the words "description of the manufactured article," by striking out the words "the proposed market for the same, whether foreign or domestic," and by inserting after the word "assessor," and preceding the word "assistant," the word "or."

If the Senator has the bill of the last session before him, as I have, he will see in a moment that it is a section in regard to the manufacture of tobacco, snuff, and cigars. The manufacturers of those articles are required to make an additional statement to the assessor.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot imagine what objection, except that it will take a little more time, there can be to reading the law of last session as it will be if these amendments are adopted; but it is impossible for us to understand it in any other way.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to have the experiment tried.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let us try it for a time, at any rate.

Mr. CONNESS. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that in many instances the amendments proposed to long sections of the old law are very small and inconsiderable, and to compel the reading of the sections of the old law would be a work of delay, and we should never get through with the bill at all. I hope the Senator will not call for that.

Mr. JOHNSON. As far as I am individually concerned, in all cases where the chairman will say the amendments are merely verbal, and have no effect at all on the law as it now stands, I shall be content.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not say that in regard to many of them.

Mr. JOHNSON. But I suggest that in relation to such as are merely verbal. If we cannot do something of this sort, we might as well leave to the Committee on Finance the passage of this law altogether. It is impossible, I think, unless members are much more acute than I am, to understand what the law will be unless we can see what the section is after it shall have been amended.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will ask the Senator from Ohio if it is not practicable to pass over this portion of the bill which relates to the machinery of the organization of the internal revenue system, which I suppose is the only portion of the bill that contains these amendments referred to by sections and lines.

Mr. CLARK. They run clear through the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then we shall never understand the bill, and the people will never understand it, nor the officers who are to administer it. The old bill ought to be engrossed with these amendments in it, and then reenacted.

Mr. SHERMAN. The old law makes a book of one hundred pages. A great many of the amendments proposed to it by this bill are merely verbal and changes of phraseology that would seem to be reasonable and proper in themselves. They are not such as I would propose; but they come to us in the bill from the House. We cannot strike them out, because we can see that if the amendments are adopted they will improve the phraseology or context of the old bill. The amendment on which we have now delayed for five minutes is purely grammatical.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then there is no objection to that.

Mr. ANTHONY. I will ask the Senator from Ohio if there is any precedent for passing a bill in this way.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; there was one passed two years ago; and it was a very bad precedent.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think so too.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have already said that I do not like this mode of legislation, but how can we help it? The House of Representatives have the power to originate this bill, and we have not. They sent it to us within two weeks of the close of the session. If we defeat this bill, we defeat important measures connected with it. We cannot do that. The Committee on Finance have gone over this bill, comparing it with the present law, and upon the whole of these amendments that we are now passing upon, and to which exception is made, we were all agreed. There was no difference of opinion upon them. Most of them are merely changes of phraseology; but we did not strike them out, simply because they were right enough in themselves, but not important.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is no objection to those. If the honorable member will say that these are merely verbal amendments to the old law, there will certainly be no objection on my part to them; but there are a great many of these amendments that I should suppose, from what I see, are very substantial.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is anything material I will mention it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will proceed.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 17, line three hundred and eighty-nine, after the word "affirmation" to strike out the following words:

On the receipt whereof an assessment of the duties due by said person, company, or corporation, shall be immediately made and transmitted to the collector of the district, to whom said duties shall be paid within five days thereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 17, line three hundred and ninety-four, before the word "five" to strike out the words "the said," and after the word "days" to insert the words "after demand thereof;" so that the clause will read:

And in case the duties shall not be paid within five days after demand thereof, the said collector may, on one day's notice, distrain for the same, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to and including the following provision:

That section ninety-one be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That all manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, whether of domestic manufacture or imported, shall, before the same is used or removed for consumption, be inspected and weighed by an inspector, appointed under the fifty-eighth section of the act to which this is an amendment, who shall mark or affix a stamp upon the box or other package containing such tobacco, snuff, or cigars, in a manner to be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, denoting the kind or form of tobacco and the weight of such package, with the date of inspection and the name of the inspector. The fees of such inspection shall in all cases be paid by the owner of the manufactured tobacco, snuff, or cigars, so inspected and weighed. And the penalties for the fraudulent marking of any box or other package of tobacco, snuff, or cigars, and for any fraudulent attempt to evade the duties on tobacco, snuff, or cigars, so inspected, by changing in any manner the package or the marks thereon, shall be the same as are provided in relation to distilled spirits by existing laws. And all cigars manufactured after the passage of this act shall be packed in boxes. And any manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars, whether of domestic manufacture or imported, which shall be sold or pass out of the hands of the manufacturer or importer, except into a bonded warehouse, without the inspection marks or stamps affixed by the inspector, unless otherwise provided, shall be forfeited, and may be seized wherever found, and shall be sold, one half of the proceeds of such sale to be paid to the informer, and the other moiety to the United States. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall keep an account of all stamps delivered to the several inspectors; and said inspectors shall also keep an account of all stamps by them used or placed upon boxes containing cigars, and of all tobacco, snuff, and cigars inspected, and the name of the person, firm, or company for whom the same were so inspected, and return to the assessor of the district a separate and distinct account of the same; and also return to the said Commissioner on demand all stamps not otherwise accounted for, and shall give a bond for a faithful performance of all the duties to which he may be assigned, and return or account for all stamps which may be placed in his hands."

The committee propose to amend the clause on page 20, line four hundred and seventy-seven, by inserting before the word "return" the word "to;" so that it will read:

And to return or account for all stamps which may be placed in his hands.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. If I understand this amendment to the ninety-first section of the act of 1864, it creates a new batch of officers, to be known as inspectors of cigars and tobacco. Is that so?

Mr. CLARK. The amendment is almost entirely new, and one, as the Senator suggests, which will create a new class of officers, or a large number of the same class; and I propose, after we have gone through with the amendments of the committee, to call the attention of the Senate to it, and to propose some amendments to it.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to inquire if it is not subject to amendment now?

Mr. CLARK. It will be subject to amendment after we have gone through with the committee's amendments. It will then be open to amendment by any member of the Senate.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was on page 22, line five hundred and ten, in the clause proposing to amend the ninety-fourth section of the act of 1864, to insert the following:

By striking out of the clause relating to printed books the word "magazines," and by inserting after the word "news-papers" the words "periodical magazines."

Mr. SHERMAN. I promised to call the attention of the Senate to any change of importance made by the bill, and I should have stated that the tax on gunpowder is changed, but not very specially.

Mr. JOHNSON. By the House, not by your committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. The amendment of the Committee on Finance, now under consideration, proposes to leave out the tax on magazines. The law now is:

"On all printed books, magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and all other similar printed publications, except newspapers, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem."

If amended as proposed by the Committee on Finance, it will read:

On all printed books, pamphlets, reviews, and all other similar printed books, except newspapers and periodical magazines, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

I will state that it was represented to us that these magazines were nearly all written by ladies of literary taste, and are in rather a suffering condition now, from the high price on paper, &c., and a very strong appeal was made to us to omit them from the tax. I think it was more in deference to the ladies than from any question of principle that we agreed to the amendment. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. I could not quite reconcile myself to this amendment of the committee in consideration of certain other amendments that came from the House of Representatives. Senators will perceive that the bill as it came from the House of Representatives contained this proviso:

Provided, That Bibles and Testaments, or volumes consisting only of parts of either, prayer-books, arithmetics, spelling-books, geographies, grammars, and school-books of the kinds used in common and primary schools, and all books printed exclusively for the use of Sunday-schools, shall be exempt from any duty or tax, anything to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided further, That this exemption shall not apply to any volume which is valued at more than two dollars.

The Committee on Finance struck out the Bibles and Testaments, &c., and subjected them to a tax, but left these magazines free from a tax. I was in favor of leaving the Bibles and Testaments, if anything, free from tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. That amendment has not been reached yet.

Mr. CLARK. It comes immediately after this, and is in close connection with it, and is a fair matter of discussion with this amendment. I was, however, in favor of leaving the law as it was, exempting newspapers alone, and letting all other books be taxed. I confess I cannot see any reason why magazines should be exempted and Bibles and Testaments taxed. I know the argument suggested by the Senator from Ohio was before us, and perhaps Senators listened to that; but I cannot see why a lady who is engaged in writing a magazine should be exempt from taxation when the poor girl in my country who spends her time in weaving a palm-leaf hat or stitching a shoe to get a livelihood is taxed. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] suggests to me that they write but a part of the magazines, and the publishing of the works goes on under the head and direction of sometimes very rich men, and they make a large profit upon them. I do not want to take up time in discussion, but I must confess I did not feel the force of the reasoning that exempted these magazines.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is better to take the amendment as a whole together. The House have inserted at the end of this clause about printed books this proviso:

Provided, That Bibles and Testaments, or volumes consisting only of parts of either, prayer-books, arithmetics, spelling-books, geographies, grammars, and school-books of the kinds used in common and primary schools, and all books printed exclusively for the use of Sunday-schools, shall be exempt from any duty or tax, anything to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided further, That this exemption shall not apply to any volume which is valued at more than two dollars.

The whole difficulty and trouble with this proviso was this, that it substantially surrendered the entire tax on the great body of all the books published in this country. It was represented to us that these books that are exempted comprise more than three fourths of all the books published in the country; that the great body of the books published in this country are school-books, of which a vast number are consumed. Besides, this proviso exempted books of the lower grades of school-books, but did not exempt books of the higher grade, such as works on algebra, geometry, &c., which are consumed by scholars in high schools, and Latin books, and books in which the languages are taught. On the whole it was very hard to draw the line of distinction. I almost became a convert to the idea of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER], and that it would be better to strike out the whole clause rather than to attempt to make these discriminations and qualifications and exceptions. I think it would be better for the Senate either to abandon the whole tax on printed books, or else to abandon all these exceptions. The newspapers are exempted from the tax now.

Mr. JOHNSON. What is the estimate of the tax on books?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have none; but the books exempted by the House proviso are more than three fourths of all the books published in this country.

Mr. SUMNER. I am very glad to hear the Senator from Ohio say that he became almost a convert to my proposition to remove all tax on books. He reminded me of a certain person who said that he was "almost persuaded to be a Christian." I think it would be better for the Senator had he become a complete convert on this occasion. I am sure the extent of his influence would be better for the country.

I am sure, sir, that in connection with this matter I can speak from no motive of self and from no personal interest whatever. It is, however, from a profound conviction that the best interests of the country require that there should be no tax on books. What you can get out of this tax in any event is very small; but it is a tax on knowledge. Look at it as you will, to that complexity it comes at last—a tax on knowledge. I do not think it worth while on the part of the Congress of the United States at this moment to enter upon such a system of taxation. It is the boast of our institutions that they stand upon the intelligence of the people, and it is a further boast that we supply education at the public cost; but how can you supply education unless you give an opportunity to buy books? Every tax, therefore, that you impose upon books is an impediment to public education. Therefore, I submit it is inconsistent with the genius of our institutions. The result of this tax will be petty; but to the extent of its influence, I submit that it will be prejudicial. I should like, therefore, to strike out the whole passage, and if the Senator from Ohio will make no objection I will move to amend the amendment which is now under consideration by moving to strike out the whole clause.

Mr. JOHNSON. Down to line five hundred and twenty-three.

Mr. SUMNER. The bill is in such a strange shape that really it is very difficult to get at it or to make any proposition with regard to it. I am perfectly baffled.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator will accomplish his object by moving an amendment to strike out the clause in the original law on page 53 imposing a tax of five per cent. on all printed books, magazines, &c.

Mr. SUMNER. That is what I wish to do.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then move it.

Mr. SUMNER. That is what I wish to do. It is very easy to say move it; but I find it difficult to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on inserting what is printed in italics in lines five hundred and ten, five hundred and eleven, and five hundred and twelve:

By striking out of the clause relating to printed books the word "magazines," and by inserting after the word "newspapers" the words "periodical magazines."

Mr. HENDERSON. The bill before us proposes to strike out a part of the clause of the original bill, and it is certainly in order for the Senator from Massachusetts to move to strike out the whole of it if he so desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Of course it is.

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it the gentleman from Massachusetts will have an opportunity to offer the amendment he desires after we have gone through with the amendments of the committee, and he can present it at that time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the usual, and indeed the uniform practice, to go through first with the amendments proposed by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. But this is an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. The question now arises on the amendment proposed by the committee. If that is adopted it may be in the way of the amendment which I desire to propose.

Mr. COLLAMER. I take it that would not be the case at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator to strike out all after the words "printed books" in the five hundred and eleven line, in these words:

The word "magazines," and by inserting after the word "newspapers" the words "periodical magazines."

And then to make it read as follows:

By striking out the clause relating to printed books, magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and all other similar printed publications.

That would strike out the whole clause.

Mr. SUMNER. That will accomplish it. I move, on page 22, line five hundred and eleven, after the words "printed books" to strike out the word "magazines," and by inserting after the word "newspapers" the words "periodical magazines," and to insert the words "magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and all other similar printed publications;" so that it will read:

By striking out the clause relating to printed books, magazines, reviews, and all other similar publications.

Mr. SAULSBURY. This is a proposition to strike out the tax upon books. I shall cheerfully support it. I have not read this bill; but I understand from the comprehensive words in which it is phrased that it levies a tax upon Bibles and Testaments, and every species of book literature. The proposition now is to strike out magazines, reviews, and all other printed matter of similar form. Whether that leaves a tax upon Bibles and Testaments I do not know; but I am opposed to any tax upon any printed matter. When I was a young man delving in ancient languages, endeavoring to understand the meaning of words and things that I read or heard, I read in one of the earliest languages this sentence, "And God said, Let light be, and light was." But, sir, if the tax is to be retained upon the Bible and the Testament, I do not know that it is inappropriate and unsymmetrical to the legislation of the present day, because the Bible and the Testament have become obsolete books. The truths which they inculcate are very little regarded in the present time. While I have read, "And God said, Let light be, and light was" in more languages than one, I find in the legislation of the present times but little of their teachings. In these days when abolitionism is rampant, I find that no attention is paid to the teachings of that Book of books. I would gladly vote for an exemption upon knowledge and upon books, and would carry out the injunction which emanated from the Most High when everything was chaos, and when it was said, "Let light be, and light was." But, sir, if light is to be taxed let it be taxed in its fountain; and as we have disregarded that Book and its teachings, let us tax it and not make a mockery of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment reported by the committee. The Senator from Massachusetts having modified somewhat his proposed amendment to the amendment it will be again reported.

The Secretary read the amendment, as modified, which was on page 22, line five hundred and eleven, after the word "books" to strike out the following words:

"The word 'magazines,' and by inserting after the word 'newspapers' the words 'periodical magazines.'"

And to insert in lieu thereof the following words: Magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and all other similar publications except newspapers, a duty of five per cent.

Mr. CLARK. This amendment from the Senator from Massachusetts would exempt all books, as I understand, from taxation. The duty now upon the publication of books is five per cent. ad valorem. I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say that if we adopt his amendment and strike out this tax we should strike out but an inconsiderable revenue, a petty result. In that the Senator is mistaken. He conveys wrong impressions to the Senate. The revenue is very large. This simple amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts would make a difference of from eighty to one hundred thousand dollars to a single publishing house; and the Senate may judge from the number of publication houses what the tax would be for the country.

But there is another feature to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate; and that is, the inequality of your taxation, and the exemption of some manufactures from taxes and the imposition of them upon others. I say to the Senate as my candid judgment that your internal revenue system is becoming so odious that it is in danger of being broken down. It is becoming odious from the manner in which it is administered and the inequalities of assessing and collecting the taxes, and it is not desirable to increase those inequalities by any further legislation. I ask you, Mr. President, and I ask any Senator here, how you can exempt a publishing house that publishes novels and other books of a like character, and then tax a house by the side of it which makes shirts and jackets for your children and the poor of the country.

Mr. COWAN. One is "knowledge."

Mr. CLARK. I know one is knowledge and the other is comfort; one is the comfort of a good thing, and the other is a knowledge of evil. If you do that, the man who makes the shirts and jackets will be continually pointing at the man who publishes the novel and like books, and exciting odium against your bill; and he will ask, why am I taxed for this manufacture and that man is allowed to go free?

It may be hard to tax some things; but I suggest to Senators that you have got to make these taxes equal to make the people bear them with any sort of consideration and ease, and you had better be careful what you exempt, and see how it is to operate. In the city of New York there is one rule of taxation in one district, and another rule of taxation in another district, making one lighter than the other, and continually exciting odium against your taxation. In my judgment, the worst thing we ever did for the bonds of the country, and for the ease with which the people could carry the bonds of the Government, was to exempt them from taxation, because it allows the rich to take the bonds of your Government and hold them and not be taxed for them, while the poor man is taxed for the labor of his hands and the earning of his toil.

Mr. COLLAMER. The bonds are not entirely exempt from taxation.

Mr. CLARK. I know they are not entirely exempt from taxation; but we have made the burden upon them very much lighter.

I feel, to some extent, the force of the argument suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not like to tax the Bible; I do not like to tax the Testament; I do not like to tax parts of the Bible and parts of the Testament which they are printing in some of these houses and sending to your soldiers in the field; but if you are going to raise money to pay this debt and pay the expenses of this war, and thus save your country, I do not see any other way of doing it but by making every branch of your industry bear its share of that burden, and stand up manfully to the work. I beseech this Senate to pause before they exempt any portion of the industry of the country from this taxation, which is so necessary to pay for our expenses.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from New Hampshire pleads to have the Bible exempted from taxation.

Mr. CLARK. I have not done it.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says he has not done it. Perhaps I do the Senator injustice. He made the distinction then between the exemption of the Bible—

Mr. CLARK. I will state what I did say: that I saw some difficulties; I did not quite like to tax the Bible and Testament; but I besought the Senate to pause before they made a distinction in the branches of their industry.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Massachusetts does not quite like to tax the Bible. Sir, I do not like to tax it. My proposition is broader than his; but he knows very well that the real signification of Bible is book.

Mr. CLARK. Not in our language.

Mr. SUMNER. I do not know about that.

Mr. CLARK. I do not speak of it so.

Mr. SUMNER. I am not sure about that. The Senator does plead, however, for the manufacturer of the shirt, whose shop is by the side of the bookseller; but the difference between the two cases is that which I have already indicated; that if you tax the book you tax knowledge; if you tax the shirt you but tax one of the general manufactures of the country. The distinction may not be accepted by all persons; and yet to my mind it is perfectly clear. You cannot tax a book without taxing knowledge. But it is said that there are books that might very well be taxed out of existence. How can you run the line? How will you make the discrimination? The trouble is more than it is worth. It is better, therefore, to have no such tax than undertake to run any such line, or make any such discrimination. A book is a book; and there should be no tax on a book.

Mr. JOHNSON. If I thought the proposed tax would be in any way injurious to the knowledge of the country I should be opposed to it; but I do not consider this a tax on knowledge at all. It is a tax on occupation, a tax on trade, a tax on manufacture. It is not, to take the instance alluded to by the honorable member, a tax on the Bible. It is a tax on the publisher who makes it his vocation, his business, to publish Bibles, and who makes a very large profit by it. I suppose there are some publishing houses in the country that would make, if this tax is not imposed, some $70,000 or $80,000 more than they will make if this tax is imposed. But there are a variety of other books. Would the honorable member tax law books? There are, I do not know how many, but hundreds, perhaps thousands of law books published every year, and the publishers make a profit by the publication. Is it not fair that that business should be taxed?

Mr. SUMNER. My friends knows very well that that comes out of the lawyer who is obliged to buy the book.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course it does.

Mr. SUMNER. And my friend knows farther that it is the policy of our institutions to make justice cheap.

Mr. JOHNSON. It comes first out of the lawyer; but perhaps it comes out of the client. [Laughter.] If the client does not pay it in advance, the client who comes next pays it. I speak from some little experience. [Laughter.]

Now nobody would propose for a moment, in a Christian country, that any tax should be laid upon the Bible; that is, to prevent the circulation of the Bible throughout the country; but that is not to be the effect of this tax; and let me ask the honorable member, when he proposes to exempt all books from taxation, why does he not suggest the propriety of repealing the imposts upon foreign books?

Mr. SUMNER. I have always to a certain extent opposed that whenever I had the opportunity.

Mr. JOHNSON. To a certain extent, but not to an absolute extent.

Mr. SUMNER. I am ready to say to an absolute extent. I was obliged to yield to the pressure of others on this floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. You have not succeeded.

Mr. SUMNER. No; I have not succeeded, unfortunately.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then there is the impost on foreign books, and to the extent that that impost increases the price of books of the same kind manufactured here it is a tax on knowledge if the honorable member is right in supposing that a tax of this description is in the proper sense of the term a tax upon knowledge. But as long as you protect the American publisher by laying a tax on the foreign publisher, and put it out of the power of the American consumer, so to speak, to receive the books as cheap as he would if you had no impost tax upon books, why is it not fair, why is it not just to make the American publisher, who is but a manufacturer, pay for the privilege, for the security which we give him by the foreign impost, the same rate of taxation we impose on everybody else who manufactures articles that could be imported cheaper but for the duty?

But the honorable member is very much mistaken in supposing that this will not affect the revenue. He said to-day, and I felt the force of his objection, that he would not buy a picture for $25,000, $2,000 of which was to be paid annually so that the payment would run through ten or twelve years in this condition of the country. When we were in a mighty war, when the credit of the country was in a state of absolute peril, he would not agree even to vote an appropriation of $25,000 to be expended in annual installments of $2,000 each, because it would affect more or less the condition of the country; and yet he proposes now to strike out of this bill provisions which will yield hundreds of thousands of dollars to the Treasury. There are some publishing houses alone that will pay under this tax, and make money still, from eighty to one hundred thousand dollars; and if you except the whole of them I do not think I can be mistaken in saying that it will at least keep from going into the Treasury full $500,000.

The other day, at the instance of the newspapers principally, the House of Representatives agreed to reduce the duty upon imported printing paper from twenty per cent. down to three per cent., and our committee proposed to change it, I believe, so as to make it fifteen instead of twenty per cent., being a reduction of five per cent. I understood that after paper was cheapened, which it was thought would be the operation of the reduction of the tax, our people could publish just as cheap as could be done anywhere else. Now you propose to take out of the operation of this tax almost everything that is printed upon paper except newspapers.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it be in order, I move to strike out all after the word "Bibles" in the five hundred and fifteenth line, down to the word "schools."

Mr. JOHNSON and others. We have not got there yet.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I propose to get there if it is in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that the pending amendment is an amendment to an amendment, and it is not in order to amend that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. But the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to strike out a great deal. Before that motion is put, I propose to strike out less.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in order at this time. The pending amendment is an amendment to another amendment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I desire to state what I intend by my amendment. I am willing to exempt the Bible from taxation, but I think we had better not exempt any other books.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will allow me, I will suggest how we may get at that to accomplish his purpose. The Senator from Massachusetts proposes to add words to the amendment of the committee. If that amendment is rejected, then when we come to the clause to which the Senator has turned his attention we can amend that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is what I propose to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SUMNER. I have only one word to say in reply to the learned Senator from Maryland. He does not regard a tax on books as a tax on knowledge. Pray, then, what is a tax on knowledge? I cannot imagine any tax more directly a tax on knowledge than a tax on books. If the Senator from Maryland can imagine a tax more clearly on knowledge, I should like to have him indicate it. Possibly he can. I believe, however, he cannot. If we go to the experience of other countries, I believe we shall find that books have not been taxed. If we go to England, which is the country where taxation has been carried to the farthest point, we know that books are not taxed. We know, also, that after a long and protracted struggle, only during this last year was the last tax on knowledge overthrown, being the paper duty. And yet, sir, Senators propose to take up the cast-off taxes of Great Britain and carry them still further. Great Britain has taxed paper, has imposed a stamp tax also on newspapers, all of which have been latterly removed, but I am not aware that Great Britain has heretofore imposed a tax upon books. It is reserved for this Republic, founded on knowledge, whose duty it is to make knowledge cheap, to impose, for the first time, a tax on books. I hope no such thing will be done.

Mr. WILSON. I shall vote against exempting from taxation any book whatever, even the Bible. I do not believe that the men of the country who buy and read the Bible will object to paying this tax. They will be the last men in the country who will object, and they are generally people able to pay the tax. As to a tax on a book being a tax on knowledge any more than is a tax on a hat, or a coat, or a shoe, or any article that a man wears, I cannot comprehend it. As to the suggestion that we are taking up the cast-off clothes of Great Britain, I have simply to say that we want to raise money to carry us through this struggle that we are in. We are casting about and taxing everybody and everything. There was a time when Great Britain was in trouble and did the same thing, but when she got over it she began to cast away particular taxes, and we shall do so after the war. After we get through the war, after we are able to pay our expenses as we go, we shall cut off from the right hand and the left and relieve taxation wherever we can. That is the lesson I read in the action of Great Britain.

I am against these exemptions. What, sir, a tax on books a tax on knowledge! Suppose it is, so is a tax on the coat the boy who goes to school wears. May you not tax him a little on his books as well as on his clothes? I do not see the distinction. I think you will find that the great mass of the books of the country are printed by rich men, are read by men who are able to pay. The men who purchase books and put them into large libraries can pay a large tax on books as well as on anything else, and books will bear a tax a great deal better than many articles.

While I am up I will say another thing about these exemptions. We profess to exempt from the income tax for the benefit of poor people persons who have incomes under $600, and the practical effect is that you exempt a majority of all the incomes of the country in amount from taxation. Men worth their tens of thousands of dollars, and whole communities, exempt themselves under that exemption of $600. I know men for whose property I would willingly give to-day twenty-five or thirty thousand dollars who pay no income tax because they have not incomes above $600! The largest portion of the country keep out of taxes under that rule.

I am going to vote for this bill, as I vote for all tax bills and war bills, and everything that I think helps the country through this contest, but I think a bill could have been drawn up which would be of a great deal more service than this, and that is a bill to reorganize entirely the internal revenue department of this Government. I believe that if it was reorganized as it ought to be, with the present law it would bring at least $50,000,000 into the Treasury more than comes in now, and I think that is a work which this Congress should have addressed itself to, but I find that we are neglecting it altogether.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the honorable Senator what defect there is in the law now.

Mr. WILSON. There is defect in it. We expected it to be corrected at the last session, and we were told that it was to be to some extent, but instead of being corrected then, it has not been corrected yet.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator means that there is defect in the execution of the law.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, and in the law itself that allows such things. You will have faulty execution when you have got a faulty law. Every dollar collected should be paid and paid immediately into the Treasury of the United States. Not a farthing of it should be used to pay any debt or any officer whatever. The officers should be paid by appropriations out of your Treasury. Instead of that, a report made to Congress shows $8,000,000 in the hands of the collectors, and I would stake my life to-day it is nearer $20,000,000. That department does not know how much is in their hands. I tell you the department is loose from beginning to end, loose in law and more so in administration.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the honorable member think that is the fault of the law itself?

Mr. WILSON. I say it is the fault of the law to a great extent, but we ought to change this thing and take away all this responsibility, and ought to require the money collected to be immediately deposited and the officers paid by appropriations out of the Treasury, then we should not have a report made to Congress showing that your collectors have on an average $40,000 apiece in their hands. Fifty of the collectors are known to have more than $8,000,000; one collector holding $700,000, another $450,000, another $425,000.

In the brief space of two and a half years this internal revenue system has developed into its present vast proportions. By this internal revenue system the nation for years to come must raise the means to meet the extraordinary demands upon the Treasury of the United States. How important it is, then, that the modes, means, and agencies adopted to levy and collect hundreds of millions from various multitudinous sources shall be economical, equal, and safe. No one believes the present system, in its administration, to be either economical, equal, or safe. Resting upon no fixed, intelligent, or equitable basis, arranged, rearranged, and changed continually, the system is daily growing more unequal, extravagant, and unsafe. I assert it here in my place in the Senate that the present system of assessing and collecting the internal revenue is daily growing more unequal and more extravagant—that the measure of compensation is not according to the labor performed, but according to the urgency of the demands made upon the Government.

To show the inequalities in the workings of the internal revenue system I present, in regard to clerk hire and stationery for assessors, a few statistics which cannot fail to convince Senators of the truth of the declarations I have made. In ten districts of New York and Pennsylvania, compared with ten districts in Baltimore, Cincinnati, Providence, Pittsburg, Milwaukee, and other portions of the country, the results are as follows: in New York and Pennsylvania two hundred and seventy-six thousand names assessed cost for stationery $19,795; in the other ten districts two hundred and ninety-five thousand names were assessed, costing for stationery $4,310, being a cost of seven cents and one and six tenths mills per name for the ten districts of New York and Pennsylvania and only one mill and four tenths for the other ten districts. These statistics show that the ten districts of New York and Pennsylvania cost five times more for stationery per name than the other ten districts, embracing cities like Baltimore, Cincinnati, Providence, Pittsburg, and Milwaukee. The inequalities of the expenditures for stationery in the offices of the assessors are demonstrated by a comparison made between the thirty-second district of New York and thirty-eight other districts in various portions of the country. The amount paid to the assessor of the thirty-second district of New York to the 30th of June, 1864, is $3,071. The amount paid to thirty-eight other districts is $3,110. The number of names assessed in the thirty-second district of New York is estimated at thirty-six thousand. The number of names assessed in the thirty-eight other districts is estimated at four hundred and seventy-seven thousand; showing that the cost per name in the thirty-second district of New York is eight cents and five and a half mills, and the cost of the thirty-eight other districts is only six and a half mills per name, being more than twelve times larger in the thirty-second district of New York than in the thirty-eight other districts of the country.

The inequalities in the rates paid for clerk hire are as great as the inequalities in the amounts paid for stationery. In twelve districts of New York and Pennsylvania, in which one hundred and ninety-three thousand persons were assessed and $12,283,000 were collected, $42,800 were paid for clerk hire. In ten other districts, in which one hundred and ninety-three thousand persons were assessed and $12,784,000 were collected, only $14,100 were paid for clerk hire. In the District of Columbia nineteen thousand persons were assessed and only $800 paid for clerk hire; while in the ninth district of New York twelve thousand persons were assessed and $4,000 paid for clerk hire. In the first district of Wisconsin sixteen thousand persons were assessed and $617,000 collected, and only $800 paid for clerk hire; while in the seventh district of New York fifteen thousand persons were assessed and $502,000 were collected, and $4,000 paid for clerk hire. In the several districts of New York $61,200 were paid for clerk hire, while only $38,550 were paid for clerk hire in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Ohio; showing that fifty per cent. more was paid for clerk hire in New York than was paid in the same number of districts collecting about the same amount of money in Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Ohio.

The amounts allowed for clerk hire and for stationery have little relation to the number of persons assessed or to the amounts of the assessments. They are grossly unequal and utterly indefensible. The clerk-hire allowances in New York and Philadelphia are enormously out of proportion to the other cities and States. The amounts paid for clerk hire and for stationery should be measured by the number of persons assessed, and not the amounts for which they are assessed. The allowances fixed by this bill are based upon the number of persons assessed and the extra cost of living in large cities. It increases, in the aggregate, the allowance to assessors for clerk hire about five thousand dollars, increasing the allowances in one hundred and sixteen districts, reducing the extravagant allowances of some districts. This proposed method of making allowances for stationery and clerk hire will more nearly equalize the amounts paid in the several districts, and reduce these expenditures in the aggregate about twenty thousand dollars. This mode of making allowances rests upon an intelligible basis, and it also provides for any increase of business and any diminution of business in any or all of the districts.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the honorable member is right as to his facts, as I take it for granted he is, I am very much surprised for one, and I cannot think that the mischiefs which certainly exist, if he is right as to his facts, can be attributed to the law; certainly not to the law exclusively. They must be owing to its administration. I agree with him, and I suppose every Senator would agree with him, that it is very bad policy to leave such large amounts of money in the hands of these collectors; that the money ought to go into the Treasury, and that it should be paid out by a check upon the Treasury. But I do not know that at this time of the session we can provide by legislation against any such mischief. I should like to know from the honorable member whether he has brought the condition of this bureau or department to the attention of the Secretary or to the attention of the President. It seems to me that if the facts are as he supposes them, the fault is in the incumbent principally and not in the law, and that the incumbent should either have been removed or have been instructed to pursue a different course; and if the honorable member had brought it to the attention of the President or the superior officer, I suppose the correction would have been made. But however that may be, it is now too late to provide a remedy by any legislation at this session. What we want is the passage of this law in some shape or other. Money we must have, or the credit of the country will very much suffer.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Massachusetts I think has been a little careless in some of his statements. It is too grave a matter to allow statements of this character to go to the community, thus creating dissatisfaction in regard to the system of taxation, when perhaps there is not so much foundation for them as is supposed.

There is no defect in the law. The only foundation for the Senator's complaint is that there have been gross inequalities in the allowances for stationery and clerk hire. That at least is the principal complaint. I have nothing to say in regard to the present incumbent of this office, whether he is the best man or not for it. The President has nominated him and he is now the officer.

Mr. NYE. Has the present incumbent anything to do with the appointment or removal of these several officers? I understand he has not.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will refer to that. I have seen all the tables to which reference is made, and the complaint now is that there has been gross inequality in the allowances for clerk hire and stationery in different districts of the United States, and if you look at the tables alone, without being informed about the facts, they do present a case of gross inequality in these allowances. Under the law these accounts all had to be submitted to the supervision of the proper officers of the Treasury. The question arose, who are the proper officers? and it was decided in the office of Internal Revenue, and also by the Solicitor of the Treasury, that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue was the proper officer. I do not think so. I think the proper officers were the Auditor and Comptroller. To obviate that defect in the law, and to cure this erroneous construction, we have provided in one of the amendments already acted on that the accounting officers of the Treasury shall pass on all these accounts, and under the law as it now stands these claims for clerk hire and stationery must all pass under the supervision of the Fifth Auditor and the First Comptroller, two as honest men, I believe, as there are in the Government at Washington.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator if this bill does not provide for the creation of a new Auditor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, and I intended to explain that. The Fifth Auditor, on account of the vast accumulation of business in his office, is so far behind that he is not able to take the burden of this duty on him and discharge his other duties; and therefore on the recommendation of Mr. BOUTWELL, the old Commissioner, from the State of the Senator from Massachusetts, this provision for a new Auditor was inserted. The section for the new Auditor was framed by his colleague in the other House, Mr. BOUTWELL, for the purpose of relieving the Fifth Auditor and for the purpose of having an additional supervision over the accounts of the various collectors and assessors throughout the country, and it was adopted by the Committee on Finance to enable this new Auditor to give to this class of accounts the supervision demanded by the law. The Fifth Auditor is one of the accounting officers of the Treasury whose business it is now to scrutinize these accounts.

In my judgment, it was manifestly improper and wrong for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to have anything to do with these accounts. I do not myself see how such a construction could be put upon the law. The law is plain that the accounts must be submitted to the proper officers of the Treasury. When those words were to be construed, the purpose and object of the law should have been thought of, and that was to submit the accounts to the accounting officers, for they are the only proper officers; but to remove all ambiguity, we now propose to require them to be submitted to the accounting officers, and we have provided for a new Auditor, whose especial duty it shall be to examine into these accounts and to see that they are all correct and proper. I do not believe there has been any system of fraud, because I have heard none alleged. The only complaint I have heard is that there has been gross inequality in the allowances for these different things.

I do not now seek to prolong this discussion. I asked the Senator what defect there was in the law. There is none in the law; it is in the execution of the law. The law allows to these collectors and assessors only enough stationery to conduct their business, and only enough clerk hire to discharge their duties. It is impossible to say by law how many clerks every assessor and every collector shall have. We cannot prescribe it by law. In the cities they want more or less; in the country districts, covering a large extent of country, they want sometimes more and sometimes less. It is not dependent on the amount of income produced; it depends on a variety of causes; and we cannot by law prescribe how many clerks they shall have, or what amount of stationery they shall have, because there is such a variety in the extent of the districts, the amount of the receipts, the nature of the business, and the character of the returns and the expense of the stationery, that it is impossible to fix any standard or rule by law. All these matters must be left to the proper officers in passing on the accounts, and under the law, as we now propose to amend it, all of them will be submitted to the proper Auditor of the Government.

If the Senator knows of any fraud or anything wrong in this department, it is his duty to go to the President of the United States and make complaint against the officer who is delinquent. If he believes what he now alleges, that there is gross injustice and wrong in the administration of this department, it is his duty not only to expose it publicly but to go to the fountain-head of executive patronage, where alone is the power to correct it by placing some other officer in charge of this most important bureau of the Government.

I do not like to hear anything said, without grave consideration, that affects the character of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, because it tends very seriously to affect the confidence of the people in the just administration of our tax system. The people of this country are willing to pay taxes if they are honestly collected and honestly applied; but if you infuse into their minds the idea that they are not honestly collected or are not honestly applied, you make them dissatisfied with the whole system; and therefore anything that throws the slightest taint or shadow of suspicion on any one connected with the collection of internal revenue, in my judgment ought to be promptly corrected and promptly punished.

Mr. WILSON. I do not certainly wish to detain the Senate—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The immediate question before the Senate is the amendment moved by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] in reference to books.

Mr. WILSON. But the whole subject of the bill is open, I suppose. I desire to say a word or two in reply to the Senator from Ohio. I do not charge the fault to be altogether with the law. I think it more with the execution of the law than with the law itself. I think this is a great department, and it ought to have at its head one of the foremost minds of the country. We ought to have more than one, perhaps a commission of three of the ablest men, to take charge of this subject of taxation. We certainly ought to have in that office some of the ablest accountants on this continent. I do not say they are not there now, but I say the office is in a condition that does not demonstrate it.

I think the proposition for a new Auditor is a great mistake, and I will tell you why it is a mistake. The Fifth Auditor's office is not behind-hand in this business. It has trained men who understand all about the business, and who can do more in one month than your new office will be able to do the next four months; and why? They have been working upon these accounts, and they understand all the rulings in regard to them. It was only in July last that these accounts were put into their hands to settle. Twenty-two months had passed away since the internal revenue system was put in operation, and the accounts when put into their hands were in such a condition that they could not be settled, and they were sent back and held in the Internal Revenue office until after the 4th of last July. Then they were put in the Fifth Auditor's office, and more than two months ago that office had brought up the first year of them. The Fifth Auditor's office, before these accounts were sent to it, had to let its men out to other offices because they had nothing to do. They do not want an additional clerk in that office; they have abundance of help. The men are trained men who understand this business and know all about it; and let me tell you further that there are in that office men who are fit to be at the head of a comptroller's office, or to occupy almost any other place in the Department. I speak of one man in particular, whom I have known for thirty years, and I know but few minds in any office of the city of Washington equal to his. I tell you, you will lose instead of gaining by this provision for a new Auditor, for the next five or six months at any rate. In the course of six months, perhaps, you can get new men trained to the business, or you may transfer the trained men from the Fifth Auditor's office and then begin right.

The Senator from Ohio alluded to the facts which I brought before the Senate. I am a little sensitive in regard to the correctness of any statement which I make in reference to facts. I do not make much trouble on a law point, but I do not like to give up any statement of a fact which I have made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not deny the fact. I said the tables to which the Senator referred show gross inequality; but I have no doubt many of them are explainable.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator confesses that the tables show inequalities—

Mr. SHERMAN. I said that distinctly.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the Senator how in the world it can happen that here in the city of Washington, with eighteen thousand persons taxed, and a revenue of five or six hundred thousand dollars, the clerk hire costs $300; and yet in some districts in the country, with only twelve thousand names, about two thirds of the number, the clerk hire is $4,000, and they are asking for more, and they are the men who get it too; they are the men who get the extra allowances. The allowances are not based on any settled principle, but upon the urgency of the claim for great compensation. I think this can be corrected to some extent by legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON. We cannot do it now at this session.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not mean to prolong this discussion; but I wish to say here that at the proper time I shall endeavor to show that the expense of these officers for clerk hire and for stationery can be regulated and limited by law; that there is no difficulty about it; and secondly, I shall endeavor to show at the proper time that the proposition to create a new Auditor in the Treasury Department is fraught with all the mischiefs and all the dangers which have been suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts; that there is no necessity for it, and that it will work great mischief instead of benefit.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the question which is now before them, and that is in reference to the amendment of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] to exempt magazines and all other books from taxation. I desire to state that my opinion is that the great publishing houses of this country are simply great manufacturing establishments, and as such should be subject to taxation, as are all other manufacturing establishments. Otherwise, the labor that enters into the production of these magazines and books is exempt from all duties or liabilities to the Government, and I do not believe that the employees of these immense establishments desire to be exempted from the burdens incident to the necessities of the time.

I go further than this, sir; I do not believe that the newspaper publisher himself feels as well that he is exempt from taxation at this time as he would if he was bearing the burdens incident to the war which all other interests bear. I do not believe the man who writes for the magazines—I should not if I were capable of writing for a magazine—feels satisfied to be exempt from taxation at a time like this; and I am sure those who read them will not read them with the same feelings of interest that they would if they were taxed. And so, sir, of all other productions. All printed matter should, it seems to me, come under the same category with other interests that are now subject to taxation.

One of the Senators from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has exemplified this question very satisfactorily, certainly to me, by the suggestion that taxation upon the skill and industry of the country is a tax upon education, and there is no distinction in that respect. Taxation, to be perfect, to be thorough, should be upon luxuries and necessities. Magazines and newspapers have become necessities for the people of this country. They will read them, and they will bear the proportion of tax necessary, certainly enough to prevent any invidious distinction between manufacturers of different classes. I believe the people of the country, the people who read, the people who write, will be willing to pay the tax which is required by the bill from the House of Representatives, and I only wish there was a way in which newspapers could be coupled with magazines and all other productions, including the Bible.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, my colleague did not see the difference between a tax on a boy's clothes and a tax on his book. The country in its experience, from the first settlement at Plymouth Rock, has seen that difference. I saw it when it undertook to say that education should be at the public cost, free of charge to every one in the community. My friend [Mr. Howe] shakes his head; he knows very well that one of the proudest acts in the history of New England was when at an early day she established her system of public schools, and that system has continued ever since, where every child goes to the public school free of cost. It was not at that time proposed that he should be clothed at the public cost, but they did propose to give him an education at the public cost. And, sir, if you wish to know what gave to New England those elements of prosperity and of influence which I think sometimes recognized, you will find it in that very education at the public cost. It was because at that early day they saw that it was important that the mind should be clothed, and the public willingly undertook to do it. They left to the family at home to clothe the body; and there, sir, is the precise difference between the two cases. Now, we propose that the country should simply act according to the original great precedent of our history, that which has done so much for the national character and the national fame, by removing every impediment possible in the path of knowledge. Do not tell me that by the same rule you must remove the tax from the clothes. The argument is not sound, the conclusion does not follow. If our fathers were right in establishing free schools, I say it is right for us now to have free books.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I have listened to this debate, and it reminds me that we are governed a great deal by names. There is a great deal of influence in the name we give to a thing; and this tax on knowledge has been held up as one of the greatest bugbears in our path. If we could really tax knowledge, put a heavy tax on it, not on any of its incidents or accidents, I think it would be one of the most fruitful sources of taxation and revenue to this Government, and let every man give in his own inventory when he was taxed. [Laughter.] I do not know but that it would bear pretty heavily on some members of this body [laughter] when we were called on to give in our inventory of how much we knew of certain things. It would swell up one of the most tremendous sources of revenue we could possibly hit.

Mr. CONNESS. It would beat Lanman's Dictionary. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. It strikes me after all that there is not much in it, and I cannot see myself this distinction which my friend points out between the boy and his clothes. Take a boy's coat and shirt away from him, and he is in a bad condition to pursue knowledge; he would be indeed pursuing knowledge under difficulties. It is absolutely necessary that the boy should have his clothes. These schools are generally kept in the winter in New England, and each boy must have a pair of new shoes or boots to go to school, and mittens my friend [Mr. SUMNER] says; and it seems to me to be a refinement to undertake to say that a tax on a mere book is a tax on knowledge, and that a tax on all these incidents and accidents, and so forth, that are just as necessary as the book, is not a tax on knowledge. I confess that I concur with the Senator's colleague [Mr. WILSON] rather than with himself. Owing to the Senator's experience in his early New England life, bred up in the country, a son of the common schools, while his more learned colleague may be said to be the child of the universities, [laughter,] I think his experience and judgment on this subject are worth more—I say it with perfect kindness and great respect—and where the two Massachusetts Senators differ I am inclined to follow the one who I think is best qualified to give advice, and therefore I shall vote for a "tax on knowledge." [Laughter.]

Mr. FARWELL. Mr. President, I do not propose to detain the Senate long, but I feel as though I ought to say a word on the subject at this time. I have a different idea about taxation from a good many Senators if I have understood them rightly. I believe that taxes are to be paid by the labor of the country. You may raise a little out of the great mass of wealth that has been accumulated, but I find that it is very hard to get at. The only item of taxation that strikes directly at the accumulated wealth of the country is the income tax, and I believe it is the experience of the tax-gatherers, and of all men of experience, and who have observed the collection of the tax, that that of all others is the least collected, that in the collection of it there is the largest amount, in proportion to the whole, that escapes the tax. As to this tax upon books, it seems to me that it is one of those taxes that will in a greater measure than almost any other draw from the wealth and from the accumulated wealth of the country. The books that are bought by the poor, and that are bought for the purpose of education, are generally cheap books; they are not your gilt-edged books at ten, twenty, or fifty dollars a volume, but they are cheap books at twenty or fifty cents a volume, which have to pay one or two cents a volume to the Treasury under this law.

The Senator from Massachusetts who speaks so highly of the New England provisions that everybody should be educated at the public expense, did not go quite far enough in regard to this measure. The New England States have provided, every one of them, I think, that in all cases where it is inconvenient for the parent to provide the necessary books for his children attending the public schools they shall be purchased at the public expense on a mere application to the superintendent or superintending school committee, and it creates no pauperism and no disability with the parent, and is even not exposed to the neighbors.

I take it that this tax upon books is not a tax upon the manufacturers or publishers; they will get as much profit, in this case and in all the other cases, as they would if there was no tax on them. I believe that where the Government puts on a two-cent tax, they add three cents to the price when they sell. The tax at last is to fall upon labor, and my vote on all these questions will be governed by the amount that can be taken by the proposed amendment from the accumulated wealth, and thus relieve the labor and the laboring classes.

Mr. SUMNER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 5, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Davis, Harlan, Morgan, Saulsbury, and Sumner—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Johnson, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Doolittle, Foot, Hale, Harding, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—18.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLARK. Now, I hope the Senate will reject the amendment of the committee in regard to magazines.

Mr. HOWE. I differ from the Senator from New Hampshire. I hope the Senate will agree to this amendment as the Committee on Finance did agree to it. I voted against the proposition to exempt books from taxation because I believe, as we are informed, that the tax on that manufacture is paid by the consumer, as it is paid by the consumer on all other manufactures, and the publishers themselves say that the manufacture will stand the tax, and have advised us to keep it on, and upon all books uniformly, without any exception. I recently had in my possession a communication from a large number of them to that effect.

But our observation shows that in reference to magazines the consumers do not pay the tax, will not pay it, and therefore the effect of imposing the tax must be to close out the magazines. That is not for the interest of the country, nor for the interest of the revenue; for if you close up the publication of this particular character of literature you get no revenue, and the evidence that consumption will not take them and pay the tax is made most manifest to us by the fact that of the whole number of magazines published in the country, as I understand, there are but two that have, in the whole progress of this inflation of prices, ventured to raise the price of their publications. There are just two magazines, as I am told, that have been raised from three dollars per year to four dollars. It is an increase of thirty-three and a third per cent. That does not begin to compensate for the increase in the price of the material they use and the labor they employ. Only two magazines, as I tell you, have ventured on that increase. Thus it is made most manifest that magazines cannot stand this tax; and there are two reasons why, as it seems to me, we should not crush out that kind of literature. One is that it is a cheap form of conveying intelligence to large portions of the community that could not afford to take it in any other or more expensive form. Another is, that they are the schools of literature; a great number of talented persons, and many of them females, are employed in writing for these magazines, and thus earn for themselves a subsistence, when if the magazines themselves were crushed out by taxation, it might be difficult for them to find any other vocation in which they could make themselves either so serviceable to themselves or so useful to the public at large. I know of no reason, therefore, why the Senate should hesitate to exempt this one class of literature from this taxation.

Mr. COWAN. It stands on precisely the same footing as the exemption of newspapers; and there is this difference between a magazine and a book: the book accommodates itself to the fluctuations of the currency from day to day; the magazine, being published on a contract, having time for its essence, it is impossible that the publisher can do that. It may be illustrated by the last year. On the 1st day of January, 1864, the subscription to a magazine at five dollars was worth but $3.25. On the 1st day of January it was $1.65, for the reason that the currency had depreciated during that time about fifty cents on the dollar. There being no way in the world to protect against that, there is nothing left but for the publisher himself to pay the tax and to pay for the fluctuations. In regard to a book the price rises precisely as the currency depreciates. If a book be worth one dollar when currency is seventy-five, when currency falls to fifty you can make the price of the book a dollar and a quarter or a dollar and a half, and it is all within the reach of the publisher. Newspapers were exempted for the reason that if they were not exempted, and some protection given to them against the depreciation of the currency, they would all be crushed in these fluctuations, and if they are exempted, magazines stand precisely on the same footing.

Mr. CLARK called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Chair be good enough to state the question?

THE VICE PRESIDENT. It is proposed to insert on page 22, after the word "forms," in line five hundred and ten, the words "by striking out of the clause relating to printed books, the word 'magazines,' and by inserting after the word 'newspapers,' the words 'periodical magazines.'"

Mr. CLARK. I find by their inquiries that Senators do not quite understand the effect of the amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. Of course we cannot in a bill framed as this is.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Rhode Island says of course not, for we cannot understand the bill; and it is not to be wondered at, in the way that it is printed and comes before the Senate. The committee propose to amend the bill so as to exempt magazines from taxation. I oppose the exemption, and desire the yeas and nays upon this amendment of the committee. Of course those who desire the magazines to be taxed will vote "nay." This amendment does not affect newspapers, and there is a reason—perhaps not a very substantial one, but a good one so far as it goes—why magazines should be taxed and newspapers not; and that is that the newspapers furnish the current news of the day, and the magazines are made up of stories written here and there about the country for the amusement and instruction of those who happen to read them. I have only to say that if the magazine is not of sufficient value to stand the imposition of a tax of five per cent. ad valorem it might as well go out.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance have placed magazines on the same footing with newspapers. It is pretty difficult to defend the exemption of newspapers from a tax. There are vast establishments in this country, publishing fifty thousand sheets a day, that are certainly able to pay this tax, just as much as those who are affected by a thousand other taxes in this bill are able to pay them. This, however, we considered as a closed question. It was debated at the last session, and newspapers were excepted from the operation of the tax. Now, what is the distinction between a newspaper and a magazine? The one is published every month, or periodically, and the other is published daily or weekly—they are both ephemeral in their nature—for the information of the people. The magazines are written almost entirely by the literary women of the country. We were informed that nine tenths of the matter contained in the magazines is written by literary ladies, who depend on this for their livelihood. We could not distinguish against these magazines, in favor of newspapers; therefore we propose to put them on the same footing, and exempt them all. My own inclination would rather be to put newspapers, magazines, Bibles, Testaments, books, novels, and printed matter of all kinds on the same list, subject to the same tax.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Ohio is aware that newspapers are taxed. They pay a tax of three per cent. on advertisements, which is much more than five per cent. on subscriptions would be.

Mr. SHERMAN. They all pay a tax on advertisements.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is as heavy a tax as any manufacturing business pays.

Mr. SHERMAN. Nearly all manufactured articles pay taxes in two or three forms.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, if I understand this question aright, books are taxed; that mode in which men of thought and women of thought communicate to others the result of their investigations is taxed; and newspapers, which convey to us the news of the day, are not taxed; and the proposition before the Senate now is to exempt from taxation magazines and publications of that character, and to put them upon the same footing as the newspapers which flash to us the news of the day. When I find that the thoughts of the scientific man, and of the historian, and the instructions of the philosophic mind are to be taxed, a proposition to exempt from taxation the childish trash of the day which appears in magazines cannot receive my assent.

Who reads the sickly, sentimental magazine? Who would read anything that appears in its pages? I trust that the scholars of the Senate, the men who pride themselves upon scholastic learning, the men who profess to have gone down to the deep fountains of knowledge, will not tax the books in which men of science and men of thought, and women of science and women of thought make known to mankind what they think. At any rate, I trust that such men as these, after voting to tax such publications as that, will not vote to except the trash that is put forth in the magazines. Sir, it is true that I take magazines. They have come into my house, and they have come for the amusement of my children, and if I choose to take them I am willing to pay for them for the amusement of my children. But if I have a leisure moment and want to find what men of sense and men of thought have said, and if I want to take into my library for the instruction of my children, when they shall arrive at the years of discretion and of manhood, that which shall be of advantage to them, I do not refer to the magazine. If I would tax a book, why should I not tax the miserable ephemeral effusions of the hour? Sir, I sometimes, when I find them in my house, take them up and look at them for a moment. I find nothing of elevation of thought, nothing that can guide ripened manhood in the discharge of its duties; but I find sentimental love tales adapted to young girls, and pleasing to young men who are endeavoring to deceive young girls. If books of thought and books of sense are to be taxed, let the ephemeral productions of the hour be taxed also.

I shall therefore vote in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire. If the proposition could be arrived at not to tax knowledge or information in any of its avenues, I would vote not to tax it; I would not vote to tax a newspaper, a magazine, or a book.

Mr. COWAN. Will the honorable Senator allow me to ask him whether I have not seen his speeches within the covers of the Continental Monthly? [Laughter.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir. Humbuggery is the order of the hour, and I did once buy a copy of the Continental Monthly. Finding no sense in it, I tore out that which was in it, and having some four or five speeches of my own that I had the vanity to think there was some sense in, I stitched them inside of the cover of the Continental Monthly. [Laughter.]

Sir, I recollect the time when the American Review was published; I recollect the time when I took the London Quarterly, the Edinburgh Review, and the North Briton. I found a great many readable articles in them, and I have many of those publications now in my library, from their first numbers until a very recent date, until I found them treating of subjects that they knew nothing about, and advancing theories which my honorable friend from Pennsylvania will allow me to say do not receive such implicit faith from him as they do from some of his associates. I then ceased to take them. As a general thing, I know now of no magazine in this country that contains articles which a man of thought can afford to read. They are filled with love-sick tales that young ladies and young gentlemen may amuse themselves for an hour in gossiping over, instead of reading that substantial literature which enlightens the mind and gives to thought a tone, that should guide it and control it and strengthen the mind as a link to sensible conversation. Since such literature has taken the place of the former literature of the country, and it is found in reviews and magazines, and you put a tax upon books, scientific books, historical books, I will not vote to exempt from that burden such publications as these.

Sir, the great fault of the times is, that instead of studying the great lessons of history, the great truths taught by history, our people are satisfied with the ephemeral productions of the hour. When you tax that kind of information which enlightens the mind and ennobles the soul, do not ask me to exempt from the burden of taxation the common trash of the day, which no man of sense has time to read or ought to read. If you leave all free, I say to you frankly I would not tax a book; I would not tax a newspaper; I would not tax a magazine; I would let knowledge go forth to the people through any of its avenues, and let them learn all they can, and not put padlocks on the mind, but leave thought free, unconfined. But if you will make a discrimination against knowledge, against thought, and come and ask me to cooperate in that discrimination and in favor of that species of literature which is of that sort that my children have not time and ought not to read, I will not consent to the proposition.

Mr. GRIMES. I concur with the Senator from New Hampshire that any magazine that is not able to pay eleven mills on a monthly number, or one cent and one tenth, or that is not able to pay fifteen cents on an annual subscription of three dollars, might as well die. The Senator from Ohio says he is unable to see any distinction between newspapers and magazines. It is very apparent to my mind that there is just exactly the same distinction between newspapers and magazines that there is between the substantial viands you have on your table that are necessary to support life and those luxuries that are only calculated to excite the system and produce disease in nine cases out of ten. The newspaper has become, and is to almost every man in the country, a necessity. It contains the report of the markets; it contains what it is necessary for him to be informed about in order to govern his everyday transactions of life; it brings to him the foreign news and the domestic news; it gives him all the county and township news; whereas the magazine, as a general thing, especially that class of magazines which I understand from this debate it is more designed by this provision to protect than any other, is only calculated, if not to demoralize, to impair the intellectual capacities of their readers. I trust that we shall put the publishers of these magazines upon precisely the same footing that we put the publishers of newspapers. Let them pay their proportion of the burdens of Government, just as much as you compel the farmers in my State to pay their proportion upon what they produce. If they cannot make it profitable they will go into some other business.

Mr. CONNESS. I desire to inquire whether the question now is on the committee's amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Conness, Cowan, Farwell, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Van Winkle, and Wiley—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Clark, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Saulsbury, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Wilson, and Wright—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Collamer, Foot, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—18.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like now to have a vote on the next amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment of the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was on page 22, line five hundred and fifteen, to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That Bibles and Testaments, or volumes consisting only of parts of either, prayer-books, arithmetics, spelling-books, geographies, grammars, and school-books of the kinds used in common and primary schools, and all books printed exclusively for the use of Sunday-schools, shall be exempt from any duty or tax, anything to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided further, That this exemption shall not apply to any volume which is valued at more than two dollars.

Mr. SUMNER. I hope that will not be stricken out. I hope the Senate will follow the House. This was introduced into this bill by the House, and the question now is, whether we shall strike out what the House has introduced on this subject. I think we had better in that respect follow the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I rise with the consent of the Senator from Ohio to move an adjournment; but before doing so I move to take up Senate bill No. 419, a bill which is upon its passage, and upon which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COWAN. I believe that is out of order while another motion is pending.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island submit a motion to adjourn?

Mr. SPRAGUE. No, sir; but to postpone the further consideration of this subject, and take up Senate bill No. 419, after which I will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. COWAN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 27, 1865.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

CHARLES A. PITCHER.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 338, for the relief of Charles A. Pitcher.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object.

Mr. HALE. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose I have indicated.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 42, noes 20; no quorum voting.

Mr. HALE. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw his objection. I do not propose to call for the previous question, but to let the bill be discussed.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I object to this bill for the reasons assigned by the Committee on the Judiciary at the last session. It was reported against by that committee, and that report was adopted by the House. I have seen no reason to change my opinion on the subject.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Messrs. HALE and BOUTWELL.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 42, noes 23; no quorum voting.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my motion.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill amendatory of certain acts imposing duties on foreign importations; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I want to have an evening session for the purpose of considering that bill, and whatever other business may be ready.

Mr. STEVENS. Let the evening session be confined to the consideration of the tariff bill alone.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

Mr. BROOKS. I object until I know what it is.

Mr. PRUYN. I hope that the loan bill will also be considered. The Secretary of the Treasury is anxious about that bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think there is anything in the tariff bill that gentlemen will object to. It is not proposed to go into a general revision of the tariff at this session. Having imposed as high duties upon liquors at home as from abroad, and having raised the internal duties upon petroleum and cotton, we only change the tariff to harmonize with the internal duties; and we provide also for a change in the mode of estimating the value of goods imported from abroad.

Mr. BROOKS. Let the tariff bill be read, so that we may know what it is. Reporting it now and proposing to take action to-night is rather rapid.

Mr. MORRILL. This is the last week of the session.

Mr. BROOKS. Let it be read and I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. STROUSE. I renew the objection.

The SPEAKER. An evening session can be ordered by a majority vote.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the House take a recess from half past four o'clock, p. m., till seven o'clock, p. m., in order that there may be an evening session.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move that the evening session this evening be set apart for the consideration of the tariff bill.

The bill was read.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Will the bill be printed?

Mr. MORRILL. It will.

The motion was agreed to.

BUSINESS OF NAVAL COMMITTEE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask that by unanimous consent to-morrow evening be set aside for the consideration of business from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to make that motion.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If the gentleman will except the bill for the relief of the builders of the iron-clads I will not object.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I have no authority to except anything. I was directed to ask this permission.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does the gentleman propose to bring that matter before the House?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. There is a bill of that nature before the Senate, and if it comes from the Senate to the House between this time and that it will be beyond my control.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the House will not suspend the rule as broadly as the gentleman asks. If the motion is voted down, I will then move to suspend the rules for that purpose, with the exception I have mentioned.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I now move that to-morrow evening be specially assigned for the consideration of business from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. STEVENS obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. For what?

Mr. HALE. I want to ask unanimous consent that the morning hour to-morrow be devoted to receiving reports of bills of a private nature.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the House has ordered that the morning hour shall not be interfered with. The Chair would also state that it is doubtful whether any morning-hour business will be transacted during the remainder of the session.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot yield for that purpose.

CLAIMS OF KENTUCKY AND MISSOURI.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill of the House (No. 359) for reimbursing the States of Kentucky and Missouri moneys expended in organizing, arming, and equipping troops, and that the same be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STEVENS. That bill has been referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. MALLORY. It has, but I want to have it slightly changed, and therefore I want it recommitted.

No objection being made, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of said bill, and the same was recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

FORTIFICATION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I am directed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repair of certain fortifications and other works of defense, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The committee recommend concurrence in all the Senate amendments.

The appropriations of the House are all cut down one half by the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would ask whether any appropriations have been entirely cut off, or whether they are all there but only cut down?

Mr. STEVENS. They are all in the bill, but are reduced just one half, except the first one, which is reduced from $125,000 to $75,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I would inquire of the gentleman whether he thinks it is proper that the deduction of one half should be made indiscriminately. There are places on the coast—for instance, the city of New York—where fortifications of very great importance are in progress; the safety both of the city and, to some extent, the State, is involved. It seems to me there ought to be some discrimination made. Has the Committee of Ways and Means carefully considered the subject?

Mr. STEVENS. The Senate cut down all the appropriations one half; and upon an examination, the Committee of Ways and Means were rather of opinion that what was left was as much as could be profitably expended during the year; and hence they agreed to concur in the amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were all concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the vote by which the amendments were concurred in be reconsidered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866.

No objection being made, the amendments were considered in the House.

First amendment:

At the end of the bill strike out the following proviso: Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be used for the purpose of paying any railway company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States, when such company may have accepted a grant of lands from Congress upon condition of furnishing said transportation free of toll or other charge, except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Second amendment:

Add the following as an additional section: And be it further enacted, That to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the current fiscal year for ordnance, ordnance stores, and supplies, including the purchase and manufacture of arms, accoutrements, and horse equipments for volunteers and regulars, the sum of $7,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] whether this is a second deficiency item—one in addition to what was originally in the deficiency bill?

Mr. STEVENS. It is.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence in the amendment of the Senate. The question will be upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Third amendment:

Insert the following: And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of March, 1865, and during the continuance of the present rebellion, the commutation price of officers' subsistence shall be fifty cents per ration: Provided, That said increase shall not apply to the commutation price of the rations of any officer above the rank of brevet brigadier general, or of any officer entitled to commutation for fuel or quarters.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Insert the following: That all officers of volunteers now in commission, below the rank of brigadier general, who shall continue in the military service to the close of the war, shall be entitled to receive, upon being mustered out of said service, three months' pay proper.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

Insert the following:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That commissioned officers of the Army, serving in the field, shall hereafter be permitted to purchase rations for their own use, on credit, from any commissary of subsistence, at cost prices, and the amount due for rations so purchased shall be reported monthly to the Paymaster General, to be deducted from the payment next following such purchase. And the Secretary of War is hereby directed to issue such orders and regulations as he may deem best calculated to insure the proper observance hereof.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

Insert the following:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to cause tobacco to be furnished to the enlisted men of the Army at cost prices, exclusive of the cost of transportation, in such quantities as they may require, not exceeding sixteen ounces per month, and the amount due therefor shall be deducted from their pay in the same manner as at present provided for the settlement of clothing accounts.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend concurrence in this amendment, with an amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was read, as follows:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated for the pay of the Army the sum of $36,000,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. STEVENS. I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Secretary of War, which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, February 21, 1865.

Sir: The Paymaster General recommends an additional appropriation of $36,000,000 for the pay of the Army to the end of the present fiscal year. This appropriation will be required for the payment of troops and bounties in consequence of the augmentation of the forces.

I respectfully ask that the appropriation be made.

Your obedient servant,

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS,
Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BROOKS. I would ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] if the numbers of the Army are really augmented.

Mr. STEVENS. I must say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] that I do not know how to find out that fact. I have not been able to ascertain one way or the other. They are presumed to be. If all that have been called for, and all that have been enlisted, can be found, then the numbers have been augmented. They have made the calculation, supposing that to be the fact. Whether it is actually so or not remains yet to be seen.

Mr. BROOKS. I want to get that fact out more explicitly before I vote for this increase. I would ask if any gentleman of the Committee on Military Affairs can inform the House whether the numbers of the Army are really augmented. This additional appropriation of $36,000,000 for additional pay is an enormous appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. There has been a new call for three hundred thousand men.

Mr. GARFIELD. We increased the pay of soldiers last winter, and that would make a very considerable increase in the appropriation, even if the numbers were not increased.

Mr. BROOKS. That was included in the estimates brought in at an early stage of the session, both in the deficiency bill and the regular appropriation bill. However, I do not know that we can get any more light upon the subject; and perhaps the less light the better. Let it go.

Mr. STEVENS. You have all the light I have.

The amendment to the amendment of the Senate was agreed to.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the various votes upon the amendments of the Senate; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC COAL LANDS AND TOWN PROPERTY.

Mr. HIGBY. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 380, being an act supplemental to the act approved July 1, 1864, for the disposal of coal lands and of town property in the public domain.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up and read a first and second time.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to refer this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. GOOCH. I desire to have taken from the Speaker's table a concurrent resolution of the Senate extending the time of the joint committee on the conduct of the war for thirty days after the close of this session, and I shall move to amend by striking out "thirty" and inserting "sixty."

The SPEAKER. It requires unanimous consent at this time or a suspension of the rules.

Mr. BROOKS. I do not want to object; but I would like to hear some reason for this extension. I should like to know why that committee should not die with the rest of us on the 4th of March next.

Mr. GOOCH. The reason we ask this extension is this: we have been instructed by the Senate and also by this House to investigate certain matters pertaining to the Army and the Navy. We have found it impossible to obtain the testimony of some of the most material witnesses; and for that reason we are unwilling to report until we have obtained that testimony.

For instance, under a resolution of the Senate, we have taken testimony in relation to the attack upon Fort Fisher. Thus far we have found ourselves unable to obtain the testimony of Admiral Porter, although we have made all the efforts in our power to obtain it. We have also taken testimony, under a resolution of this House, in relation to the Red river expedition. We have found ourselves unable to obtain the testimony of Admiral Porter in relation to that expedition. We are very unwilling to complete our reports, or make any report on either of these matters until we have obtained his testimony and the testimony of some other officers, who have been so engaged in service that it is impossible for us to reach them. It is for that reason that an extension of time is asked. I desire to have it made sixty days instead of thirty days; as thirty days may leave us without having accomplished what we desire to do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I object to the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. GOOCH. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up that resolution.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will an amendment to abolish the committee on the conduct of the war be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would not be in order.

Mr. GOOCH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Gooch and Wadsworth were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 46.

Two thirds not voting in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended.

MAJOR GENERAL H. W. HALLECK.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, on the 25th of January this House adopted a resolution, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, asking the Secretary of War to inform the House to what particular command Major General Halleck was assigned, and whether he was receiving double rations, and if so, under what authority of law. On the 30th of January we received a reply from the Secretary of War, which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed. That reply is, I think, not satisfactory as to the authority of law under which large allowances have been made to this officer. I now move that the communication of the Secretary of War be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I object.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to suspend the rules that I may make the motion for reference.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for the reading of the answer of the Secretary of War.

The Clerk read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON CITY, January 28, 1865.

SIR: I transmit herewith the report of the Adjutant General, with accompanying orders, in reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives dated January 25, 1865, inquiring concerning the duties and allowances of Major General H. W. Halleck, United States Army.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 28, 1865.

SIR: In answer to the resolution of the House of Representatives of January 25, 1865, copies of the order of the President of March 12, 1864, placing Major General H. W. Halleck on duty as chief of staff of the Army, and of the order of the Secretary of War that the chief of staff receive the same allowance as if commanding a military department, are transmitted herewith.

It has been the usage of the War Department to give to officers exercising command over two or more military departments the same allowances as to his subordinate who commands only a single military department. The War Department has uniformly so construed the law.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

[General Orders, No. 98.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, March 12, 1864.

The President of the United States orders as follows:

I. Major General H. W. Halleck is, at his own request, relieved from duty as general-in-chief of the Army, and Lieutenant General U. S. Grant is assigned to the command of the armies of the United States. The headquarters of the Army will be in Washington, and also with Lieutenant General Grant, in the field.

II. Major General H. W. Halleck is assigned to duty in Washington, as chief of staff of the Army, under the direction of the Secretary of War and the Lieutenant General commanding. His orders will be obeyed and respected accordingly.

III. Major General W. T. Sherman is assigned to the command of the military division of the Mississippi, composed of the departments of the Ohio, the Cumberland, the Tennessee, and the Arkansas.

IV. Major General J. B. McPherson is assigned to the command of the department and army of the Tennessee.

V. In relieving Major General Halleck from duty as general-in-chief, the President desires to express his appreciation and thanks for the able and zealous manner in which the arduous and responsible duties of that position have been performed.

By order of the Secretary of War.
E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, D. C., March 12, 1864.

A major general, while on duty as chief of staff of the Army, will receive the same allowance as if commanding a military department.

EDWIN M. STANTON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I withdraw my objection to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

The motion to refer the answer of the Secretary of War to the Committee on Military Affairs was agreed to.

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. SCHENCK. The House passed some time ago a joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register, to contain the names of all the volunteer officers. The Senate has passed that joint resolution with several amendments. I now move that by unanimous consent those amendments be taken from the Speaker's table and acted upon. I think that all those amendments ought to be concurred in, except one, which will make the price of the book higher, I think, than it ought to be.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the Senate amendments.

First amendment:

Strike out all after the word "required" in the second line to and including "sixty-five" in line three, so that the clause will read:

That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized and required to cause to be printed and published a full roster or roll of all general, field, line, and staff officers of volunteers, &c.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

After the word "States" in the sixth line, insert "at any time;" so that the clause will read, "who have been in the Army of the United States at any time."

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

After the word "rebellion" in the sixth line, insert the words "including all informal organizations which have been recognized or accepted and paid by the United States."

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

In the tenth line strike out "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-five;" so that the clause will read, "an edition of twenty-five thousand copies."

The amendment was concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

After the word "binding" in the thirteenth line strike out the words "and shall not in any case exceed one dollar per volume."

Mr. SCHENCK. I hope that this amendment will not be concurred in; and I will explain briefly the difference between the House and the Senate. As the resolution was originally reported by the Military Committee of this House, it provided that this Register, this roll of all the officers of volunteers, shall be sold to them and their friends, to soldiers and civilians, at the actual cost of printing, provided that the price shall not exceed one dollar per copy. I have no doubt myself that the volume, which will be a bulky one, will cost more than a dollar. The Senate, however, has struck out that restriction. I am still of opinion that we ought to afford this volume at a rate even something below the cost, so that all the friends of all the soldiers and officers may be enabled to furnish themselves with a copy at the cheapest possible rate. The book may be made to cost some two or three dollars, if the resolution is left without any restriction of that kind; and the restriction proposed is that the price shall be limited to the actual cost of composition, press-work, and paper, provided that the price shall not be above one dollar. I hope that that restriction will be retained. I trust that the amendment of the Senate will not be concurred in.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to reconsider the votes on concurring in the amendments of the Senate; and also move that motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VOLUNTEER ENGINEER TROOPS.

Mr. GARFIELD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to regulate the organization of volunteer engineer troops; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back House bill No. 649, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, with the amendments of the Senate thereto. I ask that they be now considered.

Mr. BROOKS. It is understood that they are to be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, under the five minutes debate.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

First amendment:

Strike out "ten" and insert "twenty;" so that it will read:

For reporting proceedings in the Daily Globe for the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, $20,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is amendment in order to that amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope, then, that the condition will be affixed that the appropriation shall be dependent on the publication of the debates of the Senate and the House the next morning in the Daily Globe.

Mr. STEVENS. The committee have moved to non-concur.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that the attention of the committee of conference will be called to this subject.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senate are desirous, and very properly, that this House shall not be too extravagant in making appropriations. When we promised some $30,000 to our employes they refused to allow it because it was too large for the contingent fund of the House. In looking at the contingent fund of the Senate, I find that they have three times as many Globes as we have, and they ask to pay in the same proportion. I do not know of any rule in morals or of economy that will allow that to be done.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Second amendment:

Add:

For paying the publishers of the Congressional Globe and Appendix, according to the number of copies taken, one cent for every five pages exceeding three thousand, including the indexes and the laws of the United States, $12,900.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Third amendment:

Add:

For one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Senator in the Thirty-Ninth Congress who has not already received them, $6,800.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence, with the following amendment:

Provided, however, That no Senator who has already, as a member of the House of Representatives, received a set of the Congressional Globe, shall be entitled to receive another set as such Senator; and the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives for the purpose of paying for stationary purposes and such other expenses as the House may have directed or shall direct: Provided, That no part of such sum shall be applied to a permanent addition to the salaries of their clerks and employes.

For compensation to stenographer to committees of the House of Representatives, to be added to the contingent fund of the House, $3,650.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment as amended was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Strike out "$10,334" and insert "$19,170," so that it will read: "Capitol police, $19,170."

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

Mr. BROOKS. That increases the Capitol police?

Mr. STEVENS. There have been added by authority of law certain members to that police, and this makes the appropriation in accordance with the number of the police. The Presiding Officers of the two Houses have the right to add to the number of police.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope that the Capitol will be watched carefully to the extent of $9,000 additional.

The SPEAKER. The Commissioner of Public Buildings informed the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House that he did not regard the Capitol safe with the present force, and an increase was therefore granted to him.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I am utterly opposed to an increase of the Capitol police. I came here the other night to attend the sitting of my committee, and could not get in at the western door, but was compelled to go through the mud to the eastern door. I think if we have not enough now to keep the doors open we will never have.

Mr. STEVENS. What hour of the night was it?

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Seven o'clock. It was the 22d of February.

Mr. STEVENS. Everybody was excluded that evening.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

On page 3 strike out lines nineteen, twenty, twenty-one, and twenty-two, as follows:

For removing the unsightly high fence, or railing, which has been erected in the old Hall of Representatives, $100, or as much thereof as may be necessary.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

Increase the appropriation, on the part of the House of Representatives, for the pay of the Capitol police, from $13,920 to $19,170.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That seems to be somewhat extraordinary legislation.

Mr. STEVENS. The necessity for it arose out of a mistake in the addition of the several salaries of the Capitol police.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What struck me as remarkable was that the Senate should put in this amendment to pay a part of our own employes.

Mr. STEVENS. The Senate finding that we had omitted it, and being unwilling to give us the $40,000 for extra compensation to our clerks, gave us this.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose it is a compromise, then.

Mr. STEVENS. It is a coax, if I understand it.

The amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Increase the aggregate appropriation for annual salaries paid by the House to its employes from $104,178 to $109,428.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

Mr. PRICE. I inquire for information whether the salaries placed opposite the names of the clerks and employes of the House amount to $104,178 or to $109,428.

Mr. STEVENS. That can be easily ascertained by a simple addition. It will be remembered that we have just increased one item, that for the Capitol police, from thirteen to nineteen odd thousand dollars; and now the question is upon increasing the aggregate amount to the same extent.

Mr. PRICE. I do not understand why because we made "nineteen" out of "thirteen" we should make "nine" out of "four."

Mr. STEVENS. If you increase the aggregate amount reported in the bill by the amount that we have just increased one of the items which go to make up that aggregate, the gentleman will find that it amounts to $109,428.

The amendment was concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

On page 7, after line two, add the following:

For completing the tiling of the floor of the old Hall of Representatives, under the same authority that the work has already been done, $3,875.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Ninth amendment:

On page 7, after line eleven, insert the following:

For addition to the Public Printing Office and the necessary presses, machinery, and fixtures, $61,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Tenth amendment:

On page 7, line twenty-three, strike out "fifty" and insert "ninety;" so that the clause will read:

For lithographing and engraving for the Senate and House of Representatives, $90,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Eleventh amendment:

On page 8, line three, strike out "five" and insert "eight;" so to make the appropriation for the purchase of books for the Library $8,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twelfth amendment:

On page 8, after line six, insert:

For an enlargement of the Library of Congress, so as to include in two wings, built fire-proof, the space at either end of the present Library, measuring about eighty feet in length by thirty feet in width, in accordance with a plan to be approved by the Committee on the Library, $169,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence with an amendment to add the words "to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to make an inquiry in reference to this matter. My attention was called in a differing direction when this amendment was read. Is it an amendment in regard to an appropriation for the enlargement of the Library?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am opposed to it and I wish to state my reasons. This subject was before the Joint Committee on the Library of which I was a member, and they refused to recommend the appropriation. It is a very large one of $160,000, and I do not think the Treasury is in a situation to stand such an expenditure at this time.

Mr. FRANK. The committee agreed to report it.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means have acted according to what they considered to be the action of the Joint Committee on the Library. We have no feeling about it. We would just as soon have it non-concurred in and let it go back to the Senate.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am as favorable to the Library as anybody here, and I would be glad to have this improvement made, yet I think we can postpone it for two or three years, when it will not cost half as much.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, the appropriation reported by the Committee of Ways and Means is necessary, because no more room exists in the Library for the continually accruing accessions of books.

It is necessary because a large portion of the books now belonging to Congress are unprovided with shelf-room, and inaccessible except at great expenditure of time and convenience. This applies especially to the set of British Parliamentary documents, consisting of three thousand volumes in folio, full of invaluable information, which is daily wanted for reference. These volumes are all upon the floor, because no shelves can be provided for them in the present Library.

It is necessary, in order to secure the invaluable Library which former Congresses have built up at great expenditures of care and money, from another fire. The books of the Library, from the first purchase of Mr. Jefferson until date have cost somewhat over four hundred thousand dollars. The fire of December, 1851, destroyed all except twenty thousand volumes of the Library. The present Library numbers over eighty-four thousand volumes, less than half of which (or forty thousand volumes) are contained in the fire-proof portion of the Library. The remainder are stored in dark corners and passage-ways of the old Capitol, surrounded with wood-work, and liable to accident, from the firing of a flue, (which was the occasion of the former fire,) or other cause.

It is necessary, in order to provide some space where current newspapers and periodicals, both American and foreign, can be filed and consulted by members; at present there are not ten feet of room anywhere for such a purpose, and the very valuable files of political and literary journals, taken in the Library are useless to Congress until bound, when they have lost their freshness, and much of their interest.

The appropriation asked is $160,000, and the plan of the architect accompanying the estimate proposes to provide an increase of room equal to nearly double the present fire-proof Library, which cost $92,000. The iron work was then put up in competition and the lowest of seven bids was accepted. The present estimate is, therefore far from extravagant, considering the enlargement secured, and it can be done for the amount, notwithstanding the advanced cost of materials, as the patterns from which the ornamental iron work was cast are still on hand.

The present plan was originally designed to be carried out in 1852, when the Library room was rebuilt, but the space embraced in the two wings was then occupied by the House officers, and it was therefore left incomplete. Twelve years have elapsed, and the great increase of the Library has been such that its number of volumes is quadrupled, while no additional room of a permanent character has been provided.

The Library has asked for no appropriation beyond its regular annual one for books since 1852, until last session, when $4,000 was appropriated for a marble floor in lieu of carpets. The Library had got along for eleven years with but one carpet and no renewal of furniture, exhibiting an economy of expenditure sufficiently rare, if not unequalled, in any department of the Government. It is therefore, with some confidence that Congress is now asked to provide permanently for the security of the invaluable literary stores which have been accumulated in the Capitol, and to protect which from injury or destruction no amount of care can be ill bestowed.

The constant donations from State Governments and from foreign Powers of works illustrating the history, statistics, politics, and legislation of our own country and of other parts of the world, cannot be accommodated. These donations might be largely increased upon application, without expense to the Library fund, and a vast amount of valuable information, useful in the practical legislation of Congress, could be obtained, catalogued, and permanently filed for the use of members. Every State and Territory in the Union should have a file of its public documents in the Capitol, but the officers of the Library have been for years deterred from seeking these additions, because there was not room enough to contain them.

The appropriation required is not unreasonably high, as may be seen by comparing the cost of similar library accommodations elsewhere. The new reading-room of the British Museum (constructed entirely within the old edifice) cost £100,000, or $500,000. The Boston Public Library building cost (exclusive of the ground) $240,000. The sum of $160,000, although large in itself, is not so in comparison with the great object of providing safe and permanent room for this rich historical collection, which is rapidly increasing, and much of which, if destroyed, could never be replaced.

I think it is unnecessary to say anything more upon this subject.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move, pro forma, to increase the amount $1,000. I do not suppose that there is any doubt that this Library building may be improved; perhaps there is a necessity for this additional room. But I do say that I think we can get along without it a year or two longer as well as for the past two or three years; and that in one year from this time an appropriation of $100,000 would do the same amount of work that $160,000 will now do.

Mr. SPALDING. I wish to ask if this appropriation will add anything to the security of the Library as it now is?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I think myself the Library is sufficiently secure. This may add to the security of the Library, but I think it is sufficiently secure now for all practical purposes.

Mr. FRANK. In reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] I would state that only about one half of the books connected with the Library, or belonging to the Library, are now in the fire-proof apartment. The other half are stored away in other rooms, liable to be destroyed by fire, as books were many years ago. This appropriation is designed to make it all fire-proof.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think no gentleman will deny that any number of books left in a wooden receptacle are liable to destruction by fire. There is scarcely a library in the country, collegiate, State, or national, that has not, at some time, suffered to a greater or less extent by fire. And it is true that to-day you cannot find a single perfect set of the official archives of the Government anywhere in existence, because in 1851, under circumstances similar to those now existing, nearly the half of our Congressional Library was destroyed by fire. Now, when we have forty thousand books lying in a wooden receptacle, to leave them there liable to be burned—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Where are those forty thousand volumes at this time?

Mr. GARFIELD. All the books of the Library which are outside the fire-proof apartments of the Library are exposed to this danger. If the gentleman will go through the wings of the building on either hand of the fire-proof apartment of the Library, he will find these cords and cords of our most valuable books stacked up on the floors. There is absolutely not even shelf room for them. And it is impossible to get at some of them without disturbing a pile of books perhaps twenty feet high in some instances. They are not available for use now because there is not even shelf room for them. Dare we go on and leave the third most valuable library in the United States of America in a condition in which it is liable to have one half of it destroyed? Really three fourths of the value of the Library may be destroyed by fire any day.

Mr. KASSON. I would make a further statement in this connection. This appropriation was asked for and urged very strongly upon the Committee of Ways and Means at the last session, and the session before also. At the last session I know it was deferred for the same consideration now proposed, namely, that it may bear postponement still longer. The time has come when this is pressed again upon our consideration. Now, while I voted at that time for deferring this appropriation, I am one of those who have become convinced that is altogether unsafe to continue that valuable library as it is now. And further, we are increasing the number of books every year, with no place in which to put them, or where they can be made useful; and we must either stop appropriating for books or we must provide additional room for them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am glad to hear the testimony of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] on this subject, and I would say further, that the additions to our Library in the way of donations are such that at the present rate we shall soon have no place at all in which to put them unless this appropriation is granted. I would be willing that almost any appropriation in this bill should be cut down, or should be entirely thrown out, rather than have this appropriation fail. I hope we will provide for saving the books we already have on hand rather than risk them for another year as they have been risked for a year past. Beside the question of risk, there is the question of utilizing our Library so as to make it available for members, which will lead me to vote for this appropriation.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw my amendment to increase the appropriation $1,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I renew the amendment. I hope this Senate amendment will be adopted. As remarked by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means, and of the Library Committee has heretofore been called to the necessity of this appropriation; and it was with a great deal of reluctance on my part that I was compelled, in view of the pressing necessities of the Government, to vote to defer this appropriation last year. But I am convinced that we are neglecting a very important duty that is pressing upon us.

This appropriation rests upon two necessities, either of which ought to be sufficient to sustain it—the necessity of preserving our present Library, and the equal necessity of increasing, and improving, and enlarging that Library. If our present collection were perfectly safe, I trust we should not be content to neglect the proper extension and enlargement of our Library. As remarked by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] our present collection is not safe. Fully one half of that Library is exposed to the peril of fire; it is not in a secure fire-proof condition. The recent burning of the Smithsonian Institution should warn us that at any moment a much greater calamity may befall the Congressional Library. I do hope that by the votes of gentlemen on both sides of the House this appropriation may be made.

Mr. PRUYN. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker, in reference to the condition of the Library, that I have visited it personally several times and I know that the statements which have been made on this floor in regard to its condition are true. A very great number of valuable books are now piled on the floor. They are inaccessible, and liable to be destroyed by an accident such as that which happened several years ago.

I wish also to say that adequate room should be provided in this building for a really national library, a library in which we can accumulate the materials of our own history, in which we are now lamentably deficient. It is mortifying to Americans, but it is a fact, that any person who may wish to write the history of our country, must now go to the British Museum; for its collection of American books is vastly superior to that of any library in this country. This should not be so. We should have ample arrangements for the reception of books, and after those arrangements are completed, a large appropriation should be made for the purpose of perfecting the great national Library of the country in respect to our own history, and putting it on a par at least with the library of the British Museum. I hope, therefore, that this appropriation will be made, as the gentleman from Kentucky has said, liberally and freely, by the votes of both sides of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I call the previous question upon this amendment.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was concurred in.

Thirteenth amendment:

On page 9, in lines ten and eleven, strike out the words "pamphlet form and in;" so that the clause will read: For publishing the laws in newspapers of the States and Territories, &c.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fourteenth amendment:

On page 9, line twelve, strike out "seventeen" and insert in lieu thereof "thirteen;" so that the clause will read: For publishing the laws in pamphlet form and in newspapers of the States and Territories, and in the city of Washington, $13,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fifteenth amendment:

On page 9, in lines twelve and thirteen, strike out "one hundred and twenty-five."

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Sixteenth amendment:

On page 10, after line two, add the following: For the payment of the first annual installment of the proportion contributed by the United States toward the capitalization of the Scheldt duties, to fulfill the stipulation contained in the fourth article of the convention between the United States and Belgium on the 20th of May, 1853, the sum of $55,584 in coin, and such further sum as may be necessary to carry out the stipulations of the convention providing for the payment of interest on the said sum and on the portion of the principal remaining unpaid.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. MORRILL. The amendments numbered respectively from seventeen to twenty-three are merely formal; and I suppose it is not necessary to take a separate vote upon each.

The SPEAKER. One vote will be taken upon the whole, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

The seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-second, and twenty-third amendments were concurred in.

Twenty-fourth amendment:

Add: For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court and district courts of the United States including the District of Columbia, and also for jurors and witnesses, in aid of funds arising from fines, penalties, and forfeitures, in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, and previous years, and likewise for defraying the expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, and of prosecutions for offenses committed against the United States, and for the safe-keeping of prisoners, $500,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence, with the following amendment:

Strike out "$500,000" and insert in lieu thereof the following words "$700,000; and the unexpended balances of appropriations for the judiciary fund shall return into the Treasury."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Twenty-fifth amendment:

Page 31, line seven, before the word "coins" insert the words "ores and;" so that it will read:

For specimens of ores and coins, to be preserved in the cabinet of the Mint, $300.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Twenty-sixth amendment:

Strike out the following: For legal assistance and other necessary expenditures in the disposal of private land claims in California, $10,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-seventh amendment:

Strike out "one" and insert "two;" so that it will read: For traveling expenses of the judges assigned to the tenth circuit for attending session of the Supreme Court of the United States, $2,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-eighth amendment:

Add: For the repair of the building at St. Augustine, Florida, heretofore used for holding the courts of the United States in the northern district of Florida, $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-ninth amendment:

Strike out the following:
For salaries of additional clerks in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at Boston, which are hereby authorized, $11,500.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Thirtieth amendment:

Strike out the words "of the Mint;" so that it will read:
For salaries of clerks, messengers, and watchmen in office of the Assistant Treasurer at Philadelphia, $18,300.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Thirty-first, thirty-second, thirty-third, and thirty-fourth amendments:

In line nine hundred and twenty-four, on page 38, after the word "of," where it first occurs, insert the words "officers and;" in line nine hundred and twenty-six, after the word "Treasury" insert "and the tenth section of act of March 3, 1853, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854;" and in line nine hundred and twenty-six, after the word "such" insert "further," and in line nine hundred and twenty-seven strike out "$38,060" and insert "$50,000;" so that it will read:

For salaries of additional clerks, and additional compensation of officers and clerks under act of August 6, 1846, for the better organization of the Treasury, and the tenth section of act of March 3, 1853, making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1854, at such further rates as the Secretary may deem just and reasonable, $50,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendments were concurred in.

Thirty-fifth amendment:

Strike out the following:

Provided, That no further expenditures shall be made for the experimental system of hydrostatic printing by the Treasury Department until such experiments shall have been definitely authorized by law, and a distinct appropriation made therefor.

And in lieu thereof insert the following:

Provided, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized to examine and adjust the accounts of Stewart Gwynne for printing presses, machinery, material, and labor furnished and supplied to the Treasury Department, and for expenditures under the authority of the Secretary, and to award to him such sum as may be equitably his due, to be paid from the appropriation for the expenses of national loans: Provided further, That for items furnished or supplied under contract no greater sum than the contract price shall be allowed: And provided further, That before any payment shall be made the said Stewart Gwynne shall, in such form as be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, fully convey and secure to the United States the right to use said presses and any additional number thereof, with their machinery and future improvements in the Treasury building or any other buildings directed by the Secretary for any and all printing the Government may desire for its own use and purpose.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS. The amendments up to the forty-third section are merely verbal, and I move that they be concurred in.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Forty-third amendment:

Insert the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to provide temporary accommodations for the State Department, and for the accommodation of such of the clerks of the Treasury Department as cannot be accommodated in the present building, the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated. And the Secretary of the Interior is hereby required to furnish suitable rooms in the Patent Office building for the accommodation of the Attorney General, Assistant Attorney General, clerks, and messengers in his office; and for the purpose of furnishing and fitting up such rooms the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Forty-fourth amendment:

Add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the public lands in the State of Nevada shall, for surveying purposes, be attached to and included in the surveying district of California.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Forty-fifth amendment:

Add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the commencement of the next fiscal year, the salary of each of the Assistant Secretaries of the Executive Departments, the Assistant Attorney General, and the three Assistant Postmasters General, shall be $3,500 per annum.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Forty-sixth amendment:

Add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the provisions of the act approved April 29, 1864, increasing the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports, be extended to July 1, 1866.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended concurrence, with an amendment, which was to add the following:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to increase the clerical force in the office of the Assistant Treasurer at Philadelphia, and the aggregate salaries of said clerks shall not exceed the sum of $9,000, which amount is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That in addition to the appropriations heretofore allowed for the branch mint at San Francisco, California, the following sums, respectively, are hereby in like manner appropriated, viz:

For wages of workmen and adjusters, $69,450.

For incidental contingent expenses, repairs, and waste, $106,529 29.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That in addition to the appropriations heretofore made for the Territory of Arizona, the following sums, in like manner, are hereby appropriated, viz:

For compensation and mileage of the members of the Legislative Assembly, officers, clerks, and contingent expenses of the Assembly, $5,000.

For preparation and printing laws of the Territory, $5,000.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That in addition to the clerical force heretofore authorized in the Treasury Department, there are hereby authorized to be appointed the following heads of divisions and clerks, viz:

In the office of the Second Auditor, seven heads of divisions, at an annual salary of $1,900 each; twenty-one clerks of class four, and one hundred and seventeen clerks of class three.

In the office of the Third Auditor, eight heads of divisions, at an annual salary of $1,900 each; fourteen clerks of class four, eighty-six clerks of class three, and sixty-nine clerks of class two.

In the office of the Second Comptroller, twelve heads of divisions, at an annual salary of $1,900 each; nine clerks of class four, twelve clerks of class three, fourteen clerks of class two, and sixteen clerks of class one; and the sum of $500,900 is hereby appropriated to pay said salaries. And such sum as may be found necessary to pay the compensation of the officers and clerks hereby authorized, for the current fiscal year, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be organized, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, into divisions, and with the officers, clerks, messengers, and laborers, with the annual salaries respectively, as hereinafter prescribed, viz:

One Commissioner, with a salary of $4,000.

One Deputy Commissioner, with a salary of $3,000.

One chief of the Division of Correspondence, embracing legal remedies, with a salary of $2,500.

One chief of the Division of Finance, embracing money and accounts, with a salary of $2,500.

One cashier in said division, with a salary of $2,500.

One chief book-keeper in the same, with a salary of $2,000.

One chief of the Division of Inspection, with a salary of $2,500.

One chief clerk, with a salary of $2,000.

One statistician, with a salary of $2,000.

Twenty clerks of class four, twenty-five clerks of class three, forty clerks of class two, thirty clerks of class one, and so many female clerks (not exceeding forty in number) as may be necessary, who shall receive the same salary allowed to other female clerks in the Treasury Department; one chief messenger, with a salary of $1,000; four assistant messengers, with a salary of $400 each; and six laborers, with a salary of $600 each.

And the officers, clerks, and employes hereby authorized shall be in substitution of all the officers, clerks, and employes now authorized or employed in said office; and the amount necessary for the compensation of said officers, clerks, and employes, at the rates aforesaid, in addition to the amount heretofore provided, for the last quarter of the current fiscal year, and for the fiscal year next ensuing, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That the duties assigned to either division of said office may, from time to time, be assigned to another by the Commissioner, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: And further provided, That the provisions of this section shall take effect on the 1st day of April next.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the objects hereinafter expressed, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, viz:

For salary of cashier in the United States Depository, Louisville, $1,800.

For salary of book-keeper in the United States Depository, Louisville, $1,500.

For salary of assistant cashier in the United States Depository, Louisville, $1,320.

For salary of clerk in the United States Depository, Louisville, $1,320.

For contingent expenses in the United States Depository, Louisville, $625.

For salary of cashier in the United States Depository, Chicago, $1,600.

For salary of clerk in the United States Depository, Chicago, $1,000.

For contingent expenses in the United States Depository, Chicago, $400.

For salary of cashier in the United States Depository, Pittsburgh, $1,500.

For salary of assistant cashier in the United States Depository, Pittsburgh, $1,000.

For salary of watchman in the United States Depository, Pittsburgh, $900.

For contingent expenses of the United States Depository, Pittsburgh, $300.

For salary of cashier of the United States Depository, Baltimore, $1,800.

For salary of clerk of the United States Depository, Baltimore, $1,500.

For salary of clerk of the United States Depository, Baltimore, $1,200.

For salary of clerk of the United States Depository, Baltimore, $1,000.

For salary of clerk of the United States Depository, Baltimore, $900.

For salary of messenger of the United States Depository, Baltimore, $900.

For contingent expenses of the United States Depository, Baltimore, $360.

For salary of cashier in the office of the United States Assistant Treasurer, San Francisco, $2,500.

For salary of book-keeper in the office of the United States Assistant Treasurer, San Francisco, $2,000.

For salary of cashier in the United States Depository, Cincinnati, $2,000.

For salary of assistant cashier in the United States Depository, Cincinnati, $1,500.

For salary of assistant in the United States Depository, Cincinnati, $1,200.

For salary of assistant in the United States Depository, Cincinnati, $1,000.

For salary of teller in the United States Depository, Cincinnati, $1,300.

For salary of book-keeper in the United States Depository, Cincinnati, $1,500.

For salary of two clerks in the United States Depository, Cincinnati, $2,500.

For salary of clerk in the United States Depository, Cincinnati, $1,200.

For contingent expenses of the United States Depository, Cincinnati, $2,000.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the sum of $1,881 25 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the payment of salaries of clerks and others indicated in the preceding section, and of contingent expenses, for the three months ensuing June 30, 1865.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and they are hereby, authorized to pay to A. C. Collingsworth, C. H. Vedder, Edward R. Sherman, Charles C. Adams, Theophilus H. Gladwyn, Samuel W. Tucker, and the other persons employed by the deputy provost marshal of the District of Columbia, in the enrolling office of said marshal, for night work and special service performed in pursuance of a contract between said clerks and said provost marshal, such accounts being properly certified upon the rolls, or by said deputy provost marshal.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That no part of the money appropriated, either by this act or former acts, shall be applied to the payment of any claim for constructive mileage on account of any extra session of either House of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to add to the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means the following:

And be it further enacted, That the appropriations heretofore made for the Congressional Globe shall be upon the condition that hereafter the proceedings of Congress shall be published in the Daily Globe of the day subsequent to the day such proceedings were had, and delivered to both Houses at their time of meeting.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me a word?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This amendment only proposes to carry out the resolution passed by the House a few days ago, in order to give us the proceedings of Congress when they can be of some use to us. Now, the proceedings which are published are three or four days behindhand. There is no reason for it, and there can be no objection to this amendment. It will not take effect at this session of Congress, but I propose that the proprietors of the Globe shall, under the existing law, prepare to have the work done as they agreed to do it, at the next session.

Mr. KASSON. Suppose this bill passes, as it probably will pass, by Thursday, it would take effect immediately and apply to the proceedings of Friday next. The publishers of the Globe are now three days behindhand.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Four days.

Mr. KASSON. The query I make is whether this amendment does not defeat the entire appropriation for the Globe for this session?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will modify my amendment so that it shall take effect at the next session of Congress.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I desire to say that the gentleman from Illinois overlooks one provision in the contract with the proprietors of the Globe. The contract provides that they shall bring out the proceedings of Congress on the next day, provided those proceedings do not exceed forty columns of printed matter.

Now, on the morning after our night session, when we had those two calls of the House, the amount of printed matter was fifty-seven columns and a half; and then, for the first time this session, the Globe fell in printing the reports. How often since that time the proceedings have exceeded the prescribed forty columns, I am unable to say; but I notice, in looking at the amount printed in December and January, that it is not, at least, larger than the amount already printed in February. Gentlemen cannot have failed to notice that the reports of the proceedings of the Senate have been very long and heavy. I think that, in justice to the young men who now have the responsibility of printing the Globe upon their shoulders, we ought to consider this question fully and fairly. I am satisfied that they have endeavored to do the utmost in their power to get out the Globe promptly. They have, at much expense, sought to find and employ more printers in their office, and have finally secured an additional force of ten or twelve printers, at largely increased prices, to work for them until the close of this session.

We ought to consider all these facts, and do no injustice to these young men. If this amendment is adopted, it should be so modified as to make it harmonize with the provisions of the contract. I would suggest also that we sometimes allow members here to print speeches not actually delivered, and that this adds very largely to the amount of printing, and also considerably increases the expense. I doubt the propriety of this policy as a rule.

Mr. MALLORY. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] claims that his amendment is but carrying out the action of the House a day or two since. I deny that the resolution offered by the gentleman some days since was to that effect. It was a resolution directing the Committee on Printing to inquire why the publication of the Globe was behind the proceedings of this House. How we carry that out now, by providing by law that if that thing shall happen hereafter the appropriation shall not be paid to the Globe, is beyond my comprehension.

I do not understand this persistent attack on the publishers of the Globe by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] When this matter was up before, I thought the House fully understood the causes of this delay in the publication of the debates in the Congressional Globe, and that the House was disposed to excuse the publishers for the reasons then assigned for the delay. It was stated then, and I reiterate the statement now, that if the publishers of that paper were to employ regularly upon their paper sufficient force to keep up the debates of this House at all times, it would make the concern insolvent, for they could not stand it. For when we are engaged in night sessions, or in prolonged sittings during the day, and the debates are extended by the saying of thousands of things, perhaps—I will not say by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]—that there was no need of saying upon this and that subject, the debates become so voluminous that it is impossible to keep a force sufficient to publish the debates promptly. The reason is one that ordinary economy would prompt the publishers of any paper in the world to adopt that practice, and ought to be sufficient for the gentleman from Illinois. The reason is, and I state it again, that it is impossible to keep a force upon the Globe sufficient to keep up with the extraordinary debates of our extraordinary night sessions and our protracted day sessions.

Now, if the gentleman wants something of this sort done to direct the conduct of those employed to publish our proceedings and to print other matters for us, why does not he direct his attack against all those who print for us? Why does he not bring up the Public Printer of this Congress, have him tried, condemned, and punished for his dereliction in this and other matters? I do not understand the necessity for the selection of this one particular paper as the object of the gentleman's eternal attack in this House. There are important documents that this House has needed from the commencement of this session up to this time, which the Public Printer has failed to have printed and sent to this House. We have not received the report of the Secretary of War; and yet we do not hear a word from the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] in relation to the dereliction of our Public Printer. His attacks are all directed against the publishers of the Globe, who happen to be two or three days behindhand in the publication of the debates. Our Agricultural Reports for 1863 have not all yet been submitted to this House by the Public Printer. Why does not the gentleman ask that to be inquired into? The Mechanical Reports have not yet been published and delivered for the year 1862 for the use of members of this House.

A MEMBER. For 1861.

Mr. MALLORY. For 1861, I am reminded by a member. All these failures and all these derelictions have been practiced by the Public Printer, and yet the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] except when forced to do so by an amendment proposed to his resolution upon the subject of the Congressional Globe, never proposes anything in regard to the Public Printer.

Mr. DAWES. I understand the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] to say that the Public Printer has not yet printed the report of the Secretary of War.

Mr. MALLORY. I so understand it.

Mr. DAWES. Has it yet been made?

Mr. MALLORY. Then let us give it to the Secretary of War. I can see no good reason for the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] I think it invidious, wrong, and unnecessary, and I hope the House will not adopt it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw my amendment, and offer this in its place:

That the appropriation hereinafter made for the Congressional Globe shall be upon the condition that hereafter the proceedings of Congress shall be published in the Daily Globe of the day subsequent to the day such proceedings were had, and delivered to both Houses at their time of meeting; this provision to take effect at the commencement of the next session.

Mr. PRUYN. I would suggest to the gentleman to add to his amendment the words "and any delay or omission may be excused by the Speaker."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I cannot do it. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] seems to exhibit considerable feeling upon this question, and, as is too often the case when a member moves in any matter, he is charged with entertaining feelings of hostility to some one or some thing. Now, I have been influenced by no such motives so far as regards the proprietors of the Congressional Globe.

Mr. MALLORY. I imputed nothing of that sort to the gentleman.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They are gentlemen whom I do not know. I knew for many years the esteemed gentleman who was, until recently, the proprietor of the Globe—the late Mr. Rives—and I respected him, and my course in Congress, during twelve years, has been to support and sustain and uphold, so far as I could do it conscientiously, the Congressional Globe, for I have always believed it to be a most important publication, giving a full report of our proceedings, that our constituents and the country may know what we have been about, and may have our official action upon record.

Now, sir, I will state the point at which I was driving, and I submit that it is entirely reasonable and just to the proprietors of the Congressional Globe, and nobody else has any right to complain. We have made a contract with them, and we have agreed to pay them enormous sums in order that they may report and publish the proceedings of Congress promptly. I charge that they have failed to do this; and what I propose to do is merely to bring them up to the discharge of that contract fully and fairly, as we have provided for paying them for the service most liberally.

I desire this for our own benefit. If gentlemen will look at the Globe which appears this morning, they will find that it contains the proceedings of last Wednesday. We all know the importance of the proceedings of the last days of the session. We all realize how important it is for us to know on each day what have been the proceedings on the day previous, what propositions have been offered, what propositions have been adopted or rejected. Indeed, sir, two thirds of the value of a publication of our proceedings is lost to us by not having that publication promptly.

When it is said that these publishers cannot publish the proceedings more promptly, I deny it. I say that the reason why they do not furnish the proceedings promptly is that they do not make a sufficient expenditure to obtain the labor of printers.

Mr. MORRILL. I suppose that the gentleman from Illinois desires merely to bring the publishers of the Globe up to their contract. If so he will not object to a proviso which I propose shall be added to his amendment, and which I ask him to accept. It is as follows:

But the publishers of the Congressional Globe shall not, however, be required to publish daily more than forty columns of the proceedings of the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. They agree now to publish forty-seven columns.

Mr. MORRILL. Forty I think it is.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. Forty is the specification of the contract.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that we should not undertake in this ex parte way to vary the contract.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We cannot vary the contract. If the publishers of the Globe would confine themselves to the publication of the current proceedings, leaving out the written speeches, never delivered, the object which I desire, and which we all must desire, would be attained.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that one reason why the Globe this year has not been able to keep up with the debates is that the Senate has occupied almost all the space in its columns. Any one who looks at the Globe will find, I think, that the Senate occupies five pages to our one. If we could impose a ten per cent. tax upon the surplus gas manufactured in the Senate, the Globe, I think, could get along in publishing the proceedings. Without something of that kind it is impossible that the proceedings can be published promptly.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw my amendment for the present.

Mr. SCHENCK. I renew the amendment.

I am astonished, Mr. Speaker, that there should be any feeling about this matter, for I suppose that the object of all of us in reference to this question is, as it certainly ought to be, the same. The purposes to be accomplished by having our debates published in the Daily Globe, and afterward, revised or unrevised, transferred to the Congressional Globe, and put into the more permanent form of quarto volumes, appears to me to be twofold. One object is to preserve in this authentic shape an account of the proceedings of the two branches of Congress. Another object, which is certainly to be considered, is to furnish from day to day to members, when they assemble here, something to which they can refer to show what have been the full proceedings of the day before. The confusion frequently attending the proceedings of this body is such that when we come here this morning no one of us can tell with certainty or in any full degree what votes were taken, what resolutions were offered, what proceedings were had yesterday. In order that we may learn the state of any pending question, and particularly that we may be enabled to make motions for reconsideration, as well as for other reasons, it is very important that we should have before us regularly from day to day what has been done on the day preceding. The gentleman from Illinois says that the Globe of this morning brings our proceedings up to Wednesday last, February 22. We have had, for the last three days, under consideration the enrollment bill, of which I have had charge as the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and it is desirable for me this morning to know precisely the position of various amendments, with a view to further amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman had listened this morning to the reading of the Journal he would have had all the information he desires.

Mr. SCHENCK. There is a great deal not contained in the Journal. The Globe contains the remarks, and shows the motives and the purposes sought to be accomplished by parties.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The Journal does not show what took place in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SCHENCK. I know that of what is done in the Committee of the Whole on the state

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D Session.

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 73.

of the Union nothing appears in the Journal. I say that if we could have the very language of the amendments, hastily framed by members upon their desks and sent up, we would know how to add other amendments and other provisions in order to perfect the bill.

I propose an amendment to the amendment—

The SPEAKER. An amendment is pending already to an amendment. The amendments of the Senate are the original text.

Mr. SCHENCK. The amendment to the amendment has been withdrawn. I propose to add that they shall in no case be required to publish until after the close of the session of Congress speeches handed in and not actually delivered in the Senate or the House.

Mr. MALLORY. If the gentleman will move that as a substitute, I will vote for it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I was about to remark—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. MORRILL. I propose to add that the publishers of the Congressional Globe shall not be required to publish daily more than forty columns of the proceedings of the two Houses, and that speeches not actually delivered may be postponed till the end of the session.

Mr. SCHENCK. Make it shall not be published during the session of Congress, and that they shall not be counted in the forty columns.

Mr. MORRILL. I agree to that.

The SPEAKER. The amendment as modified, is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That all appropriations hereinbefore made for the Congressional Globe shall be upon the condition that hereafter the proceedings of Congress shall be published in the Daily Globe on the day subsequent to the day such proceedings were had, and delivered to both Houses of Congress; this to take effect at the next session of Congress; but the publishers of the Congressional Globe shall not, however, be required to publish daily more than forty columns of the proceedings of the two Houses of Congress, and any speeches not actually delivered in either House shall be postponed until the same can be published without increasing the extent of the proceedings beyond forty columns.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I make the point of order that the amendment of the Committee of Ways and Means is not in order, as it contains many things not authorized by law.

The SPEAKER. It is now too late to make that point.

Mr. BROOKS. This is an ingenious plan to do the most business and let the people know the least about it. It is impossible for us to know what is going on. Here is an entire reorganization of the internal revenue department, with a large amount of salaries and officers. There are private claims here of which we know nothing. I have only to say that I am astonished at the capacity of the Committee of Ways and Means to comprehend the multitude of business which is brought before them, and which they submit to the House. Posterity will wonder and admire also when they come to understand all these measures which are so suddenly submitted to their consideration, and which are so brought before the House.

I do think, to speak more solemnly upon the subject, that the reorganization of a great bureau of a Department within an appropriation bill, and that too by an amendment to an amendment of the Senate, is altogether a novel and extraordinary course of proceeding.

But I will not say more. The honorable gentleman who presides over the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. STEVENS] silenced this side of the House the other night, and lest I should anger him and he silence my side of the House, I will submit, in common with the whole House, and keep an obedient silence to whatever may be done.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the forty-seventh amendment, but was interrupted by

Mr. STEVENS, who said: This amendment is the deficiency bill with the exception of the clause making an appropriation to pay the extra compensation voted to our employes.

The committee recommend a non-concurrence in it.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts. I move that the House concur.

The SPEAKER. That is involved in the vote on the recommendation to non-concur.

Mr. MORRILL. This question has long been before both Houses, and it is quite time, I think, that it should be settled. We may as well dispose of it upon this bill as upon any other. I hope the House will now concur with the Senate. I think the House quite fully understands the question, and it is not necessary to discuss it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that this amendment is the deficiency bill just as we passed it, save the appropriation of $38,000 to pay extra compensation to the employes of the House. Now, I understand that the Committee of Ways and Means have reported an amendment in another part of this bill to an amendment of the Senate, appropriating $40,000 for certain purposes, and that amendment has already been agreed to by the House. Now, I understand that that $40,000 covers this very matter in dispute. So that, if we concur in this amendment, the matter stands exactly as it did before.

Mr. MORRILL. The action of the Committee of Ways and Means was as the gentleman has stated. I did not concur with the majority of the Committee of Ways and Means. I hope the House will dispose of this matter now, and not allow so important an interest to hang upon so small a matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand that the appropriation of $40,000 has already been adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. This is the deficiency bill which was referred to a committee of conference, and the committee of conference is ready to report. If the House chooses to disagree to that report, they can do so, but that is no reason why the bill should be put in here as an amendment. We have refused in the House to concur in the action of the Senate by more than two to one, I think. I will not say that we have done it a dozen times, but certainly we have ten times and a half. I hope the House will not give way.

The Senate profess to be about to reform the expenditures of this House, and while upon this subject I will look a little into this matter. Their stationery for fifty-two Senators amounts to $17,000, while ours, with one hundred and ninety-two members, amounts to only $12,000. Their expenses under that head, if upon the same scale as that of the House, should be $3,250, but they take $17,000.

The Senators take ninety-six copies of the Congressional Globe each; the members of the House twenty-four copies. And yet they would find fault if we interfered with that as one of their domestic institutions.

I do not want to make invidious comparisons, and would not, had not the Senate taken the ground they have. We pledged ourselves to our employes, to the extent of $40,000, a year ago, and we have asked the Senate to allow us to pay it, but they pertinaciously refused, and left the deficiency bill hanging by the ears upon that account. When I look at the mileage account of the two Houses, I find that my friend from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] who lives between the two Senators from his State, receives $987 mileage. The Senators from that State charge, the one $1,584, and the other $1,600. But we do not complain. It is one of their domestic institutions, and we do not interfere with it.

The Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] who is a very careful man in all these things, (and I do not blame him for watching so carefully, and keeping the deficiency bill hanging up for three months, upon the question of the payment of our employes, when the money was wanted,) received a mileage of $532, while the member from that State, who lives in the same town, received only $440.

Now, as I said before, I dislike these invidious comparisons. One of the Senators from Kansas received $2,161 mileage, while one member from the same place received only $1,260—a difference of $960.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have voted steadily with the House thus far in the matter of difference between the two Houses; but I am unwilling any longer to keep up a contest of this sort. I have looked into the merits of the question, and I ask the attention of the House to it for a moment. I will read a section from the 326th page of the eleventh volume of the Statutes at Large:

“That no part of the appropriations which may be at any time made for the contingent expenses of either House of Congress shall be applied to any other than the ordinary expenditures of the Senate and House of Representatives, nor as extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant of the said two Houses or either of them, nor as payment or compensation to any clerk, messenger, or other attendant of the said two Houses or either of them, unless such clerk, messenger, or other attendant, be so employed by a resolution of one of said Houses.”

Now, this is the law in the case, and without remembering this law, and in direct violation of it, we last winter, in our generosity, or, if you please, with a proper sense of justice, voted this extra compensation from the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman mean to say that if we now make this appropriation that will not alter the law?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not say that.

Mr. STEVENS. Then what do you say?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will tell the gentleman. Last winter, while this law was upon the statute-book, we made an agreement which, the gentleman says, binds us in honor to pay this extra compensation to the employes of this House. I was very willing to pay it, and voted to do so. I knew that our employes had done well and had deserved well of the House. But I remember that we did not pay all the employes of the House this extra compensation. We gave no extra compensation to any of the officers of the library nor to several other officials of the House. But that is not material to the question at issue. The Senate claims that our appropriation of last session was illegal. We cannot deny it, but we insist that they shall now join us in making a retroactive law to legalize what the House attempted illegally to do. How long shall we delay the necessary appropriations to carry on the Government because the Senate will not ratify what they believe to be an illegal act of the House? I have observed with regret the heat which this subject has occasioned in this House. When it was last up the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] said in his place that the course which the Senate had pursued in relation to this matter was “atrocious.” I, for one, am unwilling any longer to be a party with the gentleman in characterizing the action of the other branch of Congress in this case as an atrocity. I believe it is high time for us to stop this war between the two Houses, and not to allow this distracting question to block another important appropriation bill, as is now proposed.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman say that it is illegal for us to pass this law and do this thing?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not say that.

Mr. STEVENS. You have just said that in substance.

Mr. GARFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I have not. I said that the House last winter had no right to make this use of its contingent fund, because there was a law prohibiting such action by either House. We did make this use of our contingent fund. The Senate disagrees with us and refuse to allow the money to be paid under that resolution of ours, when we ask them to pass a retroactive law to legalize what we did.

No doubt we can do that; but the Senate declines to go back and legislate in that way, and they are called “atrocious” for their course; in other words, they are called “atrocious” for not agreeing to legalize our illegal act of last winter. I am unwilling to continue this contest longer and keep suspended all operations of the Government that depend upon the two bills now before the House.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Mr. Speaker, this subject has occupied the attention of the House heretofore to some extent, and I feel that I am hardly doing justice to the House in calling attention to any further suggestions on the subject. But, for one, believing that it is not only the right but the duty of this House to protect and pay its officers, for the faithful discharge of their duties, such sums as this House may think them entitled to, I will not back down from the position which this House has heretofore assumed at the dictation of the Senate of the United States.

The responsibility of the postponement of measures that are important to this Government rests, not with this House, but with the Senate, and this House will be untrue to itself if they shall bend to that dictation upon the mere question as to what shall be paid to the employés of the House, as to what is a liberal and fair compensation for their services. There is no responsibility resting upon the House for the delay in the passage of important measures resting between the two Houses.

Now, sir, as I had occasion to remark once before when discussing this question, the House of Representatives pledged its faith to the employés of this House that for a continuance of the faithful discharge of their duties they should receive this additional compensation. They have been discharging those duties, it is admitted on all hands, well and faithfully. There are reasons why their compensation should be increased. Those reasons address themselves to the judgment of the House of Representatives, and not to the judgment of the Senate.

This is not the first time in the history of legislation when the other branch of the national Congress has undertaken to dictate to the House of Representatives what they should do on subjects like this. It is an unwarrantable interference with the prerogatives of this House; one to which I hope the House of Representatives will not submit, and if the Senate, using its dictatorial power upon the question of the payment of employés here, shall see fit to defeat legislation, to defeat important appropriation bills, then let the responsibility rest where it properly belongs, upon them, not upon us. I therefore hope the House will not recede from its decision on this question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I renew it for the purpose of making a brief statement of this question, as I understand it. I was an original opponent of this increase of pay. It is due to myself, therefore, to say that, although I was an opponent of it, I regard the officers and employés of this House as doing nearly twice the amount of work, as a general thing, for the same amount of money, that is done by the respective officers, clerks, and employés of the Senate. Standing in that position originally, I have now to say that I take it to be my own duty, and consequently the duty of the House, to stand by the position they have taken. I think that it is our duty to say that this contingent fund of the House shall be increased so far that if it is necessary we can appropriate the amount required for the competent and adequate payment of the clerks and employés of this body. And then I think the question may come up for the consideration of this House whether we shall repeal the resolution passed at the last session, which gave this increased pay. And I sympathize entirely with those gentlemen on the other side of the House who think the time has come, in view of the liberal disbursements of the other branch of Congress, for us to say whether this House is to determine or not to determine what is adequate compensation for its employés under the law. That we may repeal the law which was quoted here by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] I do not think he for a moment can doubt; and he does not doubt. He only asserts that at the last session we undertook to do what by law we were unable to do. Now, sir, we had a right by resolution to fix the compensation of our officers and employés; and then we had the right to provide in the appropriation bill means for paying those officers and employés. That is done by this bill; and whether hereafter we choose to pay them a larger or a smaller sum is to be determined by this House by a special resolution applicable to that subject; repealing, if necessary, the resolution of the last session authorizing that payment.

Mr. HOLMAN. There seems to be a misapprehension as to how this question stands. I understand the pending Senate amendment to be the deficiency bill just as it passed this House, leaving out the controverted item of $38,000. The Committee of Ways and Means, I understand, proposed to amend one of the Senate amendments in this way:

And the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of paying for stationery, papers, and such other expenses as the House may have directed, or shall direct: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be applied as a permanent addition to salaries of the clerks and other employés.

The House has adopted that amendment; the only difference between it and the other item is that it is $40,000 instead of $38,000. The Committee of Ways and Means of course intended it to cover this very $38,000 item. If the House should adopt the amendment of the Senate now pending it would leave the matter standing just where it did before. The $38,000 is appropriated by this amendment, and the pending amendment gives us the balance of the deficiency bill as we passed it.

Mr. KASSON. It presents the question to the Senate in another form. It simply increases the contingent fund of the House to enable us to redeem the liabilities of the past and the future.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was not this $40,000 inserted, here solely for the purpose of covering that $38,000 item?

Mr. KASSON. It is designed to meet that and some other things. Unquestionably it was designed to cover that as well as other matters, and I have argued that the House has a right to meet the question in this way, as I have understood the right.

I now withdraw my amendment and call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The question was upon concurring in the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, will not the effect of concurrence be to pass the appropriations for deficiencies, without this appropriation for the employés of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that, in his opinion, the House has already, in another portion of this bill, added this disputed item in an appropriation of $40,000 to cover it and some other items.

Mr. MORRILL. If we concur, it no longer leaves the deficiency bill as a lever to carry the other appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. I have now in my charge the report of a committee of conference on this very deficiency bill.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 55, noes 75, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Dawes, Denning, Dumont, English, Finck, Garfield, Hale, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Lazear, Loan, Samuel P. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Shannon, Sloan, Spaulding, John B. Steele, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, and Worthington—55.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ashley, Blow, Boyd, James S. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Denison, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Grider, Griswold, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kallfleisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Knapp, Knox, Law, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Mallory, Martin, McBride, McKimney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Charles O'Neill, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Smithers, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—75.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cravens, Creswell, Dixon, Donnelly, Eldridge, Elliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Hall, Harrington, Hooper, Julian, Kelley, King, Littlejohn, Marcy, McAllister, McClurg, McDowell, McIndoe, Moorhead, Perry, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Scofield, Scott, Smith, Starr, William G. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wilson, Windom, and Benjamin Wood—52.

So the House refused to concur in the amendment of the Senate.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WILSON said: Mr. Speaker, I have paired with the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. McDowell. If he were present he would vote against concurrence, while I would vote for it.

The result was announced as above stated.

The seventy-eighth and last amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Amend the title by adding at the end thereof the words "and additional appropriations for the current fiscal year."

The Committee of Ways and Means recommended non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the various votes on concurring in the amendments of the Senate; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that a committee of conference be appointed on the part of the House to confer with a similar committee on the part of the Senate, upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLMENT BILL.

The House, as the regular order of business, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 678) to amend the act entitled "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, and the other acts relating to enrollment and draft.

The SPEAKER. On Saturday an amendment was adopted, on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] His colleague [Mr. JOHNSON,] moved to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table. The pending question is upon the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 60, not voting 47, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Holman, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kallfleisch, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Marcy, McKimney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Shannon, Spaulding, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Thayer, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—75.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Frank, Garfield, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel P. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Sloan, Smithers, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Worthington—60.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Creswell, Donnelly, Farnsworth, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Hutchins, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, King, Littlejohn, Mallory, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, Moorhead, Patterson, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Scofield, Scott, Smith, Starr, William G. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Tracy, Ward, Webster, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Woodbridge—47.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to add the following:

Provided, The discovery of the fact of the insufficiency of such substitute and the wrong inflicted on the Government thereby, shall have come to the knowledge of the Secretary of War at a time sufficiently early to enable him to give the said notice within the thirty days aforesaid.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 64.

Mr. SCHENCK demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. STEVENS and SCHENCK were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 68.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House bill No. 688, making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; when the Speaker signed the same.

ENROLLMENT BILL—AGAIN.

The Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the other lawful penalties of the crime of desertion from the military or naval service, all persons who have deserted the military or naval service of the United States, who shall not return to said service or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the passage of this act, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship, and their rights to become citizens; and such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any of the rights of citizens thereof, and all persons who shall hereafter desert the military or naval service and all persons who, being duly enrolled, shall depart the jurisdiction and go beyond the limits of the United States, with intent to avoid any draft into the military or naval service, duly ordered, shall be liable to the penalties of this section. And the President is hereby authorized and required forthwith, on the passage of this act, to issue his proclamation setting forth the provisions of this section.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to strike out that section. In proposing to do that, Mr. Speaker, I am satisfied, if I understand the clause correctly, that the provision contained in the latter part will, in case the substitute law should ever be repealed, have the effect to deprive fifty thousand, and I do not know but one hundred thousand, people of their rights and privileges. I am disposed to agree with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in every measure calculated to strengthen the armies of the Government, but I am opposed to any measure which is calculated to punish an innocent class of persons, such as clergymen, refugees, aliens, and those who, to escape with their lives and families, took an oath not to bear arms against the confederate government.

The section in the beginning would seem to imply that there was something unjust and unlawful in it. It recites "in addition to all the other lawful penalties," virtually admitting by the phrase that there is here something unlawful. There are persons whose religious convictions will not permit them to engage in this war. The time of peril and danger has also passed, and I have a deep sympathy with the thousands of the various classes I have mentioned who have felt that they could not enter into this contest without violating their honest convictions. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that this war should not continue one moment longer than is necessary to re-establish the integrity of the Government and the supremacy of the Constitution, and it does seem as if this were a needless measure. But, sir, this provision has a deeper meaning; it is one of the steps toward a consolidated Government in my opinion, a violation of republican principle. If, in the progress of events, there should ever be a division of sentiment upon a question, for instance, of a war of aggrandizement, this would be a dangerous law. There is no tribunal provided in this section to decide the question, and I, for one, will not consent to what I consider a despotic measure.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I will premise by remarking that the eleventh section, which the gentleman proposes to strike out, is copied precisely from the bill which has passed the Senate. Believing it to be a wholesome measure, when the bill had been made a special order and was under consideration in the House, the Committee on Military Affairs instructed me, among other amendments, to take this section from the Senate bill which is also now pending.

The gentleman says that this is a harsh, unusual provision to disfranchise those innocent persons for whom he feels a sympathy. Who are the persons described in this bill? Those who, being in the Army, deserted from the Army. It is a new technology which describes deserters, men guilty of the crime of abandoning the standard of their country in time of war, to support which they had sworn when mustered in, as innocent persons.

Mr. TOWNSEND rose.

Mr. SCHENCK. I cannot yield, as I have only five minutes.

Coming within this class of innocent persons are those who fly from the country and go to foreign lands in order to avoid military duty under the draft. The gentleman, in regard to these particularly, says, and the language I noticed at the time, he avows that he is one of those who feel a deep sympathy for those who are unwilling to take part in this war. I am glad that the proposition has been made so distinct. Honorable gentlemen on one side and another will vote in such a way that those who feel a deep sympathy with those who are unwilling to help the Government will vote for the amendment, and I expect that all those who feel a deep sympathy for deserters from the banner of the country will vote for the amendment.

The gentleman says that the committee who drafted this bill—and it applies to the Senate, and not to the House committee—seemed to have been conscious of the unlawful character of these penalties for the disfranchisement of those persons. The gentleman seems to forget the force of language. I invite him to look again at the section, and he will see that this penalty is in addition to the other lawful penalties. Here is a penalty that is lawful, wise, proper, and that should be added to the other lawful penalties that now exist against deserters.

I can but say in reply to the gentleman from New York that, with the position which he has taken, I am glad that the motion has been made to strike out this section, because we shall be entitled to expect a division in this House, on one side of which shall stand with the gentleman from New York those who sympathize with the man who has abandoned his country, its cause and its flag, and on the other side of which shall stand those who are for maintaining the country and its flag.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the section by striking out of the fourteenth line the word "and" and inserting in lieu of it the words "of the district in which they are enrolled or;" so that it will read, "all persons who being duly enrolled shall depart the jurisdiction of the district in which they are enrolled or go beyond the limits of the United States." I move this amendment, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of providing for cases of this kind. The President issues his call upon the State for troops, and gives notice that if the quotas are not filled by a particular time a draft will take place to enforce the furnishing of the troops called for. In my own State, and I presume it is so in all the States, as soon as that notice is given many persons at once prepare to leave, and do leave, going into the Territories and among the mountains and mines in order to avoid the service of the country in event of their being drafted. It is for the purpose of reaching cases of that kind, where the persons do not go beyond the United States, but do escape from the limits of the district in which they are enrolled for the sole purpose of evading the service of the country, that I desire to have this amendment put in the bill, so that all men who run away from the draft and skulk the service of their country shall be deprived of the rights of which this section proposes to deprive those who go beyond the limits of the United States.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not understand how that is to be decided, or what tribunal is to decide it.

Mr. WILSON. I do not suppose that there is any tribunal provided in the section for determining it; but I can suggest one way of determining it. If one of these persons should return and should attempt to exercise the rights of a citizen, and he should be prevented from the exercise of those rights, then he can bring the question into the civil courts for determination.

Mr. MALLORY. Will the gentleman agree to an amendment so as to make the section apply only to persons convicted of having done this?

Mr. WILSON. That follows, as a matter of course, that a man shall not be deprived of his rights until he is convicted of the offense. He may be prevented from voting by challenge, and then he has the right to go to the courts to have the question decided.

Mr. MALLORY. Many a man is punished now, and convicted afterward.

Mr. WILSON. This will place him exactly in the same condition as to the right of suffrage as an alien, a person of foreign birth, presenting a vote. His vote may be challenged on the ground that he is not naturalized, and the judges of election may refuse his vote. He then has his remedy against the judges of election; so would a man under this section.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, announced that he had approved and signed bills and joint resolutions of the following titles, namely:

An act (H. R. No. 184) to create the eastern judicial district of the State of New York;

An act (H. R. No. 314) for the relief of Harriet and Emily W. Morris, unmarried sisters of the late Commodore Henry W. Morris;

An act (H. R. No. 364) authorizing and requiring the opening of Sixth street west;

An act (H. R. No. 389) for the relief of Mary Shireliff;

An act (H. R. No. 543) to increase the efficiency of the medical corps of the Army;

An act (H. R. No. 664) for changing the time for holding the circuit court in the district of Virginia;

An act (H. R. No. 692) in reference to prosecutions for libel in the District of Columbia;

An act (H. R. No. 640) providing for a district and a circuit court of the United States for the district of Nevada, and for other purposes;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 171) in the matter of Sergeant Daniel Collett, jr., deceased; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) directing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue American registers to the British schooners Minnie Williams and E. M. Baxter.

ENROLLMENT BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether he will consent to an amendment inserting after the word "section" in the seventy-seventh line, the words "upon conviction before a court of competent jurisdiction."

Mr. WILSON. I should not vote for it; but it is with the House to determine. I cannot, certainly, accept it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Then I will offer the amendment if it is in order.

The SPEAKER. The amendment would not be germane to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I will offer it when it is in order.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I will oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. I am opposed to this entire section. I have risen for the purpose of entering my protest against the inference which the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Military Committee, [Mr. SCHENCK,] seeks to draw from the vote upon the motion to strike out; and I propose to give the reasons why I shall vote to strike out the section. The gentleman from Ohio is a lawyer, and yet he has incorporated into this section a provision retroactive in its operation. He proposes to inflict a punishment upon deserters from the Army who have deserted before the passage of this law. Now, former conscription bills and laws have provided punishment for those who desert from the Army. And as the gentleman is a lawyer, I would ask him if he believes he has power to create a new penalty and apply it to those who have violated the law as it has existed heretofore. Because gentlemen do not believe that there is a power here to pass a retroactive law, and inflict a punishment unknown to the man at the time the offense was committed; because we see fit to stand by the law as it is, and insist that only such punishment shall be inflicted as was authorized at the time of the offense committed, is the gentleman from Ohio justified in setting us down as opposed to the raising of men for the prosecution of this war, and as opposed to the Government? Sir, it is unjust, and a moment's reflection will satisfy the gentleman from Ohio that he ought not thus upon this occasion to be flinging this opinion of his into the faces of the members upon this side of the House. I have sat here patiently and listened to this kind of talk day after day, and I desire now, once for all, to enter my protest against its repetition.

While I may not have done as much to support the Government as the gentleman from Ohio, I have done what, in my judgment, I could do, to assist the arm of my Government in this terrible conflict. From the time the first call was made I have lent my feeble aid in raising troops, and I have steadily voted for appropriations to enable the Government to carry on the war, though differing with it as to the policy of its prosecution. And, sir, I have had some evidence from those high in authority of their confidence in my loyalty. At one time I had the offer of a very high position in the Army for so humble an individual as myself. But I had no military education and no military experience, and I did not feel at liberty to take the control of the lives and interests of soldiers in the field. My friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] had the tender of a high position and he took it. That is the difference between him and myself. And I insist we are not to be held as enemies to the Government because we refuse to sustain a provision which he has inserted in this clause, punishing a man differently from what he could be punished by law when the offense is committed.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. My object in rising is to draw the attention of the House, for the fourth time under this bill, to the provision that all who shall not return to said service, or report themselves to a provost marshal within sixty days after the passage of this act, shall be deemed and taken to have voluntarily relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship and their rights to become citizens; and that such deserters shall be forever incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, or of exercising any of the rights of citizens thereof. While I am willing to unite with the chairman of the Military Committee in punishing deserters and in enrolling into the Army of the United States all competent and true men, I certainly deem it a legitimate question of debate—without rendering ourselves liable to the charge of disloyalty—as to the propriety or impropriety of the provision of this section which makes it the law that by a non-observance of the obligations to which I have referred a citizen shall be held to forfeit all his rights under the law as a citizen. This bill and the debate under it have brought into issue the question of the loyalty of members upon this floor. It has given rise to a serious question in the mind of every man who has taken his oath to maintain the Constitution, and all these questions center upon the personal responsibility of each member; and it does not become one on either side of the House to charge another with dereliction of duty for conscientiously debating this bill.

Now, sir, the Democratic party stands here today, Cassandra-like, raising its unavailing, sad voice against the introduction of this bill, containing within its fatal ribs the armed enemies of this Government, and its existence as a republic and a free Government upon this continent.

Gentlemen upon the other side of the House have risen in their places and represented to the Committee on Military Affairs that this bill is dangerous to the safety of the State. We charge that with this section, and the lines just read prove it, this bill tends to violate the most sacred rights of every citizen throughout the country.

But, sir, there are other points in this connection. What is the necessity for this stringent measure? Until the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs shall have advanced to an argument more cogent than that of limiting debate to prove that this is a good measure, he, of all men, has the least right to rise here and denounce those who debate the measure. Why has not the Secretary of War reported, as his duty was, to this House with regard to the condition of the armies in the field? We are in the dark with regard to the whole matter of the conduct of this war. Why has not the committee on the conduct of the war reported to the House, and laid before us the necessity for this measure?

Mr. SCHENCK. I think this matter is sufficiently well understood, and I propose to move to stop debate upon this section. Before I do so, however, I must insist upon setting gentlemen right in regard to one particular matter, for I do not mean to be misapprehended. I have made no general charge of disloyalty that should call gentlemen to their feet.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] moved to strike out the section, and assigned as a reason that it would punish a hundred thousand innocent persons. There are two classes of persons to be punished, deserters and those who have gone out of the United States to avoid the draft. Following up that idea, he explained what he meant by saying that he, for his part, was willing to admit that he felt deep sympathy with those, so numerous, who had gone out of the country to avoid having to take part in this war. I remarked, upon the reason thus assigned for striking out the section, that I hoped, on the issue thus made, we should find those who sympathize with deserters and those who have abandoned their country for the purpose of avoiding its service upon the one side, and those who have no such sympathy upon the other. That is all that I said upon that subject.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] misapprehends this section from not having looked carefully, as I think, into its language. He thinks it retroactive. It is not so. It does not provide for punishing those who have deserted in their character of deserters acquired by having gone before the passage of the law, but of those only, who, being deserters, shall not return and report themselves for duty within sixty days. If the gentleman looks at the language of the section, he will find that we have carefully avoided making it retroactive. We give those who have deserted their country and their flag sixty days for repentance and return.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Will not the infliction of this penalty on those who have failed to return to the Army be an additional penalty that did not exist at the time they deserted?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Does not that make the law retroactive?

Mr. SCHENCK. They are deserters now. We take them up in their present status and character as deserters, and punish them for continuing in that character. The gentleman refers to lawyers here. I believe he is a good lawyer himself. Does he not know that if a man steals a horse and runs away with it to the next county it is a continual act of larceny until he delivers up the horse?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Suppose the soldier, being a deserter, has been arrested, and is serving out his time in imprisonment, and cannot get back to report himself, would the gentleman still inflict this penalty upon him?

Mr. SCHENCK. The character of the deserter ceases when he is arrested and brought back and is undergoing punishment; he is then a soldier returned to his place; and though that place may be one of punishment, he is borne on the rolls as a man present, and not as a deserter. That is my reply to the gentleman, and I move now to close debate upon this section.

Mr. NELSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] withdraw his motion, to allow me to offer an amendment to this section?

Mr. SCHENCK. I am asked by others to allow them to offer amendments. If I yield to one I must to all. I will not have time to get through this bill to-day, and the loan bill is to come up to-night, if I allow this section to be kept open for amendment. I must insist upon my motion to close debate upon this section and pending amendments.

The House divided on the motion to close debate, and there were—ayes 50, noes 51.

So the motion to close debate was not agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I renew the amendment. Mr. Speaker, I took occasion a few moments ago to move that this entire section be stricken out, and I proceeded to give my reasons for that motion. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] certainly could not have heard me, for I took particular pains to say that I was disposed to assist the Military Committee, and that I had assisted them in all measures calculated to sustain our Army.

I went still further, and called attention to the portion of this section which I thought bore very heavily upon an innocent class of persons. That portion of the section is as follows:

And all persons who, being duly enrolled, shall depart the jurisdiction and go beyond the limits of the United States, with intent to avoid any draft into the military or naval service, duly ordered, shall be liable to the penalties of this section.

Now, sir, I do not intend to be put in a false position by the sophistry of the gentleman from Ohio. That was the portion of the section to which I alluded when I made my remarks. But the gentleman has chosen to dispute my loyalty, and to class me as sympathizing with deserters. Now, I do not go to Ohio, much less to the chairman of the Military Committee, [Mr. SCHENCK,] for a standard of loyalty to my Government. I am here as a Representative, and while I occupy that position I shall assert my views upon the questions before this House uninfluenced by any consideration from such a source.

Mr. SCHENCK. I only quoted the gentleman's own language.

Mr. TOWNSEND. On Saturday last the gentleman brought in an amendment more odious, if possible, than this. He met several members in argument, and left the House somewhat discomfited by his colleague on the committee, [Mr. ODELL,] and now he comes here and throws out the bile and smothered mortification which were accumulating when he left the House. Sir, I consider the remarks of the gentleman as not only an imputation on my position as a loyal citizen of the United States, but as an infamous accusation against the party to which I have the honor to belong.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] is out of order.

Mr. SCHENCK. Let him go on.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I took particular pains to refer to the class of persons who come under the clause requiring them to report themselves within sixty days or they would be considered to have relinquished and forfeited their rights of citizenship. Now, there are many travelers abroad who may have a wife or child at the point of death; yet if they do not report within sixty days they are to be disfranchised and forever prohibited from exercising any of the rights of citizenship. Such, Mr. Speaker, was the substance of my remarks. The attempt, therefore, of the gentleman to classify me as aiding or sympathizing with deserters, or at any rate as inferior in loyalty to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] I treat with contempt and hurl back with scorn.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no reply to make to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] but his own words which I took down at the time. He asserted as a reason for striking out this section, and for not wanting these "one hundred thousand innocent people" punished, that for his part he "felt a deep sympathy with those who left the country because they were unwilling to take a part in this war."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I deny saying any such thing.

Mr. SCHENCK. The reporters' notes will show whether I was right or wrong. That is the way I understood it, that it the way I took it down. Now, I have said nothing about disloyalty. But if the entertaining such sentiments as I say that gentleman expressed constitutes him a disloyal man, then he is disloyal. That is my opinion. His language and mine will go before the world for what it is worth. What I mean by his disloyalty is that it is such sympathy with disloyalty as shows that he probably entertains the same sentiments which would lead him to desert his country and flag in the time of trial.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is that in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman uses the word "if;" the Chair does not understand him to make the direct assertion.

Mr. MALLORY. He speaks in a Pickwickian sense.

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir; in no Pickwickian sense.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio applied that language to the gentleman from New York, he is out of order under the rules.

Mr. SCHENCK. What language?

The SPEAKER. The language stated by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. ELDRIDGE.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I say that if that was the language of the gentleman, (and such was my understanding of it, and the understanding, I think, of every gentleman here,) then I can characterize those who express their sympathy in such language only as disloyal. That is the way in which I put it. The gentleman can solve the hypothesis for himself, and state on which side he stands.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SCHENCK. The record will show what was the gentleman's language. If the notes of the reporters (provided their report be published unaltered) do not sustain me, then my remarks are unsustained; for they are founded on the language which I understood the gentleman to use and which I have already stated.

Now, sir, the gentleman in the commencement of his remarks spoke of his willingness to assist the Government in the prosecution of the war by furnishing it with all the men and money it may need. I did not comment on that language, because I have heard from certain quarters so much of such professions, unsustained by votes when bills have come before us, that I did not attach much importance to it. I understand perfectly well that, like men in a boat, people may look in one direction and row vigorously in another. I know what too often is the worth of these professions, thrown out in general terms, of devotion to the country and its flag—professions unsustained by official acts when votes come to be given which will show whether such professions are founded upon actual conviction.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I want to ask the gentleman whether he measures his own professions of loyalty by the same standard by which he measures ours.

Mr. SCHENCK. I never measure by anything that comes from the gentleman.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I am afraid the gentleman never measures himself by the true standard.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will not undertake to say whether I sink below or rise above the standard; but I do not take it as my measure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have had our say again, and I move to close debate on this section.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 71, noes 48.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I withdraw my amendment.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. Wilson.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by inserting after the word "ordered," in the sixteenth line, the following words:

Shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof by any court of competent jurisdiction.

On agreeing to the amendment there were, on a division—ayes 53, noes 59.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 63, nays 82, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McKinney, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stiles, Strouse, Sweet, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—63.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Gooch, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Ames Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Webster, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Worthington—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Blair, Ambrose W. Clark, Creswell, Dawes, Frank, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hutchins, Julian, King, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, Moorhead, Odell, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Smith, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, Thomas, Ward, Benjamin Wood, and Yeaman—37.

So the amendment was rejected.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a privileged question. I submit a report from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the Navy appropriation bill.

I will state the principal points of difference between the two Houses. There was one in relation to the appropriation of $1,000,000 for the Gulf, Atlantic, and Mississippi squadrons. It was deemed that the navy-yards at Pensacola, Port Royal, and Key West should be put in condition so that repairs of our naval vessels should be done at those points instead of being compelled to go to the North for that purpose. It was thought that a large amount might be deducted, and $500,000 was agreed upon.

The other point of disagreement was in relation to the midshipmen. The House receded from the increased number of midshipmen, for it was impossible that the increased number could be accommodated at Newport or Annapolis. The other point, taking the nominating power from the House, the Senate receded from, leaving the proposition made on the part of the House that no appointment should be made from any district not represented.

I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was adopted.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, it is deemed of more importance that the loan bill should be considered to-night. I think that we can get through both bills. The tariff bill is printed. I ask unanimous consent that the loan bill shall be considered to-night, and that when that is disposed of we shall take up and act upon the tariff bill.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

RECESS.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to rescind the order fixing the time for taking a recess at half past four o'clock p. m., so that we may go on with the consideration of the enrollment bill. I do not propose to do away with the evening session.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 53.

Mr. DAWSON demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 48, not voting 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Hale, Harrington, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, John, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Ames Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburne, Whaley, Wilder, Windom, and Woodbridge—79.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McKinney, Middleton, Perry, Pruyn, Radford, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stiles, Strouse, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—48.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Blair, Blow, Brandegee, Ambrose W. Clark, Creswell, Eckley, Eliot, English, Grinnell, Griswold, Hall, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hooper, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Kernan, King, Law, McDowell, McIndoe, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Odell, Patterson, Pendleton, Pike, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Townsend, Ward, Webster, Wilson, Benjamin Wood, Worthington, and Yeaman—55.

So the motion was agreed to.

ENROLLMENT BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by inserting what I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to explain the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Debate has been closed.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I move to amend by striking out of line six the words "passage of this act," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "proclamation hereinafter mentioned."

The section, as reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, provides that if a deserter shall report within sixty days after the passage of this act, then certain results shall follow, as specified in the bill. Now, all these deserters in Canada and elsewhere do not know what is done in Congress, and therefore I propose to strike out the words "sixty days after the passage of this act" and insert "sixty days after seeing the proclamation hereinafter mentioned." The proclamation of the President attracts attention everywhere, and they will see it.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the amendment a very good one.

Mr. NELSON. As to the second amendment which I shall propose, which is that in thus reporting such deserters shall be relieved of all penalties and punishment which they have incurred by such desertion, I can say that I have received letters from men in Canada, who say they are deserters from the service of the United States; that they have violated the law; that they are anxious to come back, and if you will give them amnesty for past offenses they are willing to serve out the full term of their enlistment.

Mr. SCHENCK. That matter is only making general, by law, what the President is doing every day almost. I have myself had two or three men pardoned by the President, and permitted to come back on condition that they would serve out their full term in their regiments.

Mr. NELSON. Had we better not make the thing general by law?

Mr. SCHENCK. The President is doing it all the time.

Mr. NELSON. They do not know what the President is doing privately. The gentleman suggests that the President does relieve them from all punishment when they come back. But many of these men have been out of the country for some time, and are not fully posted as to the doings of this House or as to the private action of the President. They know that the moment they cross the boundary they will be seized because somebody wants to make thirty dollars out of their arrest. The first amendment enables these men who have done wrong to have notice how they can get back; and the second says to the men who have deserted that if they will come back their sins shall be forgiven.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have no objection to an amendment somewhat in this form, at the end of the section, "provided the President shall, in his proclamation, notify those persons," so and so.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to that.

The question recurring upon the amendment to strike out the words "passage of this act" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "proclamation hereinafter mentioned." The question was put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. I now move to amend the section by inserting the following words:

And in thus reporting, such deserters shall be relieved of all penalties and punishments which they have incurred by such desertion.

Mr. SCHENCK. I suggest that the gentleman accept this amendment in lieu of his: add to the section the following:

In which proclamation the President is requested also to notify all deserters returning within sixty days as aforesaid that they shall be pardoned on condition of returning to their regiments or companies to serve in such regiments and companies, or in such other organization as they may be assigned to, until they shall have served out the period of time called for by their original term of enlistment.

Mr. NELSON. I accept that.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to amend by inserting after the words "served out" the words "by themselves, or acceptable substitutes."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If there are no further amendments to this section the question recurs upon the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] to strike out the section.

No further amendments were offered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I call for the yeas and nays upon my amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new section, to come in after section eight:

And be it further enacted, That the fifth section of the act to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863," approved February 24, 1864, so far as it applies to the payment of money for the procurement of substitutes, shall be construed to operate as a discharge from military service for one year from the date of the payment of the money aforesaid, by any person drafted prior to the 15th day of February, 1865, and since the 24th of February, 1864.

I offer that amendment for the purpose of giving a construction to the act to amend the act entitled "An act to enroll and call out the national forces," &c., passed in 1863.

The SPEAKER. Debate has been closed upon this section.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I offer it as an additional section. I understand the House refused to strike out the eighth section.

The SPEAKER. They did, and this being an amendment to that section, or immediately following it, it cannot be discussed.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I offer this as an additional section, to come in after section eleven.

The SPEAKER. It can be offered, but not debated, as all debate has been closed upon the eleventh section.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I withdraw it, then, so that I may be able to explain it hereafter.

The Clerk read the twelfth section of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. That section proposes to repeal section three of the act of July, 1864. I desire to explain what that section is by referring to the statute. Gentlemen will find that this third section provides that it shall be lawful for the Executive of any State to send recruiting agents into any rebel State.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. We are all in favor of that. I move to add the following as an additional section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That hereafter, whenever a call for troops shall have been made, and the quotas for the several sub-districts shall have been fixed, the same shall be published, together with the ratio or percentage of these quotas to the several enrollments, and thereafter at any time prior to the day of the draft it shall be lawful for any number of persons to put in an acceptable volunteer or substitute to their credit, and having done so their names shall not be placed in the wheel for the then pending draft: Provided, That the number of persons claiming to put in such substitute or volunteer shall not exceed the proportion of the whole number of enrolled men to the quota required, and it shall be the duty of the Provost Marshal General to give such instructions and make such rules as shall carry this provision into effect.

The second section of the bill already adopted provides that the substitute shall be a resident of the proper district; in other words, that the party putting in a substitute cannot change the residence of the substitute.

Now, in the agricultural portions of the country, it will be extremely difficult for a person to put in a personal substitute because of the fact that there is not the kind of material necessary for substitutes to be had; that is to say, persons who are not liable to draft, such as foreigners or persons who have served a full term of service and been honorably discharged. It is only in the cities and in the larger towns where that class of persons can be found for substitutes, and men living in agricultural districts cannot go there and get them and put them in, because that would be changing their residence. In country districts, therefore, gentlemen will be confined to the very township in which they live to obtain personal substitutes; there will be none of this material for them to obtain substitutes from.

Now, the only remedy for persons so situated is for them to offer large bounties and thereby induce their own neighbors to go as volunteers in lieu of draft. But the corporate authorities of a borough, county, or township, may refuse to pay those bounties, and the result will be that many moneyed persons in the township or borough will be deprived of the privilege of contributing anything in the way of putting in volunteers for their relief from draft, because they are not in a position to raise taxes to pay bounties. There is but one remedy left, and that is suggested in the amendment which I have offered. The same thing is proposed in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, from the Cleveland district, [Mr. SPALDING.] Our amendments differ in this, that mine provides for the publication of quotas, so that parties may know what their rights are, and how many it is necessary to get together to put in substitutes. If one hundred men are enrolled and twenty-five are called for by the quota, then any four may act together and put in an acceptable substitute and have their names taken from the list for that draft only.

Mr. SCHENCK. The object which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has in view is in some senses an exceedingly just and equitable one. There are a great many persons who do not assist in filling the quotas of the several sub-districts, and yet escape any tax for that purpose.

This whole matter, however, has been before the Committee on Military Affairs, and has been discussed again and again, and we saw practical difficulties in the way of every provision of this kind, which I think will suggest themselves to the mind of the gentleman when I mention one or two of them. The first great difficulty is that this is commutation in another shape, for the benefit of the wealthiest men in a sub-district. All those in a sub-district who are able to come forward and pay their money under such a provision would be entitled to designate themselves or a certain proportion of them equivalent to the number of recruits that they had purchased, in the language of the day, to be exempted from the draft.

Now, those who thus contribute will be the men of means, and in proportion as one of them after another is enabled by the help of these associations to get rid of the draft, there remains a residuum of the poor people of the sub-district upon whom the whole burden of the draft will be thrown. That, I think, is one of the practical difficulties.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that point of his argument? The answer to it is this, that where the people of a township refuse to allow a tax that would fall most heavily on the wealthy classes, then I think the wealthy people should have the privilege of coming together and putting in substitutes, relieving to that extent the poorer people by reducing the quotas.

Mr. SCHENCK. It might be, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the sub-district had not the majority to vote the taxes; and if not, the others would be fairly relieved. There is another difficulty in the way. Who shall designate the members of the association who are to be exempted? It is not stated in the amendment. I would scarcely be willing to leave it to the provost marshal to exercise favoritism, and determine who shall be exempt and who shall not be.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. If a party of four persons come forward and put in a substitute they designate the order in which he shall stand for any of them, if drafted.

Mr. SCHENCK. I think the gentleman would find a great difficulty in carrying out this idea. There is another amendment which if this amendment prevail should be made to it. The recruit should not only be acceptable, but should not himself be liable to enrollment. Otherwise you would only be giving to the Government a man to whose services the Government has already a claim.

Mr. SPALDING. I move to amend the amendment by inserting the following as a substitute:

That any person or persons enrolled in any sub-district may, after notice of a draft and before the same shall have taken place, cause to be mustered into the service of the United States such number of recruits not subject to draft as they may deem expedient, which recruits shall stand to the credit of the persons thus causing them to be mustered in, and shall be taken as substitutes for such persons or so many of them as may be drafted, to the extent of the number of such recruits, and in the order designated by the principals at the time such recruits are thus furnished and mustered in.

Mr. Speaker, I do not see the force of the objection which the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs makes to the amendment. In the first place he says that this would have a tendency to exonerate rich men, and throw the burden of the draft on the poor and moneyless. Such would not be the effect. Even without this provision the rich man can always purchase or procure his substitute after he is drafted, and he ordinarily does so. There is no doubt of that. With this provision in, they all subject themselves to the draft, the rich man as well as the poor man, only the rich man has the privilege, or rather any person, rich or poor, has the privilege, after being notified of the draft, of procuring recruits. Any person or association of persons in any district may procure such number of recruits as they may deem advisable, with the understanding that they shall designate the persons for whom these recruits shall be accepted as substitutes in case any of them are drafted. I would like to know if there is any earthly objection to a provision of this sort. My amendment confines the selection of recruits to those who are not subject to the draft. They must be acceptable recruits, and must be mustered in according to the rules of the military service. Is it not for the benefit of the country that such men shall be procured and mustered in, without incurring a draft at all? Such, I am told, would be the effect in many parts of the country if this provision can be ingrafted on the enrollment law.

I do not see, Mr. Speaker, that this can injure any person. All those who are disposed to do loyal service to the country can, in advance of the draft, acquit themselves of their liability by putting in recruits. I hope that one or the other of these amendments will be adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I would call the attention of the House to these amendments. Mine provides that this association of persons shall be authorized to put in substitutes prior to the draft, just as the local authorities of the borough or township now have the right to do. The object is to enable parties to act who are willing to do their duty in this respect when the local authorities do not act. My amendment does not limit them to put in one not liable to draft, for the very reason that it is intended to operate in the several districts where that class of persons is not to be found at all. If gentlemen will reflect a moment they will see that there are no foreigners in the farming districts, and but few of those who have served their time so as not to be liable to the draft. The amendment of the gentleman is objectionable to me because it requires the substitute not to be liable to draft, and in that respect it differs very little from the law as it now exists. I therefore must adhere to my amendment.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I move to strike out the whole section.

The question was upon the substitute offered by Mr. SPALDING for the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania.

Upon this question the House divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 40.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following as an additional section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That hereafter, in order to equalize the several assignments of quotas, it shall be the duty of the proper Department to credit the several districts with the number of men actually furnished, together with the period of service actually rendered, without regard to the period of service to be rendered in the future.

The object of this amendment is to cure what I consider the radical error in the calculation of General Fry, upon which the present pending draft in the country is based. The error which I consider exists in his calculation is this: in estimating the number of men which have been furnished by the several districts and States, he takes into the account of the number of men that have served in the field the number of men that are enlisted to serve, together with the number of years that they are to serve in the future; and then he proceeds to estimate the number of years with the number of men, in this way: suppose the State of Ohio has furnished fifteen thousand one year's men on the day before the call was made by the President or the order was issued for this draft. Then the State would have credit for fifteen thousand one-year men. On the same day the State of Pennsylvania had furnished five thousand three-year men. Then those five thousand three-year men from Pennsylvania would equalize the fifteen thousand one-year men from the State of Ohio, and upon that basis the enrollment would be divided.

That would be all very well if it was well known that this war was to last three years, and that these men would all serve out their time if they are not killed, or do not die from disease, or in some other way become thrown out of the service before they had served out the half of their time. Now, if we should obtain peace by the 4th of July next, then the State of Ohio, under this proposition, will have furnished nearly ten thousand men more than the State of Pennsylvania, under the call, because there is no provision for what these men shall do when the war closes, or when they are discharged before the expiration of their term of service.

It is an error of calculation; it is erroneous for this reason: it puts the men in the Pennsylvania reserves, who have served their full three years of service, who fought before Richmond under McClellan; who fought before Washington under Pope; who fought at Antietam under McClellan, at Fredricksburg under Burnside, at Chancellorsville under Hooker, and at Gettysburg under Meade, against those men who have merely promised to serve for three years to come. And if the war closes before that three years expire then the State which has furnished their old three-year men will be defrauded, according to this calculation. Therefore it is for the purpose of correcting this radical error, which is creating so much disturbance throughout the whole country, that I offer this amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to state my understanding of this proposition. The amendment is this: if at the last call for troops made by the President the State of Connecticut, for instance, furnished five thousand three-year men and the State of Rhode Island furnished the same number under the same call, but for one year, then at the next call Connecticut shall furnish the same amount as Rhode Island does. That is to say, that State that furnished three-year men under one call shall get no more credit than the State that furnished an equal number of men for one year only. Now, in New York many of us did not believe that the war would end right away. And under the last call we endeavored to fill our quota in some of the districts with three-year men; and the patriotic and industrious men not liable to draft contributed liberally of their means, and have sent men for three years. Now, is there any justice in this proposition to make those districts which have furnished three-year men, instead of one-year men, furnish now the same number of men as those districts who furnished all one-year men and no three-year men? That is a simple statement of this proposition. The wrong appears upon its face. Your district, we will say, has furnished men for three years; while my district has furnished them for one year. Is it right that when you have five thousand men in the field to serve for two years yet to come your district shall furnish another thousand and mine another thousand?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. The error of the gentleman's argument is this, that he puts service to be rendered in the future against service rendered in the past. Now, when Rhode Island puts in her one-year man against New York's three-year man, let them both serve one year, and then let Rhode Island be called on to furnish another man for the second year which the New York man serves.

Mr. NELSON. That would do, if the Government would let off New York's three-year man at the end of one year; but the Government keeps him in the service.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. We can give New York the credit of the second year of her three-year man, while the State of Rhode Island is called on to furnish a man in the place of her one-year man whose term has expired.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that debate upon the section, and all amendments thereto, be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That hereafter in all examinations, whether of drafted men, substitutes, or volunteers, under this act and the several acts to which this is supplementary, the rules and regulations for the acceptance and rejection of recruits, on the score of physical ability or disability, and for other causes, shall be the same.

The amendment was rejected.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COFFROTH. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That hereafter it shall be lawful for any person to present to any United States mustering officer or provost marshal an acceptable substitute for himself, and have the same mustered into the service of the United States; and thereupon such person so mustering in such substitute shall be exempted from enrollment and draft for the period such substitute shall be so mustered; and the sub-district in which the principal resides shall have credit accordingly.

The amendment was rejected.

The thirteenth section was read, as follows:

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That section fifteen of the act approved February 14, 1864, entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting after the words "any civil magistrate" the words "or any person authorized by law to administer oaths."

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the fifth section of an act to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863," approved February 24, 1864, so far as it applies to the payment of money for the procurement of substitutes, shall be construed to operate as a discharge from military service for one year from the date of the payment of money aforesaid, by any person drafted prior to the 15th day of February, 1865, and since the 24th of February, 1864.

I desire to explain, in a very few words, my purpose in offering this amendment. The object is to give construction to former acts upon this subject. The question has arisen in many districts whether, under the act of February, 1864, men were authorized to pay in $300 and thus exempt themselves from military service. That question, I understand, has been submitted to the Secretary of War; but, so far as the public knows, no decision upon it has been made. The object of this amendment is to give to those who have paid in $300 under the commutation clause credit for one year from the date of such payment.

I desire to say further that this is a question that does not affect my constituents, for they have not had occasion to avail themselves of this provision for commutation, as we have, under the various calls, furnished our quotas throughout the State.

But there are members here whose constituents have felt an interest in the proper construction of this section. It is evident, from the reading of the law, that the purpose was to exempt those who paid $300, that being received by the Government in consideration of the services of the party who was drafted. I believe that this is only fair to those who have been called upon to pay commutation money. It was contemplated by Congress that they should have that credit.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Illinois gives manifestly a wrong construction to the law as I understand it. In the fifth section of the act of February, 1864, to which he refers, it is provided that the maximum time for which the $300 should exempt a man was one year, and the minimum was until the next call, which might be in a month. The longest possible time that the payment of money would leave a man off the enrollment was one year, when his name, it was provided, should be put back again. If, however, there was another call within a few weeks, he was liable to the draft. The gentleman's amendment gives a wrong construction to the law, and I hope that it will be rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the last word.

I think that the gentleman from Ohio is wrong in his construction of the law. The law as it stands exempts the man who pays for one year, that is, the time for which the quota was called. He is not again to be liable until that year has expired. It would be absurd to say that a man drafted to-day for one year, after paying his money, should be again liable to draft within that time. There is no doubt that the construction of the gentleman from Illinois is the right one. This commutation was in lieu of his service for one year and he was to be exempted during that time. It seems to me that there can be no doubt about that construction of the law. I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will refer to the section of the law. It provides that if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute under the provision of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall only operate to relieve such person from the draft in filling that quota; and his name shall be retained upon the rolls in filling future quotas. Now, that fixes the normal law in the case.

Mr. STEVENS. The law evidently is that it exempts the man for the time for which he was drafted. It exempts him for a year. I withdraw my amendment.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. J. C. ALLEN.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 53.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. J. C. ALLEN and FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 62.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I move to add the following:

That so much of all acts or parts of acts entitled acts to regulate and provide for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, as authorize the President of the United States to raise troops by conscription be, and hereby are, repealed; and that all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this section be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. Speaker, my object in offering this is to give an opportunity to those upon this floor who conscientiously and earnestly believe the whole system of a draft is contrary to the spirit of our institutions and opposed to the welfare of our people to place their vote upon record. I deem it a great privilege, with those who agree with me, to say to the people of the country that we adhere to the military system under which our liberties were won, and that we are unwilling to fall away from it and the precedents of the American Government, to establish the European system of raising troops and organizing armies in the midst of a civil war. Our recent victories show that the armies of the rebellion, raised by conscription, are fleeing everywhere before our troops who were raised by volunteering. Why should we, imitating those who have rebelled against the Government of the United States and inaugurated a system of conscription, adopt a similar law and impose it upon the loyal and devoted people of this country, who have responded to every call of the Government thus far, and exposed themselves and offered their fortunes for the protection of the Union?

If the signs of the times do not mislead us, the rebel hosts have been scattered, and the arch-conspirator who drew them after him in rebellion against the highest earthly power, the people of this country, is about being hurled from his bad eminence, overthrown by our veteran volunteers and their skillful commanders. A conflict is raging among the stars which emblazon the southern half of our political horizon. That ruling spirit which they called from his high station here to hold them in harmony by his genius is stealing them one by one from their eccentric orbits to adorn the seat of his power as the center of a new system. Whether by force supernal or infernal he may achieve this mighty wrong we know not. The supreme power may be snatched from a portion of our people, and the sovereignty of our States may glitter in the southern cross above the throne of a despot. If so it is to be, then before long the weary eyes of those who withdrew from our councils and our fellowship with proud looks and bloody hands must cower before the artificial blaze of light which shall burst from that throne, and bowing their prostrate forms before their tyrant yearn for the calm and peaceful effulgence which once fell with universal blessing on the remotest section of this Union. With this warning sent to us from the very field of battle are we not unwise and heedless of the dangers actually surrounding the Constitution and the Union by continuing this conscription bill among our laws? Can we hope to escape the consequences inseparable arable from an undue military power in the hands of one man and his partisans? Are we prepared to surrender the civil and religious rights of every citizen of this country to the almost Turkish justice of a military tribunal?

But suppose, as we have good reason to hope, that our rebellious brothers reunite with us again in national council for the restoration of the Union as it was. Suppose that they unite their force with our armies and bear their banner and their cross, token of suffering and betrayal, against the new emperor whose audacious throne is already fixed upon a continent proclaimed free, and, under God, sacred to the sovereignty of the people alone. Against him, united in battle, we may hope forever to sustain unbroken and untarnished the bright shield of our Union as it ever before gleamed in triumph against the despotic principles of feudalism and vassalage, until this whole boundless continent be ours. If this comes to pass, and our people arm themselves again for war, does any man dream that a conscription will be needed? The past history of this crisis has shown it to have been unnecessary; at the present it is useless and worse than unnecessary, it is corrupt. Let the enrollment law be now repealed.

I see no reason for debating this subject further. I do not wish to continue to draw upon the passions of the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I submit the matter to the consideration of the House with a perfect reliance in the propriety of my action in voting against this bill, and am ready to abide by the judgment which may be passed upon its merits by the country.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that all debate be closed upon this section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. SLOAN. I move that all debate be closed upon the entire bill.

The SPEAKER. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. PRICE. I object.

The motion of Mr. GARFIELD was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I call for the yeas and nays upon my amendment, and tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CHANLER and BROOMALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-seven, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 95, not voting 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Brooks, Chanler, Clay, Denton, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Benjamin G. Harris, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, William H. Miller, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Prunyn, Rogers, Ross, Stiles, Strouse, Townsend, Wadsworth, Chilton A. White, and Joseph W. White—27.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ames, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Brundage, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Daves, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Knox, Lazzar, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Worthington—95.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Coffroth, Cox, Creswell, Dawson, Fieck, Grinnell, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Charles M. Harris, Herriek, Holman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Kalfleisch, Kasson, Kernan, Knapp, Law, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Middleton, James R. Morris, Nelson, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Scofield, Smith, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stuart, Sweet, Thomas, Voorhees, Ward, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—69.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I move to amend by inserting the following as new sections:

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to detail one or more of the employees of the War Department for the purpose of administering the oaths required by law in the settlement of officers' accounts for clothing, camp and garrison equipage, quartermasters' stores, and ordnance, which oaths shall be administered without expense to the parties taking them, and shall be as binding upon the persons taking the same, and if falsely taken shall subject them to the same penalty, as if the same were administered by a magistrate or justice of the peace.

SEC. —. And be it further enacted, That "acting assistant surgeons," and "contract surgeons," and surgeons and commissioners on enrolling boards, while in the military service of the United States, shall hereafter be exempt from all liability to be drafted under the provisions of this act and the acts to which this is an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that matter is not fully understood. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope not.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to amend by adding the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the payment by any person of $400 to the provost marshal of his district (to be proved by said provost marshal's receipt for the same) shall exempt such person from all liability to military service for the term of twelve months thereafter; and the payment of $700 in like manner shall exempt any person so paying the same from military service for the term of two years thereafter.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is that amendment germane to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to amend by adding the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That hereafter the head of a family, consisting of not less than two children dependent upon him for support, the mother being dead and he having no wife living, shall be exempt from draft into the military service of the United States: Provided, That the entire value of the real and personal estate owned by such head of family shall not exceed in value $1,000 and his income shall not exceed $500 per annum.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to go back for the purpose of offering a proviso to the second section.

Objection was made.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. Then I offer my amendment as a new section, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That any person who shall have served in the Mexican war and been honorably discharged, and having in addition served through one enlistment during the present rebellion, and been honorably discharged from the service, shall be exempt from military duty for three years from and after the passage of this act.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House refused to strike out the twelfth section.

Mr. THAYER. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent to extend the time of the recess until half past seven o'clock, instead of seven o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I then make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move to rescind the order by which the House agreed to sit here until we shall have disposed of this bill.

The question was taken; and the motion was disagreed to—ayes 45, noes 61.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That hereafter no draft shall be ordered until for ninety days prior thereto the President of the United States shall have made proclamation for volunteers for the respective periods of one, two, or three years, as he shall deem proper, and in such proclamation he shall have offered to every recruit the sum of $500 as bounty for one year, $1,000 for two years, and $1,500 for three years in quarterly installments; and if at the expiration of the said term of ninety days one half the number of men required shall be furnished, then he shall issue a similar proclamation limiting the time for volunteering to sixty days; and if at the expiration of sixty days one half the residue shall be furnished, then he shall issue a like proclamation limiting the period to thirty days, at the expiration of which time it shall be lawful to issue an order for draft for the balance of the number of men originally required according to the provisions of this act and the acts to which this is supplementary.

I desire to say a word or two in explanation of that amendment.

The SPEAKER. No debate is in order, all debate having been closed upon this section and amendments offered thereto.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I renew it.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The Clerk then read the fourteenth and last section of the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to close all debate upon that section, and all amendments thereto.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I move to add the following as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That all district provost marshals shall have authority, under such orders and regulations as the Provost Marshal General shall prescribe, to compel the appearance at any time before the enrolling board of their respective districts of all persons enrolled in said district, for the purpose of examination and the correcting and perfecting of the said enrollment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move the previous question on the bill and the pending amendment.

Mr. ROSS. I move to lay the bill and amendment on the table.

The question was taken; and the House refused to lay the bill and amendment on the table.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that we progress with this bill until we reach the vote upon its passage, and then postpone it until a certain hour to-morrow when we can have a full House.

Several MEMBERS. Why not pass it now?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. It is late, and there is not a full House here. [Cries of "Pass it now."]

Mr. SCHENCK. The suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania might do in ordinary times, but there are only five days of the session left, and the bill has yet to go to the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. There are only four days of the session remaining.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered, being first upon the amendment proposed by Mr. Hotchkiss.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I desire to say a word or two in explanation of my amendment.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order, the previous question having been seconded.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to explain the object of the amendment. [Mingled cries of "Object!" and "Hear him!" from all parts of the House.] I am sure if the House understood the amendment they would agree to it. [Loud cries of "Order!" and "Hear him!"] A moment only.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made upon both sides of the House, and no debate is in order under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Well, I demand tellers upon the amendment.

Tellers were not ordered.

The amendment was disagreed to—ayes 26, noes 77.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. GANSON. I call for the reading in full of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late; the bill has already received its third reading.

Mr. SCHENCK. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 46, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, Baily, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Boutwell, Boyd, Brundage, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Daves, Denning, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Worthington—83.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Brooks, Chandler, Clay, Cravens, Dawson, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Philip Johnson, Kernan, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McKinney, Middleton, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Rogers, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Wadsworth, Ward, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Fernando Wood—46.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, John D. Baldwin, Bliss, Blow, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clark, Coffroth, Cox, Creswell, English, Grinnell, Hall, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hutchins, William Johnson, Julian, Kalbfleisch, King, Knapp, Knox, Lazear, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, William H. Miller, Nelson, Odell, Pike, Pruyn, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, Seofield, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Townsend, Voorhees, Wilder, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Yeaman—53.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the roll-call,

Mr. MOORHEAD stated that Mr. NELSON was paired off with Mr. SCOFIELD.

Mr. PRUYN stated that he was paired off with Mr. SPALDING, otherwise he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. PERRY stated that Mr. STEELE, of New Jersey, was detained at home by sickness.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And thereupon, at forty-five minutes past five o'clock, p. m., the House took a recess until seven and a half o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at seven and a half o'clock, p. m.

ARRIVALS IN THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, showing the number, ages, &c., of passengers arriving in the United States by sea; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

UNPAID TREASURY DRAFTS.

Mr. PRUYN, from the Committee of Ways and Means, asked leave to report a bill in relation to certain drafts issued by the Treasurer of the United States in satisfaction of warrants which are outstanding unpaid.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read. The first section enacts that all amounts which are represented by drafts issued by the Treasurer of the United States prior to July 1, 1861, to facilitate the payment of warrants directed to him for payment, and which may remain outstanding unpaid on the 1st of July, 1865, shall be entered or covered into the Treasury, to the credit of the parties respectively in whose favor they were issued, and to the credit of an appropriation account to be kept by the First Comptroller and First Auditor for the redemption of outstanding drafts, &c., and the amounts of the drafts entered or covered in, are to be considered as a permanent appropriation for the satisfaction of such unpaid drafts.

The second section enacts that the drafts, the amounts of which shall have been so entered or covered in, shall be counter-entered in the accounts of the Treasurer, Assistant Treasurers, designated depositaries, collectors, or receivers, on whom they were originally drawn for payment.

The third section enacts that the bona fide holder of any draft, the amount of which shall have been so entered or covered into the Treasury, shall, on presenting it to the First Auditor, be entitled to have it paid, by settlement of account or warrant, according to the practice in other cases of claims against the United States.

The fourth section enacts that at the termination of four years after this act shall begin to operate the provisions thereof shall apply to all similar drafts which may then remain outstanding unpaid for four years or more.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I inquire whether the bill was ever referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PRUYN. It was before the committee. It came from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by a very brief letter, which I ask to have read, in order to explain the object of this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know how the Committee of Ways and Means got jurisdiction of this matter. I have no objection to the bill being introduced now and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The letter from the Secretary of the Treasury was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, February 24, 1865.

SIR: Under the present law, and consequently the practice of the Treasury, the various drafts of the Treasurer and Assistant Treasurers and Depositaries that may not, for any reason, be presented for payment, prevent a proper settlement of their several accounts; and consequently whatever settlement is made must be, to that extent, imperfect upon their books.

To obviate this serious difficulty, I have the honor to submit the draft of a bill, which directs that all amounts represented by unpaid drafts outstanding more than four years shall be covered into the Treasury to the credit of the several payers of the drafts, and thereafter such drafts will be paid upon a settled account, passing through the hands of the proper accounting officers of the Treasury. I respectfully request the early action of the committee in regard to the bill.

I am, very respectfully,

W. P. FESSENDEN,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. T. STEVENS, Chairman Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, with permission to report at any time.

Mr. PRUYN. Very well.—

The bill was so referred.

Mr. PRUYN. I now ask to report back the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen from New York will state whether he is authorized to report this bill from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. PRUYN. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am justified in saying that the Committee of Ways and Means have had no meeting on this subject, and the gentleman is not authorized to report this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will remember that during the last Congress and also during the first session of the present Congress, the same question was raised upon the Illinois ship-canal bill, reported by the gentleman from Illinois and afterward re-reported. The Chair then stated, after examining the precedents, that all he can ask of a member is, "Are you authorized to report the bill?" If he replies that he is, the Chair cannot go behind that statement.

Mr. GARFIELD. The same decision was made a few days ago on the bill increasing the pay of officers in the Army.

The SPEAKER. A number of instances could be referred to.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Speaker, I wish simply to say that this bill was brought here at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, to facilitate the office business of his Department. In closing up accounts with depositaries it often happens that there are drafts outstanding, so that it is impossible to get the accounts closed on the books. The Secretary of the Treasury desires the passage of this bill, in order that when such drafts are presented they may be placed to the credit of the parties, and the account closed.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question. I wish to know whether the object sought to be accomplished by this bill is simply to enter upon the books of the Treasury Department a credit to the parties holding the drafts, or in favor of whom the drafts may be drawn—the amount of the drafts to be drawn at any subsequent period by the holders of the drafts, or those to whom they may be transferred.

Mr. PRUYN. That is the object. The amount of the drafts will be paid to whomever may present them properly indorsed.

Mr. HOOPER. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that this bill will be referred as proposed, to the Committee of Ways and Means, with leave to report at any time. Let the committee have action upon it. It can be reported in the morning. It appears to me that this course will answer every purpose. I hope that my colleague on the committee [Mr. PRUYN] will withdraw his proposition, and allow the reference to be made.

Mr. PRUYN. I cannot do that after what has occurred. In the course which I have taken I have acted on behalf of and by the authority of the committee. It may have happened that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] was not present at the meeting of the committee.

I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. Being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COBB, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted on their sixth amendment, disagreed to by the House, to the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866; and had appointed Messrs. COWAN, WILSON, and CARLILE, a committee of conference on the part of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House appoint a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

LUCY A. RICE.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am requested, Mr. Speaker, to ask the House to take up joint resolution of the Senate No. 116, for the relief of Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, late of Richmond, Virginia. Mrs. Rice is the lady who, in Richmond, secreted our prisoners of Streight's command. In doing this she was not only subjected to considerable expense, but she did it at the risk of property and life. She afterward fled from Richmond and came to Washington. She is now here in a state of great destitution. This is the information which I have obtained from a Senator who well understands all the facts. The joint resolution proposes to appropriate to this patriotic lady $1,500. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be now taken up and acted on.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill was read.

In consideration of her patriotic services it appropriates to Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, her heirs or administrators, $1,500.

Mr. PENDLETON. Is it designed to put this joint resolution upon its passage at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. PENDLETON. To that I must object. I have no objection to the taking up the joint resolution for reference.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking this joint resolution from the Speaker's table for consideration at this time.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to.

The joint resolution was taken up, and read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be read a third time; and was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. STILES, respectively asked and obtained leave of absence for the remainder of the night's session.

CALIFORNIA AND OREGON RAILROAD.

Mr. McBRIDE moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 691) to authorize and aid in the construction of a railroad connecting the Pacific railroad, in California, with the Columbia river, in Oregon, and Puget sound, for the purpose of proceeding to its consideration at this time.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. KERNAN. What committee reported this bill?

Mr. McBRIDE. The select committee on the Pacific railroad.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. How much land is granted? I want to know how much land is taken away from our soldiers.

Mr. McBRIDE. The grant is the same as that made to the Pacific Railroad Company on the main line, though it does not cover anything like that amount of land. It runs through a series of valleys in California and Oregon where the land is almost all taken up.

Mr. KERNAN. They can hardly do anything with it the coming summer. Let it go over so that we can have an opportunity to understand it.

Mr. McBRIDE. This bill has been printed and upon our table for weeks past. If gentlemen had taken any interest in it, I think they could have examined it before.

Mr. KASSON. I offer the following additional section, being the same I offered to the land-grant bills for the State of Iowa:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That if either of said companies shall fail to complete twenty miles of road in any one year, the lands not earned by previous construction shall revert to the United States, and become subject to disposition as fully as if this act had not been passed. And all the lands certified to either of said companies under this act shall be sold by said companies, at private or public sale, within five years from the time such companies may become entitled thereto.

Where you allow these companies eight or ten years within which to complete their work, they obtain possession of these lands and hold them all from settlement, thus weakening the State which it is proposed the road will benefit, by retarding the increase of settlers, and the development of the resources of the State. If the road gets into the hands of capitalists they tie up these lands for an indefinite period of time. I therefore desire the incorporation of such a provision as this in every land grant for railroad purposes which shall be made, for the interest of the State through which the road is to pass.

Mr. COLE, of California. I wish to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa. I would like him to state whether, in case of a failure to complete the twenty miles each year, there is to be a forfeiture of all of the land, or only of the land along that twenty miles.

Mr. KASSON. If it were restricted to the lands along the twenty miles that would not do. It would be ineffective unless the entire lands should revert.

Mr. COLE, of California. I am sorry that the gentleman did not bring his proposition before the select committee before whom this subject has been under consideration for a long time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. There should be no objection to that amendment.

Mr. McBRIDE demanded the previous question. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 59, nays 34, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ames, Baily, Baxter, Beaman, Boutwell, Boyd, Freeman Clarke, Cole, Briggs, Eckley, Eden, Eliot, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Law, Lazar, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, John B. Steele, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, William B. Washburn, Whaler, Wilder, and Worthington—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Cobb, Coffroth, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Denison, Dixon, Ganson, Herrick, Hubbard, Kalfelisch, Kernan, Long, Marcy, Middleton, Morrill, Daniel Morris, John O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Pruyn, William H. Randall, Ross, Thomas, Townsend, Tracy, Ward, Elithu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, and Wilson—34.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Brandegee, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanier, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Cravens, Cresswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Deming, Donnelly, Dumont, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Farnsworth, Finck, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, King, Knapp, Mallory, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, William H. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Odell, Perry, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweat, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Williams, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—89.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. SHANNON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled House joint resolution No. 82, in relation to the distribution of books and documents; when the Speaker signed the same.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Ohio. I ask that my colleague, Mr. FINCK, have leave of absence for this evening.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MARGARET CHANEY.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Claims a bill for the relief of Margaret Chaney, the old woman referred to some time ago by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] as having lost a hundred dollar note. There is no doubt that the note was burnt up.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

LOAN BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to take up and consider the loan bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LITTLEJOHN in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill No. 772, to provide ways and means for the support of the Government.

Mr. STEVENS. I move a substitute for the bill. When my colleague on the committee [Mr. HOOPER] has been heard, and any other gentleman who wishes to speak on the subject, I will close the debate with a few remarks.

The Clerk read the substitute, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow from time to time, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding $600,000,000, and to issue therefor coupons or registered bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after ten years, and payable at any time not more than forty years from the passage of this act, at a rate of interest not exceeding eight per cent. per annum, and of such denominations, not less than fifty dollars, as he may deem expedient. And he may, in his discretion, dispose of such bonds, at any time, upon such terms as he may deem most advisable. And said bonds shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be at liberty to exchange bonds similar to those provided for in the first section of this act with the holders of any bonds or obligations of the United States bearing interest: Provided, That such exchange shall be offered by the holders of obligations within two years after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury may dispose of bonds similar to those provided for in the first section of this act, in exchange for Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, certificates of deposit, or any representatives of value which have been or may be issued under any act of Congress; and whenever any person or persons owning a claim against the United States for materials or supplies furnished, which shall have been duly adjusted and approved by the proper officers, and for the payment of which requisitions shall have been duly made by the appropriate Department or officer, upon the Treasury of the United States, shall have given notice in writing to the Department or officer making the requisition, that the owner of such claim desires to subscribe for a loan authorized to the amount of said claim, or some part thereof, and to receive in payment of the same the bonds or other obligations similar to those provided for by this act, the said officer or Department, when making such requisition, shall specify therein the name or names of the claimant or claimants who shall have given such notice, and also the amount of such claim or claims; and thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue to the officer or Department making such requisition the bonds or other obligations aforesaid, to be delivered in payment to said claimant or claimants at the same rates and under the same conditions that the Secretary disposes of similar bonds or obligations, not below par, to other parties; and such issuing of bonds or obligations shall to that extent be a valid compliance with such requisition.

Mr. STEVENS. The last section of my substitute has not been printed, and I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] will offer the same matter as an amendment to the original bill, and in that respect they will not differ.

Mr. HOOPER. This bill, with some amendments that I am directed by the committee to propose, came from the Treasury Department. It authorizes $600,000,000 to be borrowed for the next fiscal year on such terms and in such of the forms as have been heretofore authorized, except that no part of it shall be made legal tender, or be in smaller denominations than fifty dollars. The annual rate of interest is limited not to exceed six per cent. if payable in coin, nor in any case to exceed seven and three tenths per cent.; and the time for which any bonds may be issued is limited at not less than five nor more than forty years. Within these limitations and restrictions the bill leaves everything to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

The substitute offered by the chairman of the committee proposes to confine the Secretary to the issue of bonds payable after ten years, and bearing interest at the annual rate of eight per cent., payable in currency. In all other respects the bill and substitute are essentially alike. The annual rate of seven and three tenths for interest was deemed by the committee the highest that the Government ought to pay for money under any circumstances. By making the principal and interest of the bonded debt payable in coin we have some standard of value in view to which everything used as currency should be brought as early as is practicable. It seemed therefore to the committee important to adhere to the policy which has been heretofore adopted, of paying the interest on all bonds in coin, in view of making the currency equivalent to coin at the earliest possible period.

I do not propose to detain the House by any further remarks, but I will answer any inquiries in explanation of the bill. Unless the committee desire further discussion I will now propose amendments which I am instructed by the committee to offer. The first is of a verbal character entirely. It is to insert in line thirteen after the word "at" and before the words "any period," the words "or after;" so that the clause will read:

At the pleasure of the Government at or after any period not less than five years nor more than forty years from date, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to amend in line fourteen after the word "or" by inserting the words "may be made redeemable and;" so that the clause will read, "or may be made redeemable and payable as aforesaid."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to amend, in line eighteen, by striking out "and" and inserting "and bear such dates and be;" so that the clause will read:

Not less than fifty dollars, and bear such dates and be made redeemable or payable at such periods, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. At the end of the first section I move to add the following proviso:

And provided further, That the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, shall be so construed as to authorize the issue of bonds of any description authorized by this act. And any Treasury notes, or other obligations, bearing interest, issued under any act of Congress, may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and with the consent of the holder, be converted into any description of bonds authorized by this act. And no bonds so authorized shall be considered a part of the amount of $600,000,000 hereinbefore authorized.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to state in explanation of this amendment, that the object of it is to make any bonds that are authorized to be issued after the 4th of March—that is, the bonds remaining under the bill of the last session—homogeneous with the bonds authorized under this act, and to allow the Secretary, if he chooses, to give them the same character as the notes which are authorized to be issued under this act, or the notes which he may see fit to issue under this act. It merely brings what remain of the bonds authorized to be issued by the act of last year into the same category with the bonds authorized by this act.

Mr. PRUYN. What is the difference?

Mr. HOOPER. There is no difference. All the authority under this act is general.

Mr. PRUYN. I mean, what is the difference between these bonds and those of last year?

Mr. HOOPER. This bill is more comprehensive as to the forms that may be used than the bill of last year.

Mr. PRUYN. The rate of interest will be the same?

Mr. HOOPER. The rate of interest will be the same.

Mr. PRUYN. That is right.

Mr. HOOPER. I have another amendment which I desire to offer. I move to insert after the word "Congress," in line nine of the second section, the following:

And may, at his discretion, issue bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act, in payment for any requisitions for materials or supplies which shall have been made by the appropriate Department or office upon the Treasury of the United States, on receiving notice in writing through the Department or office making the requisition, that the owner of the claim for which the requisition is issued desires to subscribe for an amount of loan that will cover said requisition or any part thereof.

I would remark that that is the same proposition that was referred to by the chairman of the committee as being in his substitute, although not printed.

Mr. PRUYN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to a verbal correction which ought to be made in the twenty-fifth line of the first section. It now reads, "and the principal, or interest, or both, may be made payable in coin or in lawful money." The word "other" ought to be inserted there after the word "or," so as to make it read, "or in other lawful money."

Mr. HOOPER. I can see no objection to that.

Mr. PRUYN. I believe the Committee of Ways and Means came to the conclusion that they would not hold that coin is not lawful money. [A laugh.]

Mr. STEVENS. It is just as well to leave it as it is, because gold is not money at all now.

Mr. HOOPER. I see no objection to that amendment, and hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. PRUYN. We came to the conclusion that we could not hold that coin is not lawful money, and the chairman thought with us on that point.

The amendment suggested by Mr. PRUYN was agreed to.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, on a proposition of this magnitude I had supposed that the Committee of Ways and Means, which reported this bill to the House, would have been prepared to have presented to the House and to the country some grounds in its behalf. When the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] assumed, as he did, its paternity, knowing his ability and how conversant he is with questions of finance, I had supposed that some attempt at least, even in the way of explanation, would be made. Sir, the financial affairs of this country now present questions which are secondary to no other now agitating the public mind. The Government money or credit is really absorbing the whole monetary affairs of the country. The public credit is everywhere. The affairs of banking institutions and of corporations, as well as of individuals, are conducted by it. A proposition, therefore, to add $600,000,000 on the already stupendous debt is of that magnitude that it requires the thoughtful consideration of this Congress and of the people. Indeed I think it is agitating the anxious mind of every man in the community who is capable of appreciating its magnitude and the inevitable effects.

Six hundred million dollars! Never before in our history has such a proposition been made. I go further, and say that never in the history of any country, ancient or modern, has there ever been a like proposition, of an amount so great to be voted by any legislative body in one sum, and at one time. Why, sir, the whole national debt of Russia, a nation with a population of sixty millions, that has been at war more or less for a hundred years, that has, notwithstanding our warlike attitude, a larger standing army than our own, has a debt of only a little over this sum.

But though so great, I am not prepared to say it may not be wanted, nor that it will not be voted, nor that it will not be borrowed. I certainly am not prepared to say that it will not be expended. Yet it is a duty to review the whole subject of our financial condition, that we may have a proper understanding of this whole question.

In the discussion of a question of this character, if we would reach an intelligent conclusion, it is our duty to examine thoroughly and carefully, not only the amount of the existing debt, but also to see whether there is not some way to obtain a reduction of it instead of making the enormous proposed increase.

Let us look a moment at the component elements of the debt—how it has been created—whether the policy heretofore pursued has been a wise one, and see whether it is not possible to devise ways and means, without more taxation and without more borrowing, to hope for some elevated, comprehensive scheme of finance that will, from our own substantial resources, promptly meet the interest on the public debt, and finally liquidate the principal. That is the duty of the American Congress and of the American people.

Now, as to the public debt. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his last annual report, furnished an estimate of the public debt at the conclusion of the next fiscal year, June 30, 1866. After referring to the erroneous estimates of his predecessor, after telling us very truthfully and frankly the impossibility of being accurate in estimates either of receipts or disbursements, he, however, estimates the debt at that time to be $2,223,064,000. Now, receiving that estimate with the same latitude of allowance of other estimates from the Treasury Department, I have taken the liberty of adding twenty per cent. to it, to meet probable deficiencies. That would increase it $444,000,000. To that must be added the estimated unaudited accounts, because I assume that in the estimates of the public debt made by the Treasury Department no unaudited claim, even on file in the Department, is comprehended. I have reason to believe, sir, that the unaudited accounts, just, legal, and proper, that will in due course be audited, allowed, and paid, amount at least to $100,000,000 more. To that I add an estimate of the unascertained valid claims against the Government, those that have not yet even been presented in form. These I estimate at $100,000,000 more.

Then, sir, there are the State war debts. Missouri, Pennsylvania, and other States have already presented their war debt claims to Congress to be audited and settled. These claims are predicated on the ground of money honestly and legitimately expended in the maintenance of the integrity of the general Government. Hence, sir, if there be any claim that in my judgment is equitable as against the General Government, it is the claim for reimbursement of moneys that were expended in the defense of the General Government. These claims will amount in the aggregate to, at least, $225,000,000. To that I will add, on similar grounds of equity, the city, borough, and county debts. The city of New York alone has expended over seven million dollars. In the year 1861, between April, 1861, when the war commenced, and the 1st of January succeeding, under my administration as mayor of that city, $1,000,000 was expended in the outfit and supplies of troops sent here for the defense of the capital and for the prosecution of this war. Adding other items, as stated below, the total is $3,342,124,000. This I presume must be sooner or later funded, and continuing the present policy of borrowing in currency and paying in coin, will have to be paid in gold. I submit a table recapitulating these estimates.

Public debt, present and prospective.

I am not without authority in predicting that our public debt must be paid in coin. Mr. SHERMAN, chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate, said to-day, on opening the debate on the internal revenue bill, that "when I see the money thus borrowed expended on trivial objects I cannot but look forward to the slow and hard process by which it must all be repaid in gold with interest accumulated and accumulating." But it requires no authority for the statement. Having commenced this system of borrowing greenbacks and promising to repay in gold, and assuming that the whole war debt as above aggregated must be settled by Government, of course the same mode of payment must be continued.

Mr. Chairman, this is the present and prospective debt of the country—an enormous aggregate, but an aggregate which has to be liquidated or repudiated. I do not believe that the American people, under any possible circumstances, however corrupt an Administration may be in the expenditure of the public money, and however reckless in the accumulation of the public debt, will ever repudiate. Our obligations will be met; but the inquiry may well be, how? and when?

These questions I am not now discussing; I am dealing with the enormous indebtedness, and, to appreciate its magnitude, call your attention to that of other nations.

Compare this with the public debt of the six most powerful nations of the world: Great Britain has a public debt of $3,760,000,000; France, $1,330,000,000; Russia, with a standing army of eight hundred thousand men, has a public debt of $733,000,000; Austria, with a standing army of four hundred and twenty thousand men, has a public debt of $500,000,000; Spain, with a standing army of one hundred and sixty thousand men, has a public debt of $1,300,000,000; Prussia has a public debt of $180,000,000. The aggregate public debt of the six most powerful nations of the world is $7,803,000,000—but a trifle more than our own.

Now, what are the causes which have led to our great public debt? I shall be answered that the war has caused it. I deny it. The war has furnished a pretext for much of it. I am aware that armies and navies cannot be created and subsisted, that Government cannot be conducted under circumstances such as those under which our Government has been conducted for the last four years without the expenditure of a large sum of money. And I am aware that from the very necessities of the case millions, ay, hundreds of millions, would be used under the most economical administration of the affairs of Government that would be possible. But were it possible to know how every dollar of this stupendous sum has been expended, and we could know where the public money has gone, it would be a most astounding revelation and create a revolution in the minds of the confiding and deluded American people. I shall not attempt it. It is sufficient to refer to some of the leading sources.

Undoubtedly at the head of the category, and as the corner-stone, stands the erroneous and fallacious financial system of the late Secretary of the Treasury. What was that system? Temporary expedients, based upon a theory which necessarily created a disastrous inflation of the currency. It commenced by borrowing nearly every dollar that the State banks had to loan, and then, when having them in a dependent and crippled condition, devised a scheme for their destruction by warming into being a powerful rival backed by the power of the Government. Again, by putting into the circulating medium of the country an artificial element which operated to inflate the currency. This, together with the new national bank currency, enhanced prices twofold, ay, threefold; and as prices became thus largely enhanced, of course the expenditures of the Government became largely and relatively increased. Therefore I look upon the erroneous and fallacious financial system adopted by the Treasury Department as the head and front of the numerous causes which have created this immense public debt.

But that is not all. Another cause may be found in the wrong war policy that was adopted, the immense expeditions that have been fitted out and which have been failures, the want of appreciation of the power, resources, and courage of the enemy, and in the invention and prosecution of enterprises totally useless and fruitless. Why, sir, the attempts to take Richmond overland, under the dictation of the fanatical crew who yelled "On to Richmond!" cost over one hundred million dollars. I allude, sir, to those Quixotic expeditions before General Grant was called from the West to take command of the army of the Potomac. The same may be said of numerous naval expeditions, the fleets and armadas which have been fitted out to no purpose and without result. Millions have been expended to gratify political dependents; in the construction of largely less iron-clads and other vessels; in experiments on all kind of war materials; in the purchase of worthless supplies, outfits, and armaments, merely for the purpose of dispensing patronage; in the extortions submitted to in like quarters from the same motives; in the support and pay of thousands of idle civil officials under pay who have done nothing, and are doing nothing; in the numerous military and naval officers on "like duty," namely, drawing pay and doing nothing; in the omission or refusal of the Government to exchange promptly prisoners, thus depriving the service of an average force of at least thirty thousand men, and in consequence entailing an expense in the support of the confederate prisoners in our prisons; and finally, in the many millions expended in the care and support of worthless, dependent negroes, to which may be added the vast sums spent for fishing bounties, for soldiers' bounties, for traveling agents in various forms; supporting at least one hundred thousand men who have rendered no public service whatever.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is yet another element of expense. I allude to the corruptions and frauds; frauds in making contracts, frauds in purchasing supplies without contracts, frauds in the charge and allowance of commissions, in the collusion between officers of the Government and outside parties, in the official appropriation of public money, in the pretended payment of bounties, in false pay-rolls, in alleged recruiting expenses, in the expenditures for the payment of soldiers and others not actually employed. Why, sir, a member of this House told me the other day that there are over one million men upon the pay-roll, alleged to be in the Army. Well, sir, we all know that there are not to-day over half a million men under arms as soldiers of this Government. Yet we are paying over one million men to-day. Where are they? They have no existence in fact as soldiers; and the Government is defrauded of an extraordinary amount.

Then, too, there are frauds in the payment of supplies, in the alleged expenses of the collection department, in the collusion of internal revenue collectors and assessors with merchants and manufacturers. There are frauds in the custom-houses, in the navy-yards, in the provost marshals' offices, in the selling of Government property to rebels, in alleged supplies to rebel prisoners, in alleged service for mail-carrying, in the expenditure of a vast secret-service fund.

I will admit that it is almost impossible, in conducting a Government like this at a time like this, to maintain the strictest integrity in all its various departments. But, sir, these frauds, these irregularities, these profligate and useless expenditures, have during the last four years been greater than were ever witnessed before in this or any other country. These are among the chief causes which have contributed to the creation of the present debt.

Now, sir, the first requisite is the institution of principles of rigid economy. We want reform; reform in the conduct of every branch of the Government, in the planning of campaigns, in the expenditure of money, but especially in the conduct of the finances. The great objects of the statesmen who represent this Administration in Congress appear to be in the development of ingenious devices to tax and borrow. To them there appears to be no other resource. It does not appear to be within their comprehension that there are other means for raising revenue. As preparatory to some suggestions on this point, permit me to offer a few general reflections. Assuming that a merchant has a capital of $100,000, and puts his notes into the market for that sum, his notes are worth one hundred cents upon the dollar. If he issues notes for $200,000 they are worth but fifty cents on the dollar. And so, in proportion as he extends his credit and issues his promises, those promises decrease in value.

So it is with our credit. Our political financiers are surprised because the late military results have not lessened the value of gold. They think that gold ought to have fallen because we have had military successes. Such has not been the effect—and why? Because the market value of gold when measured by currency is regulated by commercial and monetary considerations instead of military ones. The reason why these military results have not raised the price of the national currency is, first, because there is an undue redundancy of it, owing to the fact that the monetary affairs of the country have been badly conducted; secondly, this system from the time it was devised has been of a character necessarily to depreciate the responsibility of the Government; and thirdly, because our expenditures are so much in excess of our revenues. How long would you trust a man with an annual income of $30,000, who spent $90,000? How long would any prudent merchant have confidence in the responsibility of an individual or corporation that expended three times its revenue, and made up the difference by borrowing? The same principles apply to the affairs of Government. Public affairs, if properly conducted, are administered on the same principles that govern individuals. Those who pretend otherwise and who talk about the science of sociology, and seek to throw around this question a mysterious exclusiveness of knowledge, really understand very little about it. There is no other science than that which is founded in common sense.

Hence it is, by the extraordinary expenditures and the other errors to which I have referred, we are a large debtor with inadequate assets. The difference between our receipts and disbursements is so great that public confidence is wanting. This want of confidence is shown in the difference between the standard of value—namely, the precious metals—and our promises to pay. We may talk as we please, but, after all, this is the plain, palpable fact. Now, sir, where is the remedy? It is not only in the economy and judicious management of public affairs, but in the development and realization of resources within our reach but not yet attempted. We have substantial elements of value and wealth inexhaustible.

At the last session of Congress I introduced a resolution, with the intent to initiate a policy of great moment. I refer to the proposition requesting the President to assume possession of and work the mineral lands belonging to the Government. Our Territories of Idaho, Arizona, Montana, and States of Oregon, California, and Nevada contain gold, silver, and other minerals of a value probably far beyond that of similar wealth in any other country of the world. Other nations have made available such resources. Napoleon covets the rich provinces of Mexico solely for the revenues to be derived from them in the precious metals. He seeks Sonora, the richest mining district of Mexico, that his coffers may be replenished. For years he has been devising this scheme as a source of national wealth and not of territorial acquisition. Spain by the proceeds of her quicksilver mines was enabled to bear the expense of a war with both France and England almost at the same time. Russia derives large products from similar quarters. Indeed, all nations except ourselves have availed themselves of the riches existing in the bowels of their own earth, within their own territory.

Now, sir, we have mineral lands in excess of all European Powers together. Idaho, Nevada, Oregon, California, Arizona, and Colorado, are three fourths precious ore. This is public property—as much so as this Capitol. Not one step has been taken toward realizing these values. No sir, not one; but we have gone on borrowing to-day to pay that which we borrowed yesterday, apparently with no other thought or faculty than that of spending, taxing, and borrowing. A prudent merchant would convert existing assets before doing either one or the other. No sane individual would borrow at large interest while in the possession of illimitable wealth lying idle and unproductive.

But there is yet another mode of raising revenue, in a manner that neither taxes nor imposes liabilities—a mode which will impose no burden upon the American people. I allude to the levying of an export duty upon articles shipped abroad. I know that the general opinion is—and such was my opinion until recently—that there is a constitutional restriction against levying an export duty. I have looked into that question, sir, and I have availed myself of such authorities and information as were at hand in order to ascertain whether it was so or not, and whether the authorities were sufficient to justify the conclusion that there was no power. The Chamber of Commerce, in New York, has sent a memorial to Congress asking an amendment to the Constitution permitting Congress to impose a duty upon exports; and I understand the honorable gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] has introduced a proposition to the same effect.

I have read with great care the debates of the convention which framed the Constitution, and of the several State conventions which ratified it, but have been unable to reach the conclusion that Congress has not the power to levy a duty on exports. We have indirectly done it already. There have been no shipments from this country for years that has not left something in the hands of the General Government. A cargo cannot be exported until a clearance is obtained at the custom-house. The manifest contains an enumeration of the articles shipped and the value thereof. To that statement the owner or shipper must make oath, and pay the clearing charges. Is not that a tax? I know that in technical phrase it is called a custom-house fee, but it is a tax nevertheless. Under the old debenture laws two and a half per cent. of drawbacks was left in the hands of the Government. Was not that an export duty? The question was not raised as to the power of Congress to pass such measures when these laws were enacted. In this House, recently, we imposed a tax of six cents a gallon upon petroleum, and that tax follows the article across the sea—there was no drawback in consequence of the export. Is not that equivalent to an export duty? If we can do a thing indirectly we can directly. Now, what is the provision of the Constitution which it is supposed restricts Congress from laying an export duty. It is found in article one, section nine, subdivision five, which states:

"There shall be no tax or duty laid on any article exported from any State."

It appears to me that this was not intended to apply to exports to foreign lands. Brightly, in his marginal note opposite to this provision of the Constitution, refers to it as relating to "State duties." No tax or duty shall be laid on any article "exported from any State," not from any port of the United States; not from the United States; but that no tax or duty shall be laid upon any article exported from any State. Though found among the restrictions upon the powers of Congress, it seems to me to have been intended that Congress should lay no tax or duty on any interstate commerce.

Assuming the power, how vast would be the revenue from such a source. The exports from the United States during the last half of the last fiscal year were two hundred and forty odd million dollars, and the last month produced relatively the much larger amount. It is safe to estimate when we again become, as we shall, a cotton exporting country, with a continuation and increase of the petroleum and other shipments, that this will reach $1,000,000,000 per annum, and an export duty of twenty per cent. upon that would produce $200,000,000, and no domestic interest would suffer; an export duty becomes an element in the cost to the foreign consumer. No citizen of the United States would pay a dollar of it. The original cost, the export tax, and the shipping expenses, freight, commissions on sales, and import duty upon the other side, make up the cost to the foreign consumers. The result, therefore, would be that that $200,000,000 thus contributed to our Treasury would come out of the pockets of citizens of Europe, and not of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, I am admonished that my hour allotted to this discussion has closed. I have endeavored to present my views in plain language and with a strict regard to truth as to statement. If I have not succeeded in convincing the committee that our present financial system is ruinous, and that every principle of political economy has been disregarded, I have not only failed in my object, but I shall regret the attempt. There is, however, an outside tribunal to whom I appeal and if it shall fail to appreciate, let time determine whether the homely precepts of common sense or the fine-spun theories of dreamers, speculators, and speculators are best for a great people suffering under a great wrong.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, as the number of members in the House is not very large this evening and as several gentlemen wish to leave, I propose that we name an hour to-morrow when a vote shall be taken on the bill and amendments, with the understanding that the debate may go on until that time.

Several MEMBERS. Close the debate now.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. There are gentlemen who wish to discuss the details of the bill in a business discussion.

Mr. STEVENS. I am willing to agree to anything that the gentleman from Massachusetts proposes.

Mr. HOOPER. I was going to suggest that, by general consent, we take the vote on this bill at one o'clock to-morrow.

Several MEMBERS. To-night.

Mr. HOOPER. I withdraw the proposition.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, of course I expected, having offered the substitute, to defend that substitute in some remarks of twenty or thirty minutes' duration. It is suggested, however, that I reserve my remarks until after the previous question is seconded. I have no objection to that, and if any other gentleman wishes to address the committee to-night I will postpone my remarks.

Mr. WILSON. I suggest to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that he move that the committee now rise for the purpose of closing debate, and that then we have a five minutes' debate on amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well; I will renew my amendment in the House and then make my speech. I have no objection to that if it be the sense of the committee. I therefore move that the committee do now rise for the purpose of closing general debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEJOHN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration as a special order the bill (H. R. No. 772) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that all general debate on the bill terminate in one minute after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall have resumed its consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WARD. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to me for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. I will hear what the gentleman has to say.

Mr. WARD. I desire to say that I have been detained from the House for some weeks by indisposition, and have been unable to complete some remarks that I intended to submit. I ask the House for permission to print them.

Permission was granted.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LITTLEJOHN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration, as a special order, of the bill (H. R. No. 772) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, general debate being closed by order of the House in one minute.

The question was taken on Mr. Hooper's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I propose the following as a substitute for the first section of the bill:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized to borrow from time to time, on the credit of the United States, in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized, any sums, not exceeding in the aggregate $600,000,000, and to issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe; and such bonds shall be of denominations not less than fifty dollars, and may be made payable at any period not more than forty years from date of issue, or may be made redeemable at the pleasure of the Government at any period not less than five years nor more than forty years from date, or payable as aforesaid, as may be expressed upon their face; and the interest on such bonds shall be payable semi-annually: Provided, That the rate of interest on any such bonds shall not exceed seven and three tenths per cent. per annum; and the rate of interest shall be expressed on all such bonds.

The difference between that substitute and the report of the Committee of Ways and Means is this. The substitute strikes out of the first section of the bill all that part that authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue interest-bearing notes, and confines him to bonds, either coupon or registered. It also provides the rate of interest on the bonds at seven and three tenths instead of six per cent.

The object is simply to prevent the issuing of any notes to circulate as money, beyond the amount now authorized by law. Under the section, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, the Secretary of the Treasury would have authority to issue $600,000,000 of Treasury notes, not legal tender, it is true, but nevertheless notes that might circulate as money. Their denomination should not be less than fifty dollars, as provided by the section reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Now, sir, I am not in favor of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue any more notes. I think that the authority which he now has goes far enough in that direction. I think it is our duty, as I expressed on another occasion, instead of adding to the volume of the currency, to provide some means whereby it may be reduced. This amendment does not provide for a reduction; it simply provides against the proposed expansion.

Now, it is no answer to this objection to say that the Secretary of the Treasury may not issue any of these notes. The very fact of the authorization of such an issue by this bill would create an uncertain state of affairs throughout the commercial circles of the country. The knowledge that the Secretary of the Treasury had the power at any time to put in circulation an amount of notes, to circulate as money, limited only by the amount fixed in this bill, namely, $600,000,000, would certainly unsettle very much the value of everything that can be affected by an expansion of the currency; not so much as the expansion itself, but to a certain degree; and it does seem to me that it would be suicidal to us to place upon the statute-books of the country an authorization of this kind.

I am opposed also to authorizing the issue of any more bonds, the interest on which is to be paid in coin. I think we should not pursue that line of policy, inasmuch as the sale of the present seven and three tenths loan is supplying all the money that is needed. We should have some settled policy. A constant change, either in the character of the bonds, or of the kind of money in which the interest is to be paid, or in the rate of interest, continually operates to unsettle the securities of the Government. If, at the commencement of this war, we had established a policy with a fixed rate of interest, defining unchangeably the character of the money in which that interest was to be paid, I believe it would have been much better for the financial affairs of the Government, and that to-day our debt would not have been so large as it is. It is the constant change and uncertainty of our issues; the resort to-day to coin, and to-morrow to paper; the resort to-day to six per cent., to-morrow to seven and three tenths per cent., and the next day to eight per cent., as suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in his substitute—it is this which tends to shake the confidence of the community in all the securities of the Government.

Mr. KASSON. I have regretted that the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] and my colleague, [Mr. WILSON,] should take a position, and I should equally regret that any other gentleman should take a position so decidedly adverse to the policy urged in this bill upon the committee and on the House. On the one hand this bill is declared to be unprecedented in its policy; on the other hand, my colleague [Mr. WILSON] says that this policy now proposed tends to unsettle the money markets of the country. Now, I think it will appear from a single glance at our past legislation that both gentlemen are equally wide of the mark. It is not unprecedented, because it conforms exactly to every loan bill, after the first one, that has been authorized since the commencement of this war. It does not tend to unsettle the money market, because it is exactly what the policy of the Government has been, and what the money market is accustomed to in this country.

This bill has been published long enough for every financial man in our great commercial centers to become acquainted with its contents, and I have yet to learn from any financial source or center any apprehension that the policy indicated by this bill tends to unsettle the money market or the financial policy of the country. The bill is put expressly upon the ground that it is what the public are accustomed to; it is exactly what the public expect; it is exactly what I have seen recommended in the money articles of four leading commercial papers, and commended as the exact policy which the Government should pursue. I had occasion formerly, on some other financial bill, to caution the committee to be careful how it changed the policy of the Treasury Department which has hitherto characterized the administration of the finances of the country. I maintain, differing entirely with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] that this policy has met with results entirely unexpected, in the great prosperity with which it enabled us in this country to carry on this war.

In the beginning of the war it was announced from the other side of the Atlantic that we could not possibly raise the means to carry on this war one year without resorting to the assistance of foreign capitalists to obtain the means for our necessary expenditures; yet the very policy now censured by the gentleman is one that has carried the country successfully up to this time, so successfully that the amount of debt unpaid is hardly appreciable compared with the amount of money expended in satisfying the lawful demands upon the Treasury.

This money question is a delicate one; one which I always hesitate to approach. But when I find a bill presented in this House containing a policy hitherto known to the country; when I find that policy supported by the Secretary of the Treasury, he being a man originally entertaining the same views as my colleague, [Mr. WILSON,] but who now recommends this policy; when the Committee of Ways and Means is almost unanimous for the policy now proposed to the House, I submit to gentlemen that I have reason to beg them to be careful how they attempt to break down that policy and unsettle the financial affairs of the country.

Mr. WILSON. Will my colleague allow me to say a word? Of course I have not the same means of knowing the views of the Secretary of the Treasury as my colleague; but if I understand the report made to Congress by that officer at the commencement of this session he does not favor the issuance of any more gold-bearing bonds.

Mr. KASSON. This bill has not only come from the Treasury Department, but has been the subject of repeated consultations with that Department since it came to the hands of the committee. It does not necessarily result in the issuing of these gold-bearing bonds; but the power to issue such bonds was declared by the late Secretary of the Treasury, and is declared by his successor, to be a desirable alternative in any loan bill. By vesting this power in the Secretary of the Treasury we give him an important influence over the money market.

My time is brief, and I must hasten on to notice the suggestions which have been made about increasing the volume of the currency. In this bill we have limited the lowest denomination of any character of obligations to fifty dollars. Therefore, in the nature of things, as long as they cannot be legal tenders they cannot swell the volume of the currency of the country. The propriety of this measure must be patent to any gentleman who will consider for a single moment the necessity that may arise for something else besides bonds and paper currency. Suppose that for a single quarter the amount of gold in the Treasury should prove to be less than was required for the payment of the interest on our gold-bearing bonds. Suppose that the Government should be obliged to go into the market to obtain gold. Would it not be better, in such a case, that the Secretary of the Treasury should have the right to effect a temporary gold loan for the small amounts required for one fiscal quarter rather than that he should be compelled to go into the general market and pay whatever price might be demanded? Does not England issue exchequer bills for the express purpose of reaching over these temporary deficits in the Treasury? It is the custom of every treasury department to do so; and we cannot justly deprive ours of the power.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa by striking out all after the word "provided;" and I would suggest to the gentleman that perhaps he will better attain the object that he desires to reach by dividing the question.

The gentleman who has just taken his seat has discussed only one of the questions involved in the amendment; that is, whether the interest should be payable in currency or in gold. But the amendment contemplates another and a very material object, which does not at all depend upon that question, and which may be either adopted or rejected, however the question of interest may be determined.

The first part of the amendment relates to the form in which the security is to be given. The bill leaves this absolutely at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury. Under the bill as reported, that officer may issue coupon bonds, or Treasury notes, gradually accumulating interest, in the form which has hitherto been used and which now constitutes a very large proportion of that inflation of the currency under which the country is suffering.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman will allow me to remind him that, in the last section of the bill, there is a restriction against the issue of anything that is legal tender. By this bill nothing is authorized to be issued as currency; it simply authorizes the issue of different forms of loan.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I am perfectly aware of that. And I desire to say that the delusion which appears to rest on the minds of gentlemen is the supposition that they have ended the currency question when they have disposed of the question of legal tender. A bank note, sir, is not a legal tender; yet bank notes have in very great measure inflated the currency. Currency is anything that is in such form and has such value that it will pass conveniently and readily from hand to hand in lieu of coin. Whether it be a legal tender is absolutely immaterial. Making its notes legal tender was a resort of the Government to compel the acceptance of those notes; and it would have been equally effective whether those notes had or had not value independent of that given to them by the coercive authority of the Government. And although you do not give these obligations that coercive power which our legal tender laws have given them, if the Government issues Treasury notes, subdivided into sums which will answer the purposes of currency, in such sums as will pass from hand to hand in the daily commerce of the land, so long as the credit of the Government is equal to the credit of a bank, the Treasury note will stand as a bank note; and if there be two Treasury notes while the market only calls for one, there will be a corresponding inflation of currency and a corresponding depreciation of value.

Now, what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] designed to accomplish by the adoption of his amendment was, to require the securities issued by the United States to be in such form that they should not and would not be, in the nature of notes used as currency. He would confine them to coupon or registered bonds of such an amount as would not likely be used, and, indeed, from their form, would not be used as currency.

So far as the amendment touches that point I am anxious that it should prevail. Whether we shall adopt a specie basis for interest or currency notes for interest is a question on which gentlemen may differ and on which I confess I entertain serious doubts, and I should like to be enlightened by the views of the committee and other gentlemen of the House. Therefore, I pray the gentleman from Iowa to let us remedy one grievance and take the first part of the amendment, and let the interest question be settled by a subsequent vote.

Mr. WILSON. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Maryland I will say that I will modify my amendment, leaving the proviso of the committee to stand with the words "or other obligations" stricken out.

Mr. KERNAN. I think that the gentleman will accomplish his purpose by striking out in the seventh and eighth lines the words "or other obligations;" and in the fifteenth line to the twenty-first inclusive, the words, "and so much thereof as may be issued in other forms than bonds may be made convertible into any bonds authorized by this act, and may be of such denominations—not less than fifty dollars—and made redeemable or payable at such periods as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury may be deemed expedient."

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That has been stricken out.

Mr. KERNAN. It leaves the bill to give authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow on bonds with the interest payable in currency. It strikes out the part authorizing him to put forth currency.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That is it exactly. Mr. WILSON. My amendment, as modified, will make it read as follows:

Provided, That the rate of interest on any such bonds, when payable in coin, shall not exceed six per cent. per annum; and when not payable in coin shall not exceed seven and three tenths per cent. per annum; and the rate and character of interest shall be expressed on all such bonds or obligations.

Mr. KERNAN. That ought to be adopted, for the time has come when we ought to raise money without issuing currency.

Mr. MORRILL. It is well understood by every member of the House that the Government has not been able to negotiate loans as fast as its necessities required; and the proposition on the part of the gentleman from Iowa is to restrict it to one single class of securities when the Secretary of the Treasury, whoever he may be, will desire two classes. I think that we should give him that much option. He should have the right to issue bonds or seven-thirty Treasury notes; in other words, in the form of the English exchequer bills, but only for a longer period of time.

As to this becoming currency, I utterly repudiate the idea that it is possible for them to become currency unless they are made legal tenders. What are the facts in reference to the compound interest Treasury notes? After they have run a certain length of time they are all withdrawn from circulation; sometimes it takes longer and sometimes shorter. And it is true that even legal-tender Treasury notes are withdrawn from circulation.

If these obligations or Treasury notes should be allowed to be issued by the Government, they will not only be a convenience to the Government, but they will afford a convenience to those saving Government stock. They will be a convenience to our soldiers in the field if they have a large amount of Treasury notes. They will save sums not larger than ten dollars. At such a time as this, though our affairs are exceedingly prosperous, I would not cripple the Treasury, but would give it a choice of securities to throw upon the market. It certainly may at times be a very great convenience to issue these notes; and if the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa had gone any further than that, and confined the issue of bonds and Treasury notes, I would have no objection. But to strike the whole out, leaving solely bonds to be issued, would in my judgment cripple the Treasury to an extent which I do not think this House will feel justified in doing.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I have no doubt that a great many purposes of convenience would be answered by leaving the Secretary of the Treasury at liberty to put the credit of the Government in any form that would suit the convenience of the occasion. I have no doubt that the convenience of the soldiers, of officers, of small capitalists, of all persons who have small means to invest, might to some extent be met more easily by one plan than by another. And if that were the only question I would not say one word against it.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is a matter of life and death that there should be restored a normal ratio between the currency of the country and the standards of value—gold and silver. It is merely penny-wise and pound-foolish to attempt to accommodate small classes in the community at the expense of all the permanent interests of the whole body of the community. One dollar now in gold is worth two dollars in currency. The mere result, therefore, of the Government borrowing money at this time at that rate is that the Government binds itself to pay twice as much as it receives, and when you levy taxes you have to put on twice as much in order to get enough to carry on the Government. In that, I state a proposition that no one will controvert, not even my distinguished and learned friend from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL], to whom I cheerfully accord the credit of being the ablest financier in either branch of Congress that it has been my pleasure to meet during the last eight years. But the plain, simple fact is that if tomorrow you double the currency you must double the taxes; and if there be any one thing true, both in point of common sense and political economy, it is that every step you take in the direction I have indicated is a step toward lightening the burdens of the people, restoring the rates of value, and making that which is the normal standard of value approximate to the real value. And if that be so, of what earthly moment is it that a few individuals in the Army, a few old maids in the country, a few persons who have only a hundred or fifty dollars to invest, should be accommodated, when the finances of the country are being ruined and posterity being burdened with nearly a double burden, because everything is depreciated by doubling that which is of no value excepting as currency?

Now, what I wish to accomplish, what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] wishes to accomplish, what I take it the sound, second sober thought of the House wishes to accomplish, is to reduce the enormous volume of currency. This license to the Secretary of the Treasury is an advice to him that the volume of currency may properly be increased under circumstances, though there is no such combination of circumstances now that any foresight can point out. We have got along up to this period, and now, when we can see the end of the rebellion, when our military establishment may be decreased, when there is scarcely any use for the Navy for active operations, when we look forward for decisive events in forty or fifty days, when we hear crumbling the confederacy before our armies, is it to be supposed, if we insist that there shall be a definite standard of value, that the credit of the Government cannot raise by loan what is needed? I concur with the gentleman from Iowa that the mere uncertainty put into this bill is an obstacle to any permanent improvement of the finances of the country.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend by striking out the last line, for the purpose of enabling me to reply to the mistaken argument of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.] It is put upon the identical ground as if we were providing by law expressly for the issuing of Treasury notes to circulate as currency.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That is the effect of it.

Mr. KASSON. That is undoubtedly not the effect of the bill according to history and precedent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. But it is according to the working.

Mr. KASSON. Not necessarily flowing from the bill in any particular whatever. We have frequently given this discretion to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he has not since we last gave it him exercised it to the amount of one dollar; and gentlemen should not now endeavor for a moment to alarm the people of the country by indicating that it is the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means or of the Secretary of the Treasury to swell the volume of the currency. We have fixed the minimum denomination of the notes at the same as that of bonds, and as they bear interest at seven and three tenths and six per cent., payable in gold, they cannot remain in the market for sixty days. And why? Because you cannot invest your money in any of the ordinary transactions of commerce that will pay you as much interest as that will.

Now, sir, in view of this fact and in view of the fact that with the discretion given to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue over one hundred million dollars of gold-bearing interest bonds and not one dollar of gold-bearing interest bonds issued, with discretion to issue it in Treasury notes, and not a dollar in Treasury notes issued. I ask gentlemen how they can say for a moment that the effect of this bill is either to compel or to induce the Secretary of the Treasury to exercise this power thus proposed to be granted to him. On the contrary, I maintain the position I took before, that the very moment you take away the two powers from him to bridge over difficulties in the financial market and use a legitimate influence in controlling the financial affairs of the country, in case your taxes and loans running from five to forty years do not realize the money you want to pay the Army and Navy, you cannot, even though the Army and Navy may be willing to take exchequer bills and send them home to their families as investments, pay them in that form of security.

I do trust that the common sense of the committee will perceive the danger of taking from the Secretary of the Treasury a power hitherto exercised with such remarkable success and with such soundness of judgment.

I believe this meets the last arguments, so far as I am able to meet them, offered by my friend from Maryland and my friend from Iowa. I hope that before we adopt a policy radically changing the present system more serious consideration will be given to it than can be given in a hasty five-minute debate. I now withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PRUYN. I renew the amendment to the amendment for the purpose of saying a very few words on this subject. I probably should have contented myself, on this branch of the question at least, with listening to what might be said by other members of the House and not have joined in the debate had it not been for what has occurred on the other side of the House, and especially for the remarks which have been made by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. WILSON] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.] Last year I think both these gentlemen united most persistently in that measure which gave away $300,000,000 of the legitimate circulation which the Government might have used to the national banks. One hundred and fifty millions at least, and I believe that at this time perhaps nearly two hundred millions of that $300,000,000 have already been taken up. Now, it may very well be that with this unlimited power of circulation, as it were, given to the national banks, the Secretary of the Treasury may need nothing more for the purpose of carrying on the affairs of the Government; but should the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] which is not yet before the committee, to restrain the circulation of the national banks and to cut off that supply, be adopted, it may very well be that in that case the Secretary of the Treasury may want the bond powers which this bill confers upon him.

Sir, I repeat that I should have permitted this part of the bill to pass by had it not been for what has occurred upon the other side of the House; but now that Administration members have taken the ground that the gentleman from Maryland and the gentleman from Iowa have taken, I feel that I am placed in a position in regard to this matter which is somewhat different from that which I before occupied.

I was glad also to hear the gentleman from Iowa state certain propositions of the same character as those which I laid before the House last year—that this thing had commenced all wrong, that we were wrong in the outset in the character of the debt we had created, and that it was now time we should retrace our steps. This opens a larger field of discussion than I can presume even to touch under the five-minute rule.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. PRUYN. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. A year ago I favored the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to abandon the gold interest-bearing form of bonds and to resort to the payment of interest in currency. I furthermore stated some days ago in some remarks which I submitted to the House that I did not favor the adoption of the present national banking system, but voted against that system originally.

Mr. PRUYN. But last winter you voted for it.

Mr. WILSON. Last winter, when the question was put to me whether I would continue the old act without amendment or adopt some amendments to it, I voted for the amendatory act, because I thought it was better than the original one.

Mr. PRUYN. I always agreed with the gentleman from Pennsylvania at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means, that we never should have given away this large amount of circulation to the national banks; and the sooner we cut it off by adopting an amendment such as the gentleman from New York proposes the better for the country.

Mr. HOOPER. What about the circulation of the State banks?

Mr. PRUYN. I did not propose to increase the circulation of the State banks. Whatever that circulation was at the commencement of the war I was willing to let it stay at that, and let the Government come in and fill up the vacuum; instead of which we have given away $300,000,000 of circulation, and the sooner we cut it off the better. Under these circumstances I shall vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, by virtue of which the discretionary power to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury shall be limited in the respect which he mentions.

Mr. HOOPER. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York. I am not surprised at the statement coming from that side of the House, that we have begun wrong and have continued wrong. I think the action of the other side of the House has been consistent with that view.

Mr. PRUYN. This evening it came from your side of the House. Last year it came from ours.

Mr. HOOPER. It was your statement that we commenced wrong and continued wrong. I must confess that I am somewhat surprised at the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] and at the argument of the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS.] With some knowledge on this subject, it had never occurred to me before that the issues under a simple loan bill can be used for currency, and would become currency, the two things seemed to me so entirely distinct. I admit that there has been an attempt to connect the two, to some extent, in the bills which authorize the compound-interest notes, which were made legal tender for their face value. But even these, I think, cease in a short time to become currency, and are converted into loans. After the interest has accumulated somewhat on them the parties holding them generally reserve them to get the benefit of the reserved interest, instead of passing them for their face value.

Mr. PRUYN. If that be the correct view of the matter, what is the reason of the difference in this act, unless it is intended that the one thing shall be different from the other?

Mr. HOOPER. This bill itself distinctly excepts the issue of anything for legal tender. I will send to the Clerk's desk and have read a short extract from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, which I think explains the two ideas of loan and currency.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Failing to raise the means required in the ordinary mode, and urged by the conviction that the large amount of suspended requisitions, swollen to more than one hundred and thirty million dollars, should be reduced, the Secretary resolved to use all the means at his command to pay so much, at least, as was due to our brave soldiers, who were suffering from the long delay in satisfying their just claims but still continuing to serve their country with unflinching courage and uncompensated devotion. To effect this object he was compelled to replace the whole amount of five per cent. notes which had been canceled, amounting to more than eighty million dollars, and even slightly to exceed that sum."

Mr. HOOPER. This was currency; legal-tender notes bearing interest, but a legal tender for their face value. I wish to call attention to the next portion of the paragraph, in which the Secretary shows that there should be an issue of bonds, such as are now proposed, as the soldiers wish to take them as loans. The two, in my opinion, have never been mixed together to be taken as currency. They were taken as loans.

The Clerk continued the reading, as follows:

"More fully to accomplish his purpose, the Secretary resolved to avail himself of a wish expressed by many officers and soldiers, through the paymasters, and offered to such as desired to receive them seven-thirty notes or small denominations. He was gratified to find that these notes were readily taken in payment to a large amount, our gallant soldiers, in many instances, not only receiving them with alacrity, but expressing their satisfaction at being able to aid their country by loaning money to the Government. The whole amount of notes thus disposed of exceeded twenty million dollars, and the Secretary has great satisfaction in stating his belief that the disposal thus made was not only a relief to the Treasury, but proved a benefit to the recipients, in affording them a safe and valuable investment, and an easy mode of transmitting funds to their families."

Mr. HOOPER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the exigencies of the Treasury are not less now than they were at that time. I hope that the Secretary may have the privilege of issuing a loan in such form as will better meet the exigencies of the Government.

Mr. KASSON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] that the committee now rise and report the bill and amendments to the House with the understanding that the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] and my colleague, [Mr. WILSON,] each of whom has an amendment to propose, may propose it in the House.

Mr. PRUYN. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. THAYER. I renew it for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOOPER] whether the note [a $100 compound-interest note] I now exhibit to him is currency?

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will pass it along here I will make it an investment. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOOPER. It is a legal tender for $100; but about this time its value is $103.

Mr. THAYER. It is not legal tender for the whole amount secured by it.

Mr. HOOPER. It is legal tender for its face, $100, but not for its full value, $103.

Mr. THAYER. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. It is getting late; I propose that the committee now rise, with the understanding that we go into the House simply with the original bill; I will then in the House offer my substitute, and any other gentleman that chooses may offer amendments. Then I will call the previous question, and we can adjourn upon that until morning.

Mr. WILSON. I cannot agree to that for the reason that if the amendment which I proposed is adopted in its present form I desire to offer another to do away with the coin provision of the section as it would then stand.

Mr. STEVENS. What I propose is for the gentleman to offer both those amendments in the House.

Mr. WILSON. I desire, in connection with that second amendment, when it comes up for consideration, to present the views of the Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject.

Mr. HIGBY. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] propose that there shall be no debate in the House when the other amendments are proposed?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Does the gentleman propose to allow any gentleman to offer in the House such amendments as he may think proper?

Mr. WILSON. I would suggest that we go on half an hour longer as we can.

Mr. STEVENS. Very well.

The first question was upon Mr. WILSON's amendment, in the nature of a substitute for the first section.

Mr. MORRILL. I propose to amend the first section, before the question is put upon the substitute, by striking out the words "other obligations" where they first occur, and inserting the words "Treasury notes" in their stead.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I now propose to make the same change in other portions of this section, so that it will read:

*Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized, any sums, not exceeding in the aggregate $600,000,000, and to issue therefor bonds or Treasury notes of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe; and so much thereof as may be issued in bonds shall be of denominations not less than fifty dollars, and may be made payable at any period not more than forty years from date of issue, or may be made redeemable, at the pleasure of the Government, at or after any period not less than five years nor more than forty years from date, or may be made redeemable and payable as aforesaid, as may be expressed upon their face; and so much thereof as may be issued in Treasury notes may be made convertible into any bonds authorized by this act, and may be of such denominations, not less than fifty dollars, and bear such dates and be made redeemable or payable at such periods as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury may be deemed expedient. And the interest on such bonds shall be payable semi-annually; and on Treasury notes authorized by this act the interest may be made payable semi-annually, or annually, or at maturity thereof, and the principal, or interest, or both, may be made payable in coin or in lawful money: Provided, That the rate of interest on any such bonds or Treasury notes, when payable in coin, shall not exceed six per cent. per annum; and when not payable in coin, shall not exceed seven and three tenths per cent. per annum; and the rate and character of interest shall be expressed on all such bonds or Treasury notes.*

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I want to know if I understand the Committee of Ways and Means perfectly. I supposed that gentlemen in this House were honest in their declarations when they stated that they wished to reduce the volume of the currency. I have supposed so for a long number of days and weeks. But do they now propose to place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury, or in the hands of any other man, born or to be born, the power to increase the currency $600,000,000 more? Is that their object?

Mr. STEVENS. It is not the proposition of the committee, only of the gentlemen who offered it.

Mr. WILSON. They are now giving the definition of the term "or other obligations," which all the time meant "Treasury notes."

Mr. PRICE. I supposed so. It shows the candor of the gentlemen in admitting the true character of the effort in which they are engaged. I admire their courage, but cannot much admire their judgment.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman will understand that the bill limits itself, and excludes legal tender of all sorts.

Mr. PRICE. I earnestly protest against any power being given to any man, in the present circumstances of the country, to increase the volume of the currency a single dollar. Some time ago I attempted, with some other gentlemen on this side of the House, and I believe some on the other side, to throw some restriction in the way of doing this very thing. We failed on that occasion, and we may fail again—I cannot tell what may now be the action of this House—but every attempt to increase the volume of the currency up to this time has met with no successful opposition. The volume of the currency is already too great. As I have before remarked in this House, the sun sets every night upon a greater volume of currency than it rose upon in the morning. Now, in addition to all the legitimate means of increasing the volume of the currency, it is proposed coolly and deliberately, in the high council chamber of the nation, before the gaze of the commercial world, to give at one fell swoop an officer of this Government the power to increase it by the addition of $600,000,000. Sir, if we give by this bill a power to do that, if it should go abroad that there is such a power vested in an officer here at Washington, we may as well bid good-by to all financial prosperity or any hope of ever seeing the end of the system now begun. I trust that there is sufficient commercial and financial sagacity and prudence in this House to vote down such a proposition, and bury it so deep that it will never have a resurrection; not only to consign it to "the tomb of the Capulets," but seal forever the tomb, so that it will not only have no resurrection, but it will never be heard of again in this Hall. I am utterly astonished at this bold proposition to increase the volume of the currency by the addition of $600,000,000, and I shall be still more astonished if it receives anything like a respectable vote on either side of this House.

Mr. HOOPER. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Who has made a proposition to issue $600,000,000 as currency?

Mr. PRICE. I am glad to answer the gentleman. It affords me a great deal of pleasure to impart information to any gentleman not so well informed as myself. [Laughter.] The bill proposes, if I understand the English language, to allow $600,000,000 to be issued in bonds or other obligations; and the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] whose honesty and courage I admire, proposes to strike out "other obligations" and insert "Treasury notes." I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that this bill proposes to give to the Secretary of the Treasury the power to issue $600,000,000 of bonds or Treasury notes, and that language grammatically understood will give him the power to issue $600,000,000 of Treasury notes. I believe the question is properly answered.

Mr. HOOPER. Will those Treasury notes be currency? The gentleman said that the bill authorized the issue of $600,000,000 of currency.

Mr. PRICE. If they do not pass as currency what is the object of the bill? I have been told tonight, as I have been told before, that these seven-thirty notes do not pass as currency. But the history of the country contradicts that statement. We have had the proof presented in this Hall that the seven-thirty notes do pass as currency; and the notes proposed to be issued under this bill will pass just as readily.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, pro forma, to amend by striking out in the thirty-first line the words "seven and three tenths."

Mr. Chairman, from the very start, in relation to legal tender and paper currency I have been, I think, a consistent opponent of the whole scheme; and like my friend from Iowa, I voted for the amendment to the bank bill at the last session because I thought it was an improvement upon the then existing law. But when a gentleman of the financial ability of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRICE,] last upon the floor, undertakes to convince this House and the public that this bill authorizes the issuance of a circulation of $600,000,000, I am, I confess, surprised.

Sir, I was willing to confine the provisions of this bill so as to embrace precisely what was intended. It was intended to authorize the issue of Treasury notes bearing seven and three tenths interest, and not any legal tender at all. It is not in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury or any banker in the world to make any such paper as that a circulating medium. There can be no demand for it to pay any debts, public or private. It cannot be so used.

Mr. WILSON. I will suggest to the gentleman from Vermont that the notes issued by the State banks and banking associations are not a legal tender, nor are those of the national banks, yet all these circulate as money.

Mr. HOOPER. Do they bear interest?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly they do not bear interest. This bill would authorize the Secretary of the Treasury, if he were disposed to exercise the power, to issue $600,000,000 in fifty-dollar notes to circulate as money.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think that it would. All notes of banks were designed to be circulated in times when we were making specie payments, and they were of course redeemable in specie and equivalent to specie. These, however, on the contrary, are not designed to be circulated. And they will not be circulated.

I beg gentlemen, on this side of the House at least, to have some confidence in the management of the Treasury of the United States. I know that the purpose of the Government is not to issue these seven-thirty Treasury notes as circulation. It is intended for the convenience of the Department and for the convenience of the small capitalists.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I ask the gentleman from Vermont whether he denies that Treasury notes have been issued as circulating medium.

Mr. MORRILL. I admit, Mr. Chairman, that the Treasury notes which we have had and made legal tender for their face have been issued as a circulating medium. This bill provides that there shall be no more legal-tender notes issued, whether bearing interest or not.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I understand that very well; but according to the measure of the gentleman from Vermont there can be more currency issued under this $600,000,000, the only difference being between making it a legal tender and not making it a legal tender.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman will see that the Treasury Department is restrained from issuing any more legal-tender notes.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. But the gentleman now proposes to insert the words Treasury notes.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask them to be inserted because that is what the Treasury Department wants, what the Treasury is at present using most successfully. I want to express the purpose honestly on the face of the bill.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The gentleman denies the intention to issue any more currency, and yet he proposes that the Treasury Department shall issue fifty-dollar notes as currency.

Mr. MORRILL. They are to be issued in small or large sums as heretofore, so that they may accommodate all classes of the public and yet not circulate as currency.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The gentleman from Iowa who expressed his surprise then was correct.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. My friend from Vermont, who has just taken his seat, insisted, with some emphasis, that these Treasury notes shall not be a legal tender. Now, nobody in this House knows better than my friends from Vermont and Massachusetts that the quality of being a legal tender is absolutely irrelevant on the question whether a note is currency or not; and if the gentlemen wish to join issue on that point I will yield the floor for them to do it.

I want to understand and I want to be understood. It has been mentioned two or three times that the national banks have issued one hundred and fifty or two hundred million dollars of circulating currency, not one cent of which is legal tender. So that whether it be made legal tender or not is irrelevant when we are trying to determine whether a piece of paper does or does not swell the currency. Whether they bear interest or not is equally and absolutely irrelevant, for I know by experience, and both those gentlemen know by experience, that we have had in our pockets Treasury notes bearing interest which we have received in exchange for other bills, and which we have paid out, and which are currency though they do bear interest. Therefore, the fact that they bear interest and the fact that they are legal tender, are irrelevant on the question of currency. What does determine is the denomination. The smaller would more assuredly go into circulation, and the higher would go less into circulation. When you go up to $1,000 it is not part of the currency in any shape; but every note of the United States under fifty dollars, whether payable on demand or fifty years hence, does in point of fact enter into the currency, does pass from hand to hand, does inflate the currency. And the bill which has now been put into the exact shape to express what before was its legal operation, says on its face, in so many words, that the Secretary of the Treasury, in his judgment, and not in accordance with our judgment, whenever the progress of events may render it necessary, may issue $600,000,000 of Treasury notes carrying interest, or as he shall desire them, which can be placed to your credit in the bank, with which you can pay your bills, and which you will carry about in your pocket, and which will, in spite of the Secretary of the Treasury, increase the currency pro tanto.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to ask the gentleman if he does not perceive the difference between this proposition and the acts which make the national bank circulation currency. It is that they are made receivable for all duties and taxes.

I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move a pro forma amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa. I desire to ask the Committee of Ways and Means if they will not allow the bill to be amended so as to limit the amount of Treasury notes to be issued to the comparatively small sum of twenty-five to fifty million dollars. I think this House, so far as it is a part of the legislative power of the Government, ought to settle a question of this sort for itself. I can see that it may be necessary for the Treasury Department in an exigency to avail itself of the power proposed to be conferred by this bill; but I think this House, with reference to the currency and finances of the country, ought to decide how far that power should be exercised. For one I am not disposed to leave it in any doubt. If we are called upon to vote upon the question whether the Treasury Department shall have power to issue indefinitely to the extent of $600,000,000 Treasury notes, I for one shall vote in the negative. If, however, the committee will limit the amount to be issued to $50,000,000 I think I will vote for it.

Mr. WILSON made a remark entirely inaudible to the reporters.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Very likely it may be so, but if the Committee of Ways and Means think it is not, I, for one, am willing to grant some additional power.

But it is clear to my mind that these Treasury notes are circulation. The question whether they are circulation or not is not a question of law, or of statute, but a question of fact. Now, we know perfectly well that if a Treasury note is issued to a man who does not desire to invest in Government securities, he passes it; and it passes from hand to hand until it comes into the hands of somebody who does prefer to invest in Government securities. But when it gets into his hands, he converts it into United States bonds, because that is more secure and better adapted for purposes of investment. Therefore I say, with due submission to the judgment of the committee, that these Treasury notes are circulation. It is entirely immaterial whether they are legal tender or not, so far as circulation is concerned.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D Session.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 1, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 74.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not rise to speak for the committee in this matter. I say there is authority to issue from a hundred to a hundred and twenty-five million dollars. I do not know exactly how much of that remains unissued. I think that is sufficient for an emergency. I have gone for putting this issue upon the square basis of bonds; and I would rather increase the interest or sell the bonds at a discount for the currency now in the country, than to go any further with the present system, in the extension of which I see nothing but ruin.

As there is no quorum present, and we shall get no vote to-night, I move that the committee rise. The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEJOHN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and especially the special order, being the bill (H. R. No. 722) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at eleven o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 797) in relation to certain drafts issued by the Treasurer of the United States in satisfaction of warrants which are outstanding unpaid, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

CONDITION OF INDIAN TRIBES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution of the Senate (S. R. No. 89) directing an inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes and their treatment by the civil and military authorities. The amendment of the House was to strike out all after the word "that" in the first line of the first section down to and including the word "Representatives" in line five, in the following words:

There be raised a joint committee, to consist of three members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and four members of the House, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

A commission of three persons be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

So that the resolution will read:

That a commission of three persons be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to inquire into the present condition of the Indian tribes, &c.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in this amendment.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I should like to have that lie over until the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs comes in.

Mr. CONNESS. The chairman was here just now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY REGISTER.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the resolution and amendments be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; and also to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives insisted upon its amendments to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 390) relating to the postal laws, disagreed to by the Senate, asked a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. COLE, Mr. BROOKS, and Mr. ASHLEY, managers at the same on its part; and also that the House of Representatives insisted upon its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, insisted on by the Senate; that it insisted upon its amendment to the sixth amendment of the Senate to the said bill, disagreed to by the Senate, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILSON, Mr. STEVENS, and Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN, managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed Senate joint resolution (S. R. No. 116) for the relief of Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, late of Richmond, Virginia; and also that it had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 678) to amend the act entitled "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, and the other acts relating to enrollment and draft; and

A bill (H. R. No. 691) to authorize and aid in the construction of a railroad connecting the Pacific railroad in California with the Columbia river in Oregon and Puget sound.

POSTAL LAWS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 390) relating to the postal laws, insisted on by the House; and

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and agree to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President; and

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. COLAMER, Mr. CONNESS, and Mr. WRIGHT.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was appointed yesterday a member of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866. I ask to be excused from service on that committee on account of my duties in the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Vice President appoint a member of the committee of conference on that bill in my place.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. CLARK.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 691) to authorize and aid in the construction of a railroad connecting the Pacific railroad in California with the Columbia river in Oregon and Puget sound—to the committee on the Pacific Railroad.

A bill (H. R. No. 678) to amend the act entiled "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling and calling out the national forces and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, and the other acts relating to enrollment and draft—to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PROCEEDINGS IN CRIMINAL CASES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (S. No. 88) regulating proceedings in criminal cases, and for other purposes. The first amendment of the House was, immediately after the enacting clause of the first section to insert the following:

That every grand jury impaneled before any district or circuit court of the United States to inquire into and presentment make of public offenses against the United States, committed or triable, within the district for which the court is holden, shall consist of not less than sixteen, nor exceeding twenty-three persons: If of the persons summoned, less than sixteen attend they shall be placed on the grand jury, and the court shall order the marshal to summon, either immediately, or for a day fixed, from the body of the district, and not from the bystanders, a sufficient number of persons to complete the grand jury; and whenever a challenge to an individual grand juror is allowed, and there are not other jurors in attendance sufficient to complete the grand jury, the court shall make a like order to the marshal to summon a sufficient number of persons for that purpose. No indictment shall be found, nor shall any presentment be made, without the concurrence of at least twelve grand jurors.

The House further propose to amend the bill in section one, lines two and three, by striking out the words "in any district or circuit court of the United States."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate concur in those amendments. I have examined them and they do not alter the bill. I will state that in Oregon the court has to sit several days to get a grand jury, and we thought it better to reenact the common law.

Mr. HALE. I rose to inquire whether it makes any change in the common law. I desire to stick to the common law.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This does not alter the common law.

Mr. HALE. I understand that it does. I understand that by the common law it requires not less than twelve to make a grand jury. It must be at least twelve, and not over twenty-three. That is the common law as I understand it; and if the honorable Senator from Maryland, who knows as much as anybody about legal questions, will listen to me, I will ask him if that is not the case.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think it does alter it in some respects, but I think it alters it beneficially.

Mr. HALE. My question is, whether by the common law a grand jury does not consist of twelve, and not over twenty-three?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not understand the law to be that twelve constitute a grand jury at common law. I think it must be sixteen—not more than twenty-three nor less than sixteen.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Twelve to find a bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the way it is in the House amendment. It does not change it at all in that respect.

Mr. HALE. I think the subject had better lie over. I think gentlemen are laboring under a grand mistake, and I think we should act carefully when we come to tamper with the provisions of the common law in reference to grand juries.

If Senators will let the subject lie over until tomorrow, I will not insist on my objection if it does not turn out that I am entirely right—that twelve constitute a grand jury all over the world where the common law prevails.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill and amendments will be passed over informally.

RAILROADS IN MINNESOTA.

On motion by Mr. HARLAN, it was Ordered, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill of the House (H. R. No. 761) extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes, yesterday passed by the Senate, with amendments.

NAVAL OBSERVATORY.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and take up the bill (S. No. 478) in relation to the Naval Observatory. It will take but a moment to consider it.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to repeal so much of the first section of the act of August 3, 1848, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1849," as requires the superintendent of the Naval Observatory at Washington city to be a captain, commander, or lieutenant in the Navy, and no officer of the Navy employed as superintendent is to receive other than the shore duty pay of his grade.

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose it is hardly necessary for me to explain this bill. By the act of 1848 it was provided that the superintendent of the Observatory shall be selected from the three grades of captain, commander, or lieutenant. In 1862 we created three other grades, those of admiral, commodore, and lieutenant commanding. This bill simply proposes to give the President an opportunity to select any officer of any one of these grades, or any professor of mathematics, and put him in charge of that Observatory.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PICTURE BY W. H. POWELL.

Mr. COLLAMER. I call for the unfinished business of the morning hour. I simply desire to have a vote upon it.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senator will allow me to offer and have passed a resolution simply directing the transfer of the maps and papers in relation to the Pacific railroad to the Department of the Interior. It will require no debate at all.

Mr. COLLAMER. I simply desire to have a vote on the resolution which is the unfinished business of the morning hour, and I presume it will occasion no debate.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes, it will.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then we must have it. Has it come to this, that when the honorable member from Massachusetts is opposed to a measure we cannot have a vote upon it? All I ask is for a vote.

Mr. BROWN. Is it in order to make a report?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order to do anything until the Senate disposes of the motion of the Senator from Vermont, which is to postpone all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts and all other Senators will avoid debate upon this and all like propositions. We understand all that is contained in this resolution, and if such propositions are debated we cannot dispose of the business that we have charge of. We have all got business waiting. I hope we will come to a vote upon this question. Every Senator knows how to vote, and it appears to me that to occupy time now by debate is an encroachment by one Senator upon every other Senator's time.

Mr. SUMNER. I have not said that I should debate this question; but I have said that I should insist upon a vote upon it if it was called up, and also that I shall insist upon amendments. I have two or three amendments which I wish to move to it, and on which I shall call the yeas and nays.

Mr. CONNESS. Very well; let us have a vote.

The question being put, there were, on a division—yeas 12, nays 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. WILSON, and Mr. LANE, of Kansas, called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doak, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, McDougall, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wright—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Dixon, Hale, Harlan, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Sherman, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wilson—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Grimes,

Harding, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Richardson, Sprague, and Wilkinson—15.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) authorizing a contract with William H. Powell for a picture for the Capitol, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SUMNER to add the following proviso:

Provided further, That in the national Capitol, dedicated to the national Union, there shall be no picture of any victory obtained in battle with our own fellow-citizens.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer another amendment to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no contract shall be made until after a competition among the artists of the country, all of whom shall have an opportunity of offering themselves as candidates, and of exhibiting designs for the proposed picture; and the committee shall postpone any contract with Mr. Powell until they shall be satisfied, after such competition, that he is the most meritorious artist.

I should like to have the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. Before that amendment is submitted to a vote, I wish the Senate to understand its bearings. It is to the effect that there shall be a competition among all the artists of the country before any one shall be designated for this important work. We already have one picture from Mr. Powell in the Rotunda. It is known as the picture of De Soto. Are Senators so enamored of that picture that they desire to introduce another from the same artist? Are Senators so carried away with devotion to one artist over all the artists of the country that they set apart, in this time of war, $25,000 for him to paint, not only one picture, but a second picture? I am not aware that this artist, meritorious as he may be, can claim such a preëminence among the artists of the country that he should receive this signal honor. You are about to confer a great honor, designating him proudly, conspicuously, among all the artists of the country; and you do it hastily, in an off-hand way, without considering the claims of other artists, without knowing the sentiments of other artists, or of the friends of art on the subject. I have in my hand a letter addressed to me by an artist of our country, one well known, under date of February 15, from which I shall read an extract:

"I see by the papers of yesterday that the House, by a majority of four, has made an appropriation of $25,000 for a picture of some naval victory, to be painted by W. H. Powell. At a meeting last evening of the Artists' Fund Society—an organization comprising a majority of the artists of this city, and all the leading ones, with one or two exceptions—this matter was discussed, and it was their unanimous opinion that at this period of the country's distress and strait for means to carry on the war, it is not expedient or proper for Congress to vote any money whatever for pictures or other mere decorations of the Capitol. The building is already complete, or sufficiently so for all its essential purposes, and in their opinion costly decorations should be reserved for a more prosperous time, and then be the subject of fair competition among all the artists."

It is to carry out that idea that I have offered the amendment now under consideration. I have also this very morning received another letter from another artist, from which I will read a single extract. After protesting against the passage of the proposed measure, he says:

"Should, however, such a resolution be called up again, permit me to offer a suggestion, which is, that so generous a gift be open for public competition to American artists generally."

Now, sir, I do plead for American art. I do not stand here as the representative of any individual; but I plead for the art of my country. I think you will give an unwise vote if you now, without further consideration, without any competition, give a second order to the author of the picture of De Soto in the Rotunda of the Capitol.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall certainly not consume any time that I know to be so valuable in discussing this matter; but I will simply say that if the letter read by the honorable Senator was intended as a lecture for the Senate and House of Representatives, it is a piece of impertinence on the part of the writer, and the whole proceeding of their society is an insolence not to be borne, and I think it should not have been intruded here. I feel it due to myself as a Senator to say thus much. I hope we shall come to a vote, because the Senate is certainly capable of understanding the question before it.

Mr. RIDDLE. It is evident that the resolution of the Senator from Vermont will pass in some form; but the Senator from Massachusetts has proposed an amendment to it which I conceive to be impracticable. In the first place he wishes competition. How can he obtain competition unless all the artists will send pictures to enable the committee to select the one to be purchased? The painting of De Soto was the first painting of Mr. Powell; and I admit that it is not a superior painting; but we have proof in the Rotunda now that Mr. Powell is capable of producing a better painting of a naval character than has ever been sent to Washington. I do not know Mr. Powell. I have met him once, I think. I know nothing about him. But in my opinion the picture of Perry's Victory on the Lake is the greatest painting that ever adorned the Capitol of the United States. When we know that there is such an artist living, why hesitate and offer competition and get men to present pictures here in order that this competition may be preserved? I am in favor of voting for a man who we know can produce the picture, and who has given proof to the country that he can do it; and hence I shall vote for this proposition of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. COLLAMER. I have but a single word to say. Amendments and speeches upon it will destroy this resolution. It can be easily done. Such things have been done and probably will be done again. I will not take time to answer any remarks the honorable Senator from Massachusetts may make, because if I do, I do it at the sacrifice of the resolution. I do not want to amend it, for if it is amended it will have to go back to the House, and may be lost.

Mr. SUMNER. I have one word in reply to the Senator from California, and another word in reply to the Senator from Delaware; and I begin with the Senator from California. I am sorry to have to say anything further; but the remarks which fell from the Senator from California were so strange, so utterly unjustifiable, that I should not do my duty if I did not reply to them. He says that the artists of this country when they presume to express an opinion on this question are impertinent.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I intend that the Senator now shall not misrepresent what I have said.

Mr. SUMNER. I have no desire to do so.

Mr. CONNESS. That part of their letter that I denounce as impertinence and as insolent is that which gives an opinion to Congress touching the economy or extravagance that they may pursue. When they speak as artists I have nothing to do with it at all. But I apprehend that the honorable Senator will find it very difficult to redeem that portion of the letter to which I have referred from the obnoxious charge to which it is subject.

Mr. SUMNER. When I was interrupted I was replying to the Senator from California who had arraigned the artist whose letter I read for impudence and impertinence—

Mr. POWELL. If the Senator will allow me, I will ask him to be kind enough to give the name of the writer.

Mr. SUMNER. No, sir; I shall not give the name.

Mr. POWELL. I will say to the Senator that I do not think it very proper to read letters here as authority and not let us know the names of the persons writing them, because then we might attach to them the importance they deserve.

Mr. SUMNER. I have to say to the Senator, in reply, it is done every day.

Mr. POWELL. I am aware that it is by the Senator, but not by others.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator is mistaken. I very rarely do it myself.

But, Mr. President, let me ask if artists cease to be citizens? Have they not the privilege of criticising the conduct of public servants? May not an artist approach Congress by petition? Would the Senator from California exclude him from that privilege? Or, if he appears humbly by petition and presumes to make a suggestion to this honorable body, will the Senator from California rise in his place and call him an impertinent? Is it not a matter of every day's experience that we are approached by petitioners on every question before us, questions of finance, questions of war, questions of slavery? And now I have presumed simply to read an extract from a letter of an eminent artist, and a Senator calls it impertinent! I choose, therefore, to read it again:

"At a meeting last evening of the Artists' Fund Society—an organization comprising a majority of the artists of this city, and all the leading ones, with one or two exceptions—this matter was discussed, and it was their unanimous opinion that at this period of the country's distress and strait for means to carry on the war, it is not expedient or proper for Congress to vote any money whatever for pictures or other mere decorations of the Capitol. The building is already complete, or sufficiently so for all its essential purposes; and in their opinion costly decorations should be reserved for a more prosperous time, and then be the subject of fair competition among all the artists."

Where is the impertinence in that statement, the result of conversations and deliberations among the artists of the country? I think my friend from California would not repeat his criticism now, when he has fully in mind the words to which it is applicable.

Mr. CONNESS. Is the Senator through?

Mr. SUMNER. I am not. I said when I began I had also one word in reply to the Senator from Delaware, who insisted that there could be no competition among artists, or that it was impracticable; and I understood him to say that it was not resorted to in other countries, and particularly in England. The Senator is mistaken. The pictures which adorn the Houses of Parliament have all been placed there after a competition among the artists of England. An important commission was constituted, composed not only of artists, but of men of literature and of talent, whose duty it was to examine all designs submitted to them and select the best. That is the testimony of England when undertaking the ornamentation of her Houses of Parliament. I think we may be instructed by that example; and especially may we be instructed by it when we already have in the Rotunda of the Capitol one picture by this very artist. One is enough. There are many who would say that the one that is there is more than enough.

Mr. CONNESS. I shall not be tempted to consume time. The Senator from Massachusetts is a good advocate. To relieve the letter that he has read from what I will repeat again as its impertinent character, he presents it now in the light of a petition to this body. I simply say to him it cannot be viewed in that light. It is a commentary by those artists upon the proceedings of one of the Houses of Congress. It undertakes to state the majority by which a certain act passed that House, when they have no right but to know that it is an act of that body, and they cannot know anything else than what is officially declared. But, sir, I will not pursue the subject.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator knows that was officially declared. It was declared that it passed the House only by four majority.

Mr. CONNESS. I simply repeat again that the Senator from Massachusetts is an ingenious advocate. When he gets his constituents in a bad position he is abundantly able to relieve them from the difficulties of that position; and he has undertaken to do it by placing them in the attitude of petitioners. I hope we shall now have a vote on the amendment proposed by the Senator and also on the main proposition.

Mr. RIDDLE. The Senator from Massachusetts treated my remarks rather unfairly. The only difference between the Senator and myself is this: I say an artist may design pictures and yet may not be able to execute them to perfection. For instance, the designs of all the pictures in the Rotunda are very good, but any man who has the first idea of art on looking at those pictures would think that the same mother produced the whole of the persons represented. They are all alike. If you look at them with an artistic eye you will see that their countenances and faces are all alike. If you leave this matter open to competition and let artists produce plans when you do not know that they are able to execute them, you are bound to have another bad painting; but we know that this artist can design and execute a good one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask to have the amendment reported again.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Provided, That no contract shall be made until after a competition among the artists of the country, all of whom shall have an opportunity of offering themselves as candidates, and of exhibiting designs for the proposed picture; and the committee shall postpone any contract with Mr. Powell until they shall be satisfied, after such competition, that he is the most meritorious artist.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Dixon, Farwell, Hale, Harlan, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wilson—15.
NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Foot, Grimes, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Clark, Doolittle, Foster, Harding, Harris, Howard, Morrill, Nesmith, Ramsey, Richardson, and Wright—12.

So the amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. I have another amendment to offer. It is to strike out all of the resolution after the word "with" in the fourth line, in the following words:

William H. Powell, of the State of Ohio, to paint a picture for the United States, to be placed at the head of one of the grand staircases in the Capitol, illustrative of some naval victory; the particular subject of the painting to be agreed to by the committee and the artist: Provided, That the entire expense of said picture shall not exceed $25,000, and $2,000 shall be paid to said William H. Powell in advance, to enable him to prepare for the work; the remainder of said installments at intervals of not less than one year, the last installment to be retained until the picture is completed and put up.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

F. B. Carpenter, of the State of New York, for the purchase of a painting now on exhibition in the Rotunda of the Capitol, entitled "The Emancipation Proclamation before the Cabinet," at a price not to exceed $20,000, to be paid on the delivery of the painting, out of the fund appropriated for the Capitol extension.

Mr. HOWE. It seems to me the question whether we shall purchase a picture and expend $25,000 or not is occupying a great many hours, every one of which, at this stage of the session, is worth more than any picture that is likely to be produced in a great many years. I therefore move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Dixon, Farwell, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, and Wilson—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Foot, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Willey, and Wright—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Clark, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Morrill, Ramsey, Richardson, and Wade—13.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SUMNER. On that amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 2, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Pomeroy and Sumner—2.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—33.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Davis, Doolittle, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Ramsey, Richardson, and Wade—15.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn. I think it is time for us to adjourn for the session, considering the manner in which we have been spending our time this morning.

The motion was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Foot, Harris, Hendricks, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Dixon, Farwell, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Howe, Morgan, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wilson—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Harding, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Richardson, and Wade—10.

So the joint resolution was passed.

PACIFIC RAILROAD SURVEYS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is now before the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. Before that is taken up, I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up and pass a resolution which I sent to the Chair some time ago. It will not require any debate at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. These applications are made all around me. I think we had better proceed with the consideration of the tax bill. This is the last day we can have for the consideration of that very important measure.

Mr. HOWARD. This will not consume a minute of time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will let it be read, so that we may see what it is.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 125) transferring maps and other documents in relation to the surveys of the Pacific railroad to the Department of the Interior, and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope it will be put on its passage. It will take but a moment.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs that all maps, profiles, and other drawings, together with estimates and reports connected with explorations and surveys for the Pacific railroad made under the authority of the Government, and all other information upon the subject of the road in the possession of any Department of the Government, shall be transferred to the Department of the Interior; and it authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to furnish copies of them free of charge to the Union Pacific Railroad Company so far as they may be useful in aiding that company in determining the proper route for their road.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of manufacturers of cigars remonstrating against an increase of the tax on cheroots; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FARWELL presented a resolution of the Legislature of Maine in favor of an extension of the time during which that State may establish an agricultural college; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. COWAN, it was Ordered, That Perkins & McMahon have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

On motion of Mr. SPRAGUE, it was Ordered, That Caleb Tompkins have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 480) to authorize the erection of a custom-house at Island Pond, Vermont; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 127) authorizing that the time for revision of the laws of the District of Columbia be extended for and during the Thirty-Ninth Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a message of the President of the United States communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 24th instant, information in regard to the alleged enlistment in foreign countries of recruits for the military and naval service of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution to print three thousand copies of a statement or table of the Senators of the United States, with the commencement and termination of the service of each, showing the succession in each class from the time to which this statement was brought by the last edition of the book of the Constitution and statistics published by W. Hickey, to the 4th of March, 1865, reported in favor of it, and the resolution was adopted.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 662) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June 1866, reported it with amendments.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 776) concerning the Potomac bridge and the Center market, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 787) to incorporate the Harmony Cemetery Company, (of colored persons,) in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 381) in relation to swamp and overflowed lands in the State of California, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 333) for a grant of lands in the Territories of Colorado, New Mexico, and Arizona, to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph through said Territories, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 467) for the improvement of the navigation of the Colorado river, and the construction of wagon roads in Arizona and Utah Territories, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin Leroy, praying for a pension, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolutions of the Legislature of Indiana in favor of granting pensions to persons wounded and the representatives of persons killed in the defense of that State from the invasion by the rebels, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of William Croswell, praying for a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 481) for the relief of William Croswell. The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of Mary McIlroy, praying for a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 482) for the relief of Mary McIlroy. The bill was read and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 378) for the relief of certain non-commissioned officers, privates, musicians, and artificers of cavalry, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill (S. No. 479) to incorporate a National Military and Naval Asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States; which was read and passed to a second reading.

He also, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a joint resolution (S. R. No. 126) to provide for the payment of colored volunteers recruited in South Carolina; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommitted the bill (H. R. No. 710) to extend the time for the completion of certain railroads to which land grants have been made in the States of Michigan and Wisconsin, reported it without amendment.

HOUR OF MEETING.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the daily hour of meeting of the Senate be eleven o'clock, a. m., until otherwise ordered.

COMMITTEE ON MINES.

Mr. STEWART. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to call up a resolution which I offered some days ago to amend the 34th rule of the Senate, so that at the next session we shall have a committee on mines. It is a very important subject, and I presume there will be no opposition to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order being called for, no other motion can be entertained.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to say to the Senator from Nevada that the question about the organization of a new committee is one proper for consideration at the extra session, and he will have ample time to offer it after the 4th of March.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The subject is not now before the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that he was directed by the House of Representatives to return to the Senate, in compliance with its request, the bill (H. R. No. 761) extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Speaker had appointed Mr. E. B. WASHBURN a member of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, in the place of Mr. WILSON, who had been excused from service on the committee.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 676) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

RAILROADS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. HARLAN. I now ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to take up House bill No. 761, extending the time for the completion of certain land-grant railroads in the State of Minnesota, and for other purposes, with a view of correcting an error in it. It has just been returned from the House for that purpose. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance will not object to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) No objection being made, the bill will be considered as before the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. I move that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I now move that the vote by which the amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I now move that the vote by which an amendment to the amendment commencing on the 8th page and terminating on the 9th, being a proviso, be reconsidered.

Mr. POMEROY. I suppose the chairman of the committee has now accomplished his object. He does not desire to have that vote taken now, but only to have the motion entered.

Mr. HARLAN. We shall be through in a moment. We wish the bill to go back to the House. It is a matter of great interest to the Senators from Minnesota, and I do not wish to delay it. It can be corrected in a moment.

Mr. POMEROY. All the Senators who are interested in it are not in. I do not object to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understood this was merely to correct an error.

Mr. HARLAN. To correct an oversight; an amendment which was not understood at the time it was passed.

Mr. POMEROY. Then I have no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out the proviso in section six, from line thirty-six to line forty-one, in the following words:

Provided, That no land shall be granted and conveyed to said State under the provisions of this act on account of the construction of any railroad or part thereof that has been constructed under the provisions of any other act at the date of the passage of this act, and adopted as a part of the line of railroad provided for in this act.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall interfere with any existing right acquired under any law of Congress heretofore enacted making grants of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of railroads.

Mr. HARLAN. I do not wish that amendment to be adopted. It is not that the words proposed to be inserted should not be, but those words ought not to be stricken out, and I hope they will not be.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which this amendment was adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is now before the Senate, and the question is on its adoption.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARLAN. I now move to insert the words that were intended to be inserted, as a separate proviso to the sixth section:

And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall interfere with any existing rights acquired under any law of Congress heretofore enacted, making grants of land to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of railroads.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POMEROY. I should like to have the Senator from Iowa tell us how it stands now.

Mr. HARLAN. It restores the text of the amendment reported by the committee, and adds a proviso preventing any interference with vested rights.

Mr. POMEROY. I have no objection to that. The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was on page 22, line five hundred and thirty, in the clause proposing to amend the ninety-fourth section of the act of last year, to insert the following:

By inserting after the word "sewing," in the proviso to the paragraph relating to "sails, tents, awnings, and bags," the words "or pasting."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill, as follows:

By inserting at the end of the paragraph relating to stoves and hollow-ware the following: "on railroad chairs, and railroad and ship spikes, made of wrought iron, five dollars per ton;" by striking out, in the second proviso of the paragraph relating to "rivets," the words "upon which no duty has been assessed or paid," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the duty to which it was liable;" and after the word "loops," in the line following, inserting "not having been paid;" by striking out the paragraph relating to steam engines, and inserting in lieu thereof the following words: "on steam, locomotive, and marine engines, including the boilers and all their parts, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem." Provided, That when such boilers or parts thereof shall have been once assessed and a duty previously paid thereon, the amount so paid shall be deducted from the duties on the finished engine."

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether this provision in the bill as it comes from the House increases or diminishes the tax on railroad chairs and spikes.

Mr. SHERMAN. It increases it. It levies the same tax on railroad chairs and railroad and ship spikes, made of wrought iron, as on stoves, hollow-ware, and castings. Most of these amendments are amendments of phraseology and transpositions of sections. If the Senator will take up the book of laws of the last session he will see what the change is.

Mr. GRIMES. I have got the book before me. We are attempting to amend a section that embraces some dozen pages, and it is utterly impossible for me to keep track of this bill and the law that we are attempting to amend at the same time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The provision of that law in regard to steam engines is:

"On steam engines, including locomotive and marine engines, a duty of three per cent. ad valorem."

This bill proposes to amend that by making the duty five per cent., but at the same time adds the proviso:

Provided, That when such boilers or parts thereof shall have been assessed and a duty previously paid thereon, the amount so paid shall be deducted from the duties on the finished engines.

That is applying the same principle to steam boilers as is applied in other parts of the bill to other manufactures. The proviso in this portion of the bill in regard to quicksilver is simply to give it the same right of transfer to a bonded warehouse and be exported free of duty as is provided in other cases of manufactures or production.

Mr. GRIMES. I observe that this bill proposes to strike out all that is in the law of 1864 in regard to steam engines, and to insert in lieu thereof:

On steam, locomotive, and marine engines, including the boilers and all their parts, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem. Provided, That when such boilers or parts thereof shall have been once assessed and a duty previously paid thereon, the amount so paid shall be deducted from the duties on the finished engine.

Mr. SHERMAN. The present duty, I will inform the Senator, is three per cent. The old law reads as follows:

"On steam engines, including locomotive and marine engines, a duty of three per cent. ad valorem."

We here provide that there shall be levied—

On steam, locomotive, and marine engines, including the boilers and all their parts, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

But we provide that when such boilers or parts thereof have been once assessed and a duty previously paid on them, the amount so paid is to be deducted from the duties on the finished engines. The reason is obvious. The boiler is a separate and distinct branch of manufacture, which is taxed as a boiler; and when it forms a part of the engine it should not be retaxed, because nothing additional is done to it when it is put into the steam engine except to make it a part of the steam engine. You tax it as a boiler, and then to tax it as part of the engine, without additional work being put upon it, would be manifestly unjust. This provision increases the tax on all this machinery from three to five per cent., and then it provides that where the boiler is a separate article of manufacture, and has paid a distinct duty, the duty shall not be assessed twice; that is, it shall not be assessed on the boiler as part of the engine.

Mr. GRIMES. I apprehend that will not be a very profitable way of legislation; that if you exempt such portions of the boiler of these engines as have been once taxed in some other character, in the hands of some other manufacturer, you will lose money rather than make it by passing this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is done all through the law of last year.

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. On the very same page of the law which we are now proposing to amend, the Senator will find three provisions of precisely similar character. Here is one:

"Provided, That steel rolled, and sheet, rod, or wire made of steel upon which a duty has been assessed and paid, shall be assessed and pay a duty of five per cent. ad valorem upon the increased value only thereof."

So on the same page there is the same provision in regard to rolled brass, copper rolled, yellow sheathing metal in rods or sheets, &c. That same provision is applied to nearly every article of manufacture where the article itself is a specific article of manufacture.

Mr. GRIMES. As has been remarked to me, this is a violation of the principle upon which the whole of our tax laws hitherto have proceeded. It has been suggested to me by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] that we tax leather in the hands of the butcher before it is converted into leather, and then we tax it in the hands of the manufacturer. We tax every bolt and every piece of copper that goes on a ship, and then we tax the ship afterward as a manufacture.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is mistaken. Here is one of the provisions of the old law:

"On rolled brass, copper rolled, yellow sheathing metal in rods or sheets, and shot, sheet lead, and lead pipes, a duty of three per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That when any of the articles herein mentioned shall not have been assessed and a duty paid thereon of three per cent., in the form of ingots, pigs, or bars, a duty of five per cent. shall be assessed and paid thereon."

Now, in regard to leather:

"On leather of all descriptions, curried or finished, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That all leather previously assessed in the rough and upon which duties have been actually paid shall be assessed on the increased value only when curried or finished."

Mr. GRIMES. Do you not put a tax on the shoes?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; because there is an entire change of the article.

Mr. HENDERSON. While we are upon this subject I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that I think in the committee the words "or parts thereof" in line five hundred and forty-six were stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. They were, and they ought to be out.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate while we are upon this subject to strike out those words "or parts thereof," because it was certainly the understanding of the committee that they should be stricken out. I presume it is an error in printing the bill that they are not so marked. The proviso reads, as it now stands:

Provided, That when such boilers or parts thereof shall have been once assessed and a duty previously paid thereon the amount so paid shall be deducted from the duties on the finished engine.

I move to strike out the words "or parts thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COWAN. I desire to move an amendment in the five hundred and thirty-fifth line on this same page.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator to let us dispose of the amendments of the committee first.

Mr. COWAN. The amendment last acted upon was not an amendment of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. They intended to make that amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON. I asked the unanimous consent of the Senate to make the amendment so as to carry out the intention of the committee.

Mr. COWAN. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The reading of the bill will be proceeded with, and the amendments reported by the Committee on Finance will receive the first action of the Senate, and then amendments by other Senators will be in order.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the committee was in line five hundred and eighty-three, page 24, to strike out the following words:

By adding to the paragraph relating to patent, enameled, and japanned leather, the words "Provided, That when a duty has been paid on the leather in the rough, the duty shall be assessed and paid only on the increased value."

Mr. GRIMES. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance to say that that is the old law. I wish to inquire, what then is the necessity of adding it here, and who is going to determine what is the amount of the increased value on this enameled leather?

Mr. SHERMAN. We propose to strike it out. The Senator agrees with us entirely. The House have put in a provision exempting patent, enameled, and japanned leather from a double tax. We thought that the article was so much changed by the process of enameling, &c., in its value and character that the provision ought to apply to that character of leather, and therefore we move to strike it out.

Mr. GRIMES. I agree with the committee if that is what is to be accomplished by it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to and including the following clause:

By inserting in the paragraph relating to ready-made clothing, after the word "dress," the words "not otherwise assessed and taxed as such," and by striking out of the same paragraph all after the words "does not exceed the sum of" and inserting the words "$1,000 per annum shall be exempt from duty."

Mr. SHERMAN. I have promised to state where we came to any provision of importance, and this is an important subject to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate. In the old law we exempted $600 per annum of the product of tailors, boot and shoe makers, &c., and other small employments. This clause increases the exemption to $1,000.

Mr. COLLAMER. Do the Committee on Finance propose to increase the exemption as it came from the House?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; it is not the bill as it came from the House; but I call the attention of the Senate to it because I promised to call their attention to any matter in which there was an important change made. The House increased the amount of the exemption from $600 to $1,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you strike it out?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir; we leave it as it is.

The next amendment was on page 26, line six hundred and ten, after the words "ad valorem," to strike out the following words:

By striking out in paragraph relating to diamonds, precious stones, and imitations thereof, and all other jewelry, the word "ten," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "five."

Mr. SPRAGUE. This subject received the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, who heard committees from different parts of the country upon it. They represented that their interests had been in the past year very seriously affected by the distinction which the law of last year made in regard to their interests, requiring those who deal in jewelry to pay a tax of ten per cent., while upon silverware, diamonds, &c., there was only imposed a duty of five per cent. They represented that it had a tendency to induce contraband trade. It is within my knowledge that a large portion of the jewelry now produced in this country is manufactured at the homes of the people making the goods, and it is then sold to whomsoever it may concern. The effect has been to decrease the amount manufactured by the large manufacturers and to entirely deprive the Treasury of any income from this tax. Silver is not taxed at all. Diamonds are not taxed. The labor upon them simply is taxed. Gold and the labor that enter into the manufacture of jewelry are taxed. There are many articles made of silver which are made both by the manufacturer of gold and silver, where they compete with each other, and this discrimination in the tax tends to destroy the interests of those engaged in the manufacture from gold. Some of the best and most respectable of them have come to Congress, and have had long conferences with the House committee on the subject. It has been certainly impossible for the Senate Committee on Finance to thoroughly investigate the subject. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not agree to the report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Rhode Island is very much mistaken about there being no tax upon jewelry set in silver. I have the law before me. It is perfectly clear. The old law provides:

"On all diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, and imitations thereof, and all other jewelry, a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That when diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, or imitations thereof, imported from foreign countries, or upon which import duties have been paid, shall be set or reset in gold or any other material, the duty shall be assessed and paid upon the value only of the settings."

That is the present law. The House of Representatives propose to reduce the tax on jewelry from ten to five per cent. The Committee on Finance thought it was a character of employment that could afford to pay an increased tax, just like the increased tax on whisky or tobacco. We thought it was one of those articles of luxury that might be dispensed with, and that people who wish to wear jewelry could afford to pay ten per cent. on its value to the Government, being almost double that levied upon other manufactures.

Mr. GRIMES. Your amendment leaves it just where it is now under the present law?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRAGUE. But under the operation of the present law the Government does not receive an income from the tax. The law does not provide any means by which the tax can be levied on the obscure establishments. There is no possible provision by which any revenue to the Treasury can be derived from seven eighths of the jewelry that is now taxed ten per cent. Those gentlemen who came here representing this interest made this point very clear to the Committee of Ways and Means of the House. The chairman of the Committee on Finance may be right; but those who are manufacturing silverware in competition and to be sold alongside of this jewelry report that they pay no duty or tax upon anything but the labor employed—nothing upon the silver, and nothing upon the value—while in the manufacture of similar articles from gold there is a tax of ten per cent. on the gold and on the labor. On the silver manufacture the labor alone is taxed. That is the way they construe it at the Department at any rate.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I believed that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or any other man could so construe this law, I should certainly have but little confidence in his common sense. I do not think such a construction can be put upon it. The words are plain:

"That when diamonds, emeralds, precious stones, or imitations thereof, imported from foreign countries, or upon which import duties have been paid, shall be set or reset in gold or any other material, the duty shall be assessed and paid upon the value only of the settings."

If silver is not a material, then as a matter of course the alleged construction would be correct; and if anybody will say that, we will simply provide for a case of lunacy.

In regard to the machinery by which this tax is collected, the same machinery is applied in the collection of this tax as in the collection of all taxes on manufactures. I have no doubt many obscure jewelers, carrying on their work in remote places or in lofts, may avoid this tax; but that may be said of every tax imposed by law.

Mr. COLLAMER. How will reducing the amount correct that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know, unless it is supposed that they are more expert in trying to avoid a tax of ten per cent. than they would be to avoid five per cent.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The inducement to fraud is very great with the tax at ten per cent., while if the tax was put at five per cent. it would be comparatively small. These gentlemen feel that there is a certain injustice that articles of the same trade should be taxed at five per cent. and their particular articles taxed at ten per cent. It offers a great inducement to fraud and contraband trade.

Mr. COLLAMER. It would have no effect in relation to the mode of collecting at all.

Mr. ANTHONY. I certainly understand that the construction stated by my colleague prevails. It is so stated by persons engaged in the manufacture. The committee of the House considered this matter very deliberately and with a great deal of examination, and I think we had better let the tax be as they have put it. I do not see why there should be a discrimination against this branch of industry. It may be a luxury to those who buy it, but a great deal of this cheap jewelry is as near to wearing apparel as almost anything. It can hardly be called an article of luxury. But it is an industry to those who manufacture it. I hope that we shall disagree to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, and allow it to stand as the House have placed it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 26, line six hundred and nineteen, after the word "descriptions," to insert the words "when prepared for use;" so that the clause will read:

On snuff, manufactured of tobacco or any substitute for tobacco, ground dry or damp, pickled, scented, or otherwise, of all descriptions, when prepared for use, forty cents per pound.

Mr. SHERMAN. The whole tobacco tax is provided for in another section, and in case the Senate tobacco tax should not be agreed upon these words should be restored. I will make that explanation now.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 26, after line six hundred and twenty, to strike out the following clause:

On cavendish, plug, twist, and all other kinds of manufactured tobacco, not herein otherwise provided for, forty cents per pound.

Mr. HENDERSON. I hope the chairman of the committee will permit these clauses relating to tobacco to be passed over for the time being.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think they might as well be acted upon now.

Mr. HENDERSON. Well, sir, I have no objection. I am ready. I suppose this whole subject of the tax on tobacco is now amendable.

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee propose to strike out this paragraph, and the Senator has a right to move to insert something else in its place. I suppose that is what he desires to do.

Mr. HENDERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has a right to do that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I move to insert in lieu of the words proposed to be stricken out the following:

On cavendish, plug, twist, and all other kinds of manufactured tobacco prepared for the purpose of chewing, and made merchantable, whether prepared by machinery or by hand, and whether sweetened or not, thirty-five cents per pound.

Mr. CLARK. I think we had better retain the old definitions if the Senator from Missouri pleases, as they have already been construed in part and acted upon. I propose to move to strike out "forty" and insert "thirty-five" where he desires to have it done.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is in my amendment.

Mr. CLARK. But I want to retain the old definitions which have been acted on by the Department, and the forms prepared.

Mr. HENDERSON. I will explain to the Senator from New Hampshire why I have offered this amendment. It is upon information that I have very recently from our manufacturers. The business of manufacturing chewing tobacco, from which the Government received nearly half a million dollars in my State last year, will entirely cease in my State unless some amendment of this character shall be adopted. The honest manufacturer will not be permitted to continue his business; he must give it up and quit it entirely. I understand that now tobacco is twisted by the hand in large quantities, and that orders are frequently made for it in that shape. It is not pressed by machinery; it is not put under the screw, as manufactured tobacco is. As we understand it, it is called manufactured tobacco after it has been subjected to the press of the screw; but I am told it is now merely twisted up, sometimes sweetened and sometimes not sweetened, but twisted up by the hand as close and as tight as it can be, and large orders are now made for tobacco in that shape, and it is being used in that shape; and hence it is that the honest manufacturer must be compelled to quit the business unless—

Mr. CLARK. I will ask the Senator to look at line six hundred and twenty-four of the bill, just below, and he will see a provision exactly for the case that he is mentioning now.

Mr. HENDERSON. I understand that; but the Senator will see that I do not wish to make any distinction at all. If tobacco is put up in that condition, and is made a merchantable article, and used by the chewer in that shape and condition, it ought to pay exactly the same tax.

Mr. CLARK. Does the Senator merely desire to have the "thirty" raised to "thirty-five"?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. I have no objection; but I desire to preserve the old forms of definition which are used in the forms which have been sent out to the collectors.

Mr. HENDERSON. I preserve them. I will read the amendment to the amendment again.

On cavendish, plug, twist, and all other kinds of manufactured tobacco—

Using the words precisely as they were used before—prepared for the purpose of chewing and made merchantable.

That does not interfere with the farmer twisting up the tobacco and using it himself; but when it is twisted up and made a merchantable article and orders are made for it by the merchants throughout the country and it is used and sold in that shape, I desire that it shall pay the same tax.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is not that provided for by the succeeding clause?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not properly. The succeeding clause says:

On tobacco twisted by hand, or reduced from leaf into a condition to be consumed, without the use of any machine or instrument, and without being pressed, sweetened, or otherwise prepared, thirty cents per pound.

You cannot get that tax at all, because the farmer will put it up and will use it, and will sell it to his neighbors. I desire to say that when it is made merchantable, that is, when it is bought and sold for chewing purposes, it shall pay the same tax as other tobacco. There is no distinction here in the section as it now stands to prevent parties from putting it up and using it. Certainly the section is not intended to apply to the farmer who goes into his own tobacco-house and twists tobacco and puts it in his pocket and uses it, because any man has a right so to do, and it would simply be taxing the leaf. I desire only to tax it in its manufactured state; and if parties manufacture it in that condition and use it as a manufactured article, make it a merchantable article, buying and selling it, then I desire to tax it.

Mr. CLARK. I am not certain that the Senator may not desire the same thing that I do, and if he will withdraw his amendment for the present and let the matter go over, I will confer with him, and perhaps we can agree precisely on what it should be. He may have the same object that I have.

Mr. HENDERSON. I presume we have the same object in view.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the committee, the amendment to the amendment being withdrawn.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to strike out "forty" in line six hundred and nineteen and insert "thirty-five." That was according to the understanding of the committee; but it seems to be retained here at forty cents. The increase is provided for in another part of the bill. It now reads:

On snuff manufactured of tobacco or any substitute for tobacco, ground dry or damp, pickled, scented, or otherwise, of all descriptions, when prepared for use, forty cents per pound.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment, striking out "forty" and inserting "thirty-five," will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before that question is submitted to the Senate and acted upon, I desire to state that if the Senator intends to insist upon the increase of the duty upon manufactured tobacco and smoking tobacco in the subsequent part of this bill instead of the increase here, I shall oppose it. If he desires an increase I think the increase ought to be made at this point. I am not one of those who believe that tobacco can stand much increase from the taxation that we now have. If it be desired to increase it in the subsequent section and levy an additional twenty per cent. upon all manufactured articles contained in section ninety-four of the bill of the last session, I shall oppose it. Senators will see that twenty per cent. upon the tobacco tax is seven cents. It is now thirty-five cents, and one fifth of that is seven cents, which would make the tax forty-two cents. If the Senator proposes to change the tax of forty cents here to thirty-five cents, and then insists on the increased duty in the subsequent part of the bill, it will make the duty on tobacco forty-two cents instead of forty cents. As there is a general increase insisted on in this bill, I shall not object to an increase of the taxation upon tobacco. I am willing to consent to a tax of forty cents, and let it stand in the bill here at forty cents; but I shall insist upon no increase in the subsequent section. I can demonstrate to the Senate, I think, satisfactorily that forty cents is a very exorbitant tax upon this article; and I have information that satisfies me that if this tax is much increased, the business, at least in my section of the country, will not be continued.

Mr. CLARK. What I designed was to strike out the increase of five per cent. here and reduce it to the old price of thirty-five cents, and then increase the tax upon tobacco, as we had increased the rates upon the other articles, one fifth of the tax, or one twentieth of the amount. It would add to the tax on tobacco at thirty-five cents, seven cents, making it forty-two cents, and the increase would correspond exactly with the increase we make on many other articles; and that was the understanding of the committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. That was not my understanding.

Mr. CLARK. But if the Senator desires to confer with me further in connection with this amendment, perhaps it had better be passed over as well as the rest.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think it had better be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire is withdrawn, and the question is on the amendment proposed by the committee, striking out certain words.

Mr. CLARK. That amendment had better be passed over, and no action taken upon it at present, as the Senator from Missouri and myself are to confer about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment of the committee will be passed over, no objection being made, and the reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary continued the reading, as follows:

On tobacco twisted by hand, or reduced from leaf into a condition to be consumed, without the use of any machine or instrument, and without being pressed, sweetened, or otherwise prepared, thirty cents per pound.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let all those clauses in regard to tobacco be passed over.

Mr. CLARK. Cigars and all?

Mr. HENDERSON. No; I am willing to consider the tax on cigars now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no objection be made, the amendments reported by the committee on the subject of tobacco will be passed by and not acted upon at the present time; and the reading will be proceeded with, beginning on the six hundred and thirty-sixth line.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the committee was on page 27, line six hundred and thirty-eight, after the word "cigarettes" to insert, "and valued at not more than five dollars per hundred packages," so that the clause will read:

On cigarettes made of tobacco, inclosed in a paper wrapper, and put up in packages containing not more than twenty-five cigarettes, and valued at not more than five dollars per hundred packages, five cents per package.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 27, after line six hundred and thirty-nine, to strike out the following clause:

"On all cigars, cheroots, and cigarettes, made wholly of tobacco, or of any substitutes therefor, whether imported or of domestic manufacture, sixty cents per pound; and no tare for the box or package in which any cigars or cigarettes are packed shall be allowed in ascertaining the weight. And the duty as aforesaid on all cigars, cheroots, or cigarettes imported shall be levied, collected, and paid under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe;" by inserting in the last paragraph relating to cigars, after the words "imprisonment not exceeding thirty days," the words, "and any person furnished with such permit may apply to the assistant assessor or inspector of the district to have any cigars of their own manufacture weighed; and on receiving a certificate of the weight, for which such fee as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shall be paid by the owner thereof, may sell and deliver such cigars to any purchaser, in the presence of said assistant assessor or inspector, in bulk or unpacked, without payment of the duty. A copy of the certificate shall be retained by the assistant assessor, or by the inspector, who shall return the same to the assistant assessor of the district. The purchaser shall pack such cigars in boxes, and have the same inspected and marked or stamped according to the provisions of this act, and shall make a return of the same as inspected to the assistant assessor of the district, and, unless removed to a bonded warehouse, shall pay the duties on such cigars within five days after purchasing them to the collector of the district wherein they were manufactured, and before the same have been removed from the store or building of such purchaser, or from his possession; and any such purchaser who shall neglect for more than five days to pack and have such cigars duly inspected, and pay the duties thereon according to this act, or who shall purchase any cigars from any person not holding such permit, the duties thereon not having been paid, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and be fined not exceeding $500, and be imprisoned not exceeding six months, at the discretion of the court, and the cigars shall be forfeited and sold, one fourth for the benefit of the informer, one fourth for the officer who seized or had them condemned, and one half shall be paid to the Government."

On cigarettes made wholly of tobacco or any substitute therefor, on cheroots or short sixes, and on all cigars valued at fifteen dollars or less per thousand, with the tax included, five dollars per thousand; and on all cigarettes or cigars valued higher than as aforesaid, fifteen dollars per thousand.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am under some misunderstanding about this thing. I desire that a portion of that section that is proposed to be stricken out shall be retained, especially that portion which guards the revenue and requires that these cigars shall be stamped and inspected.

Mr. CLARK. That is in the old law.

Mr. HENDERSON. My impression is that this is an improvement on the old law. I ask the Senator to let it be passed over for the present along with the other tobacco tax.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If no objection be made, no action will be taken on this proposed amendment at the present time, but it will be passed over, and the reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was on page 29, after line seven hundred and two, to strike out the following clause:

That section one hundred three be amended by striking out the words "two and a half per cent. upon the gross receipts," and inserting "two and a half per cent. upon net receipts under $3,000, and five per cent. upon the excess."

Mr. FARWELL. I will ask the Senate to pass over the amendment to this section. The committee have amended it by striking out a portion of the House bill, and then by inserting a long paragraph at the end. There are some other sections in the bill which have close connection with this, to which I propose to offer some amendments, and to which I shall ask the attention of the Senate at the proper time; but I would like to have this amendment passed over until that time comes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better decide this question now. We have to get through with this bill to-night. We have passed over several amendments already, and I think we might as well settle this question at once. The question presented by the honorable Senator is whether corporations shall be taxed on their gross receipts or on their net receipts. That is the question to be determined by the Senate.

Mr. FARWELL. That is not the question in this amendment. The question here is whether vessels shall be taxed upon their gross receipts or upon their net receipts, and upon that subject I propose to offer an amendment, and I shall desire to have some little time accorded to me to express my views upon it. I think the policy in every respect of the taxation adopted by the last Congress is not entirely sound, but this is in contravention of the whole policy adopted through this bill. There cannot be found another case in the whole bill that is analogous to this.

In the first place, here is a tax upon what? Upon a man's receipts of money. It is not upon any manufacture; it is upon receipts for the use of his property; and those receipts are taken in the gross. What are the gross receipts of a vessel? This law was passed at the last session of Congress. I never heard of any intention to so construe the act as to apply it to the coasting trade of the country until after I came to Washington. Since then I have had letters from all portions of the coast, complaining of the great hardships of this bill. In the first place, if it were proper to tax this property in this way at all, there is no comparison of the gross receipts with the net receipts. A man may receive a very large sum as gross receipts from a vessel, and still not have one cent left as a net receipt; and yet the committee now propose to tax him, and the law of last Congress did tax him, two and a half per cent. upon the gross earnings of the vessel.

The most of the vessels that this clause reaches are sailed upon shares by the master, he taking one half of the gross receipts, and in cases of the smaller class of vessels going along the coast, three fifths of the gross receipts for his wages and for the wages of the crew which he assumes to pay, and the provisioning of the vessel. There are three fifths of the gross receipts that the owner never sees and has nothing to do with. Then, again, from the other two fifths he must pay the insurance, he must pay all the wear and tear of his vessel, he must pay the port charges; and in many cases not one cent of the receipts comes into his hands, and yet he is taxed two and a half per cent. upon the gross receipts of the vessel. It is manifestly unjust.

Besides, sir, this is a case where there can be no protection given. He is competing against the tonnage of the whole world. You will find by examining the section of the law that is now proposed to be amended, that it expressly provides that in cases of railroads, toll-bridges, and other corporations, they shall be allowed to add this tax to their charges, putting these taxes directly upon the passengers who may travel over them, or who may have occasion to use them; but in this case there can be no protection. This class of property which it is proposed to tax in this unheard-of way is competing against the tonnage of the whole world. There is no protection given to it; and there cannot be.

The whole policy through all these taxes has been to exempt from taxation such articles of manufacture and produce of this country as cannot be protected against competition from foreign articles of the same kind. One reason given here, and a very good reason in my judgment, for the termination of the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain was, that with regard to many of our articles, upon which we ought to raise some revenue, we were prohibited from doing so by the fact that the same articles were admitted duty free from the British provinces, and consequently no tax could be laid on the same articles manufactured in this country. Now here is a case right in point; and I beg Senators to give their attention for one moment to the result of this kind of legislation. The American tonnage is fast disappearing from the ocean; and who suffer by it? Not the owners of the tonnage. They can sell their tonnage at any time at fair prices and can invest the proceeds in other property; but is it to be the policy of this country to drive from the ocean the tonnage belonging to American citizens, the missionaries and the pioneers of trade everywhere? Why, sir, it is the tonnage of the country that has opened up markets to the manufacturers and producers of this country all over the world. Had not America been a nation largely engaged in tonnage I do not believe we should be shipping an article from this country to Australia to-day. Some of our ships went out there upon freight with cargoes loaded in Great Britain, and when the masters got there (intelligent as all our shipmasters are) they found that those markets were prepared to receive many articles of the growth and manufacture of this country, and they at once opened up a correspondence with their owners at home and with their friends at home, advising them that certain articles would pay well for shipping there; and from that small beginning we have opened up a large trade. It is so to all the other parts of the world.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like to interrupt the Senator from Maine, but I wish to inquire if he has not fallen into a misapprehension. There is no tax levied upon the transportation of persons and property between the United States and any foreign port.

Mr. FARWELL. No, sir; but the Senator will perceive, if he will look at the subject for a moment, that we have some four million tons of shipping. Perhaps one million tons is of that class that it must be employed in foreign trade or in long voyages. It is too large, it is too heavy a draught of water, it is too cumbersome, for the coasting trade.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no tax levied upon that sort of a vessel.

Mr. FARWELL. I know that. I will explain it to the Senator in a moment if he will permit me. There is perhaps one million tons that is too small for the foreign trade except, perhaps, to the near ports in the British provinces and West Indies, leaving two million tons that are adapted for either trade. Now, I ask the Senator if he can protect the coastwise tonnage when there is no protection to the foreign tonnage. Here are two million tons of shipping well adapted to either trade, coastwise or foreign; and whenever the coastwise trade pays better than the foreign, this shipping drops into it until it is reduced to the natural level; and whenever the foreign trade is the best, they go into that trade, so that of themselves they will keep the trade, foreign and coastwise, upon an equilibrium. Therefore I say that there can be no protection.

I supposed that the policy would be adopted here that has been adopted in all other Governments. There is no commercial nation that puts a direct tax upon its tonnage. France has for more than twenty years levied a tax of five francs per ton—nearly a dollar—upon every ton of shipping that enters her ports from a foreign port. This of course applies to her own tonnage as well as to ours and that of other nations, thereby drawing a large revenue from other nations, and still leaving her ships upon an equal footing with theirs. England, too, has collected certain dues, harbor dues, light dues, &c., from all foreign tonnage; but the United States has never levied any. That was manifestly a bad policy even in time of peace, when we had abundance of money to supply the revenue of the Government. We should have adopted this policy then, so that when for-eight vessels came to our ports they should contribute something to our revenues as well as to have us contribute to theirs. We have at this very Congress made an appropriation for the extinguishment of the Scheldt dues, which was a tax on our tonnage as well as a tax on the tonnage of other countries going into the Scheldt; and I think within a very few years we compounded the Sound dues with Denmark, paying a large sum of money to get rid of those dues.

Now, sir, the taxes proposed by this bill on shipping come very uneven; they are very troublesome to collect; it is very expensive to get them; and I suggest to the committee—and I made the suggestion once before, but I fear the attention of the committee was not called to it—that the Government may derive more revenue in a direct way where it will cost not one cent to collect it. The Government may collect more money from the shipping of the country than it will derive under this tax, and where it will cost not one cent to collect it, by assessing a tax on vessels coming from foreign ports, and I say to the Senator from Ohio that the owners of the shipping of this country will not object to a direct tax assessed upon each vessel as she arrives from a foreign port, paid into the custom-house at the time of her entrance, where there can be no escape, and where there can be no expense of collecting, and where at least three fifths of it will come out of foreign nations, and half of it out of Great Britain, who has done so much to bring our tonnage into disrepute.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine whether the tonnage that is taxed under this bill is in competition with foreign tonnage; whether a foreign ship loaded at one of our ports for another of our ports would not be subject to this tax the same as our own shipping.

Mr. FARWELL. I will state to the Senator that a foreign ship cannot load in one of our domestic ports for another domestic port; it is prohibited. I supposed I had explained to the Senator, but his attention must have been drawn off at the time I explained it, that it was not possible to give protection; that that is no measure of protection, because we have so large a class of vessels suitable for the coasting trade that whenever the coasting trade pays better than the foreign trade they drop into the coasting trade until they bring it down to the standard of the profit of the foreign trade, and consequently no protection can be given by this measure by giving us the exclusive right of the coasting trade. England gives that same right to her coasting vessels also.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the Senator another question: whether this tax upon the coasting trade is not charged by the shipper additional upon his freights; and, whether the voyage be prosperous or not, if he has not received the tax at least by way of these extra charges.

Mr. FARWELL. There can be no addition. The man who goes into the market with a vessel is obliged to take what they give him; he takes the rates, be they more or less, and the coasting rates and foreign rates correspond as near as can be. If one business is paying the other is paying. They run together. Now, instead of making it a direct tax in this way, and making the American tonnage pay the whole of it, why not put the tax on every ship that arrives at one of our ports from a foreign port? Then Great Britain will pay her portion of the tax. Why, sir, I looked in the Tribune only a night or two ago, and out of some forty arrivals in that port more than thirty-five were foreign vessels.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend from Maine is not discussing the amendment now before the Senate, but discussing a proposition upon which I agree with him entirely; and if he will prepare an amendment carefully—he is more familiar with the subject of shipping than I can be—making a reasonable duty upon foreign ships arriving at our ports, in the nature of light-house dues, I shall vote for it with great pleasure; but that does not affect this question.

Mr. FARWELL. But would the Senator have this increased tax put on also?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I would apply that tax only to foreign shipping. I believe, however, we cannot impose such a tax as that. At any rate, the question now before us is not the one that the Senator is discussing.

Mr. FARWELL. I was only discussing that as a substitute for this, as a reason why this should be rejected; and then I propose to advise the committee to offer, or to offer myself, such a proposition as I have suggested. I believe it is a just measure. I believe that where the Government gets $500,000 under this tax they may get $1,000,000 under the other. Great Britain will pay $500,000 of it; we shall pay perhaps $300,000 of it; and the other $200,000 will come out of other foreign ships. I believe that this amendment should be rejected. I believe that if there was no tax obtained in any other way this should not be imposed. It is not a manufacture; it is an income. The money received from a ship is merely an income; and that you propose to tax five or ten per cent. as the case may be, and then here instead of putting on two and a half per cent. more to the income, making it seven and a half or twelve and a half, you put two and a half on the gross receipts, which is more than ten per cent. on every dollar of net income that will be obtained from any of this class of property. Such a tax is manifestly unjust. I hope the amendment proposed by the committee will be rejected at any rate.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. If I understand the present question, it is upon that part of the bill proposing to amend section one hundred and three of the old law, which commences in the bill before us on line seven hundred and three; and the question is whether the taxes are to be imposed upon the gross or upon the net receipts of these various companies. The Committee on Finance proposed to strike out the amendment in this respect that has been introduced by the House. The House proposed instead of having this tax uniformly upon the gross receipts to tax at a double rate the net receipts.

We were warned by one of the Senators from New Hampshire [Mr. CLARK] last evening against the danger of an inequality in the imposition of these taxes. He stated, and I have no doubt justly, and properly, and truly, that if our people were satisfied that the taxes were equally imposed so as to affect every industry in the same proportion, there would be little objection made to the payment of the taxes. My own experience as a member of the Finance Committee and in my intercourse with my fellow-citizens generally is that the complaints that are made are not so much against the amount of taxes imposed as it is that they operate unequally on different branches of business. I think that the law as it stands does, and must necessarily, operate unequally. You may take the various businesses that are comprised in this amendment, and you find that there does not prevail a uniform ratio of net to gross receipts. In many of the companies, perhaps a very small proportion, but taking the largest interest, that of our longest and best managed railroads, and you will find that generally the net receipts bear a proportion of about one half to the gross receipts. Now as to them this cannot be anything more than fair. If it is true, as I have stated, that the net receipts amount to about one half the gross receipts, and you transfer the tax from the gross receipts to the net receipts, doubling it at the same time, you are likely to realize the same amount of money from it.

But, sir, there are various smaller interests; there are the city railroads as an instance, where the net receipts do not perhaps bear the same proportion to the gross receipts. We have the cases that have been alluded to by the Senator from Maine. The voyage of a vessel and her receipts from that voyage vary very greatly. There can perhaps be no rule prescribed for such cases. It cannot be said that there is anything like an average. One voyage is prosperous and another the reverse; and a case has recently been given in a newspaper of a vessel chartered I believe to go to California for $6,000, and when she got there she had already expended upward of the six thousand dollars; and yet she was taxed upon that sum as her receipts.

Now, I apprehend that the object of these taxes is to substitute this as it were for the income tax, or to be as it were an income upon the receipts of these companies; and if you pursue the rule that stands in the old law, it cannot fail to work a great inequality. My opinion, therefore, is decided that you will best accommodate the interests of the revenue, that is to say that you will get a better revenue, that you will render this tax, in its appearance at least, more equal to those who are subject to it, and that upon the whole you will do greater justice by adopting the amendment of the House than you will by rejecting it. It proposes that the net receipts under three thousand dollars shall be subject to a less rate of tax. While it is impossible to specify or to give a catalogue of the kinds of business which that would affect, yet it may be said generally that in those cases the business is not a very profitable business where the whole receipts do not exceed that amount; and therefore the rate as to them is properly made less. I have had some experience in this matter. I was in the shipping business in early life, and I have been in the railroad business in later life, and connected with these companies, and so far as my own testimony will go in reference to the knowledge thus acquired, I will say that the only fair way to reach these companies is by taxing the net receipts; and if, as I have stated, the net receipts in most of these cases amount to one half the gross receipts, and you at the same time double the tax, you do not affect the gross amount to be received from them.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before action is taken upon this subject, I will move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "transportation," in the seven hundred and twenty-fourth line, the following—

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state to the Senator that we have not reached that point yet. We are now at line seven hundred and three, page 29.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now before the Senate is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance to strike out from line seven hundred and three to line seven hundred and seven inclusive, on page 29.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, this amendment is a very important one. The House of Representatives propose to substitute in place of the tax of two and a half per cent. upon the gross receipts of all transportation companies, two and a half per cent. on the net receipts under three thousand dollars, and five per cent. on the excess. This question was carefully considered by the Committee on Finance, and we concluded that it was not wise to adopt this change. The present law yields us a very large revenue. It is the only tax upon corporations; it is the only tax upon transportation. To apply a new rule would be to make one that is very varied. What are the net receipts of a transportation company? What are the net receipts of a ship? How is it possible to ascertain them? How is it possible to apply the rule to all the various transportation companies of the country? In some cases it would be a very light tax, in other cases it would be very heavy. What are net receipts? No two members of the committee could agree upon the subject of what net receipts are; and I ask Senators what would be the meaning of net receipts? Are the net receipts those that are left after deducting all the expenses of transportation, all the hire of laborers, insurance, taxes, the cost of running the ship, the cost of running the railroad, funds that are set aside for special purposes, interest on bonds, construction account, &c., &c.? It is impossible to adopt such a rule and apply it to a tax law. The present rule is clear and definite. It is very easy to ascertain the gross receipts of a railroad company, of a bank, of a corporation, of a ship, of a horse railroad, and of every other corporation engaged in transportation. There is no other rule that is so definite and distinct as will enable us to apply it in a question of taxation.

Some of these companies complain that a tax of two and a half per cent. is very high, but they are authorized to charge this two and a half per cent. upon their customers. They increase the amount of freight and their bills for transportation in a ship to correspond with the tax. They have increased their fare on railroads to correspond with the tax. They are authorized by the terms of this bill to add this tax on their fare even in the case of horse railroads; and where a tax of two and a half per cent. amounts, as it does on many of them, to less than one cent they are authorized to add one cent to the amount of fare that they are authorized by law to charge. It seems to me, therefore, to change the rule of assessment upon these corporations would be to substitute an uncertain, variable rule for what is now certain and fixed. The tax on corporations will yield us over five million dollars—between five and ten millions. I endeavored to find the exact amount, but I have not been able to get it. To adopt any other rule would be to allow all sorts of evasions and all sorts of frauds. It seems to me, therefore, it is wiser to adhere to the rule established at the last session after full discussion, rather than to change it before six months have expired.

Mr. FARWELL. I agree in the main with the views of the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the committee; but here are two things connected together in this section that are so entirely different, as ships and railroads, toll-bridges and canal-boats, which are common carriers, and corporations, which are protected everywhere. No man can go and build a line of railroad up and down this avenue without consulting Congress; and we know very well that Congress will give no right to put a competing road right alongside of the present one. These people, therefore, may add to their fare, and put this tax which is imposed upon them upon their customers. But there are no chartered rights to the use of the great highway of the world. Here is an open competition; and the fault I find with this proposition is that ships are lashed to railroads. When I asked the committee to pass over the consideration of this section, my proposition was to separate the two; I proposed to strike out of the section the word "ship," and then legislate for ships by themselves, by putting on tonnage duties.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is not in order now. The Senator can accomplish that at the proper time by moving an amendment to the original bill, striking out the word "ship," but that is not now at all affected by this amendment.

Mr. FARWELL. I have no objection to it. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 29, after line seven hundred and seven, to strike out the following clause:

That section one hundred and three be further amended by adding the following after the word "vehicle" where it occurs the second time in the section: "Provided, That this section shall not apply to those teams, wagons, and vehicles used in transporting logs for lumber from the forests to the place or places of manufactory, or to the teams or vehicles used in the transportation of ores from the mines where the same is excavated to the place where they are reduced or worked."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 30, after line seven hundred and sixteen, to insert the following:

That section one hundred and three be amended by inserting after the words "and any foreign port" the words "but such duty shall be assessed upon the transportation of persons and property shipped from a port within the United States through a foreign territory to a port within the United States, and shall be assessed upon and collected from persons, firms, companies, or corporations within the United States receiving such freight or transportation." And that section one hundred and three be amended by adding at the end of said section the following: "And provided further, That no tax under this section shall be assessed upon any person whose gross receipts do not exceed $1,000 per annum."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNESS. There was an amendment adopted just now without its having secured the attention of Senators; and I wish, if there be no objection, to have it considered again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will all come up again for consideration in the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I know that; but we may not have an opportunity to say then what we wish to say upon it. It occurs on the 30th page of the bill just passed; it is the proviso relating to "teams, wagons, and vehicles used in transporting logs for lumber from the forests to the place or places of manufactory, or to the teams or vehicles used in the transportation of ores from mines where the same is excavated to the place where they are reduced or worked."

I was so unfortunate as not to be able to be present at the meetings of the Finance Committee, and therefore have no complaint to make of the action taken by the committee; but I was unaware of their having taken such action as to propose to strike out the amendment made by the House of Representatives which exempts the class of wagons and vehicles used in transporting logs to mills for lumber, or the transportation of ores from the mine to the place where it is reduced. I desire simply to say to the Senate that this tax is one that ought not to be imposed; that it is one that cannot be afforded; that in most instances the hauling of this ore for experimental purposes; and that, as we have concluded to tax the product of the mine, namely, the gold that is taken from it, this tax, of all others, should not be imposed here. The idea of taxing an ox team that is engaged in hauling logs from where they are cut to the mill seems to be one so preposterous as not to require any considerable explanation. The Senators from Nevada feel a particular interest in this proposition, for they are living in a country where this business is very largely done, not only where ores are hauled for great distances to points where they are reduced, but where lumber is very scarce, and where the tax imposed in this manner upon it would be very severely felt. I hope the Senate will not concur in this part of the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. This proposition, it seems to me, is the most singular one of all the exemptions that are endeavored to be put on the tax bill.

Mr. CONNESS. I will say to the Senator it was very fully discussed in the House of Representatives and adopted with great unanimity.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let me state a fact. The Senator proposes to exempt from taxation the transportation of gold ore and lumber, and yet proposes to subject to taxation the transportation of food. That is the long and the short of it. Everything else in this world must pay a tax upon its transportation except gold and lumber. Why? Nearly all of the lumber of this country is made by large manufacturing companies in Michigan and other places, who saw it up. Nearly all the gold that is transported, which would be reached by this bill, is owned by large mining companies; and we know from the New York papers that they are companies sometimes having a capital of five, or ten, or fifty million dollars. According to this provision the Senator would exempt mining companies and lumber companies from paying a tax upon their transportation, and yet would levy a tax upon the transportation of the food that is carried from the State of Ohio to the State of Massachusetts. It seems to me there is no ground on which it can be placed; there is no reason for it. The Committee on Finance could not justify it. We did not see any reason that actuated the House; and I am sure the Senators from Nevada, who represent a State so rich that the other night I felt that I belonged to a nation more powerful than any in the world after listening to the honorable Senator from Nevada, [Mr. NYE.] I hope they will not commence by special legislation exempting their transportation from tax, when we impose it by this bill upon the transportation of every necessary of life.

Mr. CONNESS. I know that the Senator would not recommend this amendment striking out the proposition made by the House of Representatives if he were exactly aware of the facts. Let me say to the Senator that there is not a foot of lumber made in the country that we represent that is not transported after it is made upon wagons, and that is all subject to tax. But here is a mill and there is a forest; and the ox teams used in hauling the logs to that mill are to be taxed also. Is the Senator not willing to wait until it is made into lumber and then receive his tax; for every foot of it must be hauled to market. Will he tax the hauling of it in the log and then tax it at the other side of the mill as it goes to the market and to the consumer? I hope not. I know the Senator does not wish to do that.

Now, in regard to the fabulous idea that the Senator has deduced, by some process or other, from the speech of my honorable friend from Nevada in regard to the mines of Nevada, I will merely say that had I not known something of the sage-brush country and of the delving that is necessary to get the gold or silver, I too might have been led away by the flowers of rhetoric of my honorable friend. I know it was hard for him to restrain his enthusiasm when he desired to paint the prospects of what he regarded as the realities of his young and giant Commonwealth; but I would hate very much, as I apprehend his constituency would, that taxation should be based upon the eloquent representations of my honorable friend. I do not wish to condemn them. As long as a Senator has the proud privilege of being able to stand on the top of the mountains and imagine that all the earth he sees but covers over the shining metal; I know no reason why he should not be permitted to describe the scene here as it occurred to him without the Finance Committee and the honorable chairman of that committee being at liberty to get up a revenue bill based upon that picture. It is to that part of it that I object.

Mr. NYE. It will be remembered, Mr. President, by the Senate that in the remarks I made in regard to our power to produce gold, if the avenues were opened up through which we could get the means of reducing the ore, I stated that we could as well produce $500,000,000 a year as the $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 that we now produce. I repeat that assertion. It was no flower of rhetoric, and it was no assertion upon which the chairman of the Committee on Finance had a right to draw any other deduction than such as I intended to suggest—that we had the power to produce if we had the means of reducing the ore. But, sir, we have not those means.

But, sir, to come to the question: the committee propose by striking out these words to tax the drawing of our ores two and a half per cent. upon the net product of drawing up to $3,000, and five per cent on the excess. It seems to me that this is unfair; and when I say this I do not mean, and I do not represent in part a constituency that desire to shrink from their due proportion of the burdens of this war. But the getting of the ore to the mill where it is reduced is a part of one business, that is, of producing bullion, and the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance might as well lay a tax upon the team that draws the cotton from the railroad to the mill or from the canal to the mill as upon the ore from the mine to the mill where it is reduced. It is a part of the same business; and when this bullion is produced you tax that.

Lumber, too, is a most essential ingredient in the reduction of these ores. We are so situated in Nevada that the only lumber we have lies in the extreme western part of the State, upon the eastern slope of the Sierra Nevada mountains. That lumber is drawn from one hundred to four hundred miles after it is manufactured, to rear the structures that reduce these ores. I have myself seen wagons weighed upon a scale loaded with lumber, and the owner of the lumber paying fifteen cents a pound upon that lumber, one foot of lumber weighing three pounds, making a cost of forty-five cents per foot for drawing that lumber to the place of its destination—$450 per thousand feet for drawing it. That is taxed when it is in the shape of lumber, and now it is proposed to tax the team that draws it from the mountain to the mill. I suggest to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance whether that is not burdening that already overburdened article too much.

I do not understand that it is the policy of the Finance Committee or of the nation to so load down the business of producing anything up to the time that it is produced by taxation, as to prevent its production. A large majority of these teams are owned by the miners themselves. They are not taxed. The balance of them are owned by poor men, who find a few days now and then to devote to the purpose of hauling ore from the mine to the mill; and it varies in distance from half a mile to eight or ten miles.

Let me suggest to the chairman of the Finance Committee that two and a half per cent. upon their net earnings would not be much. The net earnings of these people who have hauled this ore for the last year have been very small indeed. It has been a year of great depression in our mining business and in our lumber business; and our miners and lumbermen have had all they could do to live. I submit to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance that if he desires to reach the great thing, to tax the bullion, it is a matter of public economy and public interest to increase that production, untrammelled from taxation, as much as possible. If he taxes the team that draws the ore, he may with the same propriety tax the person that brings it to the mouth of the tunnel, or raises it through the shaft to the surface. With as much propriety, I assert, could the committee tax the car that brings the bullion to the mouth of the mine or the tunnel, as to tax the team that takes it from there a shorter or a longer distance for the purpose of reducing it. If we wish to raise revenue upon the production, I submit that it is not wise to cripple and lessen that production by unnecessary taxation. Sir, I think it will be wisdom on the part of the Committee on Finance, it will be wisdom on the part of both Houses of Congress, if they will lighten the burdens of taxation as much as they can upon the production of bullion.

Allow me to suggest, Mr. President, that it is not the mere tax upon the bullion that sets forth the full benefits of the production. It is the fact that we produce this bullion; it is the fact that we are a gold and silver producing nation that gives to our bonds their value abroad, and will increase the basis upon which they rest if the production is not crippled and killed by this incessant taxation from the time the first blow is struck in the mountain till the shining metal is seen. I protest, therefore, in the name of the revenue of this country against this proposition. If you would increase the revenue, lay not these heavy burdens of taxation upon this poor class of people that help to produce the bullion. Get out your bullion, and lay such a tax upon that as bullion alone can sustain. But, sir, I insist that it is not wise to tax in these incipient steps the poor teamster that works a day now and a day hereafter in drawing the ore from which the bullion is produced. It will not increase your revenue, but will decrease it, if you tax these laborers who produce the bullion.

Therefore, sir, I am opposed to this amendment. I think the House acted wisely in inserting this provision. Let us leave these channels that help the production of bullion as free as possible. I would not tax the honorable Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SPRAGUE] in getting his cotton from a railroad to his mill; but I would tax the fabric. I would not tax the man who wrought it; but I would tax the fabric, and thereby reach the whole. I insist upon it, therefore, that it is not wise, it is not discreet, that this amendment should be adopted.

Mr. STEWART. I regret exceedingly to be called upon to express my views with regard to this subject of taxation on this amendment; but it is a more important matter than the chairman of the Committee on Finance perhaps imagines. The constituents that I represent are more heavily taxed for transportation than any other people in the world. We have a population of from thirty thousand to fifty thousand; we probably reach fifty thousand now; but while we did not reach thirty thousand a year ago we paid in one year in transportation for the food (and that question has been spoken of here) and supplies that we brought from California alone, over twelve million dollars. That was a very large amount. The timber and lumber that is hauled is another item which if we had the facts here would astonish the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the permission of the Senator from Nevada I desire to make a statement. When the Committee on Finance acted on this matter they did not even regard the condition of things in Nevada; and I will state to him the reason why. If this proviso is adopted simply to accommodate the new State of Nevada, we shall sacrifice large revenues in the State of Pennsylvania, the State of Maine, and the State of Michigan. Take the State of Pennsylvania alone. There are corporations there engaged in hauling wagons and vehicles to carry iron ore from the mines to the place where it is manufactured. They pay transportation. There are more than five hundred such in Pennsylvania to one in Nevada. Shall we make an exception of a class of business merely to accommodate Nevada, when by it we surrender five hundred times the amount of revenue which the whole State of Nevada will pay under the provisions of this section? That will be the result. If the Senator desires Nevada to be exempted from the operations of the bill, rather than consume time I would vote for it; but I know that he would not desire that.

Mr. STEWART. I would not like to have it in that shape. I suggest to the Senator to so amend the clause as to exempt the teams hauling gold and silver ore.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will ask the Senator how we can exempt the gold and silver ore, and not iron ore? Why should gold and silver ore be exempted, and not iron?

Mr. STEWART. That is the very story I propose to tell to the Senate. I propose to show why it should be excepted. It is of great importance that the question should be understood by the Senate, and I suppose I may as well go on and state some facts in regard to it.

In the first place we are taxed for transportation more than any other people in the world. Our State is so situated that its progress or its abandonment is simply a question of transportation. We have no railroads. Everything that we use must be transported at sometimes as high as twenty-five or thirty cents a pound. The question whether a pound of rock shall be worked or not is often simply a question of transportation. For instance, take the case of rock in the eastern portion of the State, where there is little or no timber by which it can be worked. It must be taken to water and to timber. Suppose that if it were hauled to where it can be worked it would be worth $100; that is, if it were on the western border of the State, where there is water and timber. Suppose (and this is exactly the case there) you attempt to transport it from the eastern portion of the State, where it is worth nothing, to the western border, where there is water and timber. The cost of transportation is eighty or ninety dollars a ton. Now, if you add two and a half per cent. to the gross amount that the miner receives, which is large, it will prevent the hauling of that quartz at all. As we are at present situated all the quartz that will pay for hauling will be hauled, and much of it is hauled at a loss. But if you add any burdens, if you add two and a half per cent. to the cost of transportation, which is really adding two and a half per cent. to the gross product of the mine, it will in many cases prevent the mines from being worked at all.

If we had transportation there, and railroads there, Nevada would certainly be one of the richest countries in the world. We are progressing as fast as we can with the means we now have. The difficulty of transportation, and its immense cost, is what retards our progress. If that one question of transportation were out of the way, there is no reason in the world why we should not be producing to-day five or six hundred millions per annum. If we had railroads over the Great Basin, so that we could have our quartz transported readily to the timber, there would be no end to the amount of our production; but as long as that difficulty remains in the way, our progress must necessarily be very slow.

There is something very fascinating about mining. Miners will take the chances of obtaining transportation as long as there is a hope of striking something sufficiently rich to enable them to make money. Three fourths, four fifths, yes, I may say nine tenths, of all who attempt to operate in those mines and transport the ore to wood and water fail. One in ten succeeds and makes a fortune. That is the stimulus that induces the other nine to expend their money and haul this rock—it is entirely experimental—to the rivers and to the timber. You are taxing men who are attempting to develop the country at the loss of their fortunes, because one in ten succeeds. Stop this experimenting; stop this attempt to work the rock; stop them from hauling, by imposing burdens upon them, and you will be the losers by it. A new mining district is being discovered in the desert daily. The first year is entirely experimental whether they will open it at all or not. The cost of transportation amounts sometimes to hundreds of thousands of dollars. If you impose a tax of two and a half per cent. upon that, you put a still further embargo on the production of bullion, and I believe you will lose money by the experiment.

If you will encourage these miners to go and develop the country, occasionally (and that is the present stimulus) one will make a good strike and will get rich and have an income, and from that income you will derive a revenue. If you take it in its incipient state and say to the enterprising miner who shall attempt to experiment upon rock situated in the desert, and shall build his mill, and shall attempt to haul quartz over these deserts, (and it takes a year or so to make that experiment,) that while he is making that experiment you will tax him with the heavy burden of two and a half per cent. on the gross cost of that hauling, you will utterly discourage all attempts to develop the mining regions.

It seems to me that not only Nevada, but the whole gold and silver regions, should be exempted from this proposed tax. We have not got all the mineral fields there are in the country. Idaho is right to the north of us. It is barren too. We sometimes have pack-hauling from San Francisco clear up to Idaho, some four or five hundred miles. These are experiments, and the Government should encourage these experiments. If you impose this tax, you will diminish our production more than by imposing a tax on any other point that you can strike. It will be most fatal.

The question is often asked here, "You have the richest country in the world, and why are you not producing more mineral wealth than you are? Why is not the production increasing?" Sir, what is needed in order to encourage the development of our mineral wealth? I will tell you. There are two things that we need in order to have our mineral fields opened. We need to have our titles settled by relinquishment on the part of the Government of the United States. We should have the right to hunt for mines, and protection when they are found, so that we may understand that after spending fifteen or twenty years hunting for mines we shall have the reward of title settled, and thus be enabled to obtain money to develop them. We need one other thing; we need transportation. That is the great obstacle that nature has placed between us and the realization of the vast mineral wealth that is locked up in the mineral fields of the United States. We certainly have mineral wealth surpassing that of any other nation. We have mineral fields that are more valuable than those that have been discovered by any other people. That is the universal testimony of travelers from all parts of the world who have come among us. But the great barriers that are placed there by nature of mountains and deserts almost entirely forbid enterprise going there. We have now a threat of Congress of oppressive taxation hanging over us. We have the uncertainty of title, with the threat of taking from us the reward of our labor when we find it. We have the subject entirely misunderstood. Those are the reasons why we do not produce from $500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 per annum. Nature has placed immense obstacles in the way of the working of these mines, and the slightest addition to those difficulties will diminish the production. Place this tax upon the teamsters, and you will lose double the amount that will be received from it in the diminution of the income tax you would otherwise receive. The miners cannot stand a tax of two and one half per cent. more upon their experiments, for these are but experiments. Sometimes they turn out well; sometimes they make men rich, so that they can pay your income tax and add to the wealth of the country.

Thus far very little attention has been paid in this country to the subject of mining. We have not paid as much attention to it here in our own mines as Great Britain and France have already done. They have sent out their agents and commissioners there to report with regard to our mines, and with regard to the difficulties attending mining operations. They understand something of this subject. In consequence of the want of information on this subject in this country we are compelled to employ the learned from those countries and pay them enormous rates for their experience. We are taxed from five to thirty thousand dollars a year for mining experts a piece. We pay men from five to thirty thousand dollars a year for their experience as miners. We have no mining colleges. There is no information among the people with regard to this great branch of industry. No means have been taken on the part of the Government to encourage this development, and here is a blow in the dark at one of the most vital points of its existence, transportation. I can find you millions and millions of tons of rock worth from fifty to five hundred or one thousand dollars a ton that is so far away that it will not pay for the transportation to timber. Add a little more to this burden, and it will be felt materially in that country.

Now, I say before this is done the question should be thoroughly understood. I have occupied the attention of the Senate longer than I had intended upon this point, because I wished to speak of the difficulties of developing that country and what is necessary to be done in order that it may be developed. I repeat again, two things are necessary to accomplish that object: transportation and security of title. Let us alone, and give us transportation, and we will send you bullion enough to make you the greatest commercial nation in the world. We will give you more exports than you now have from all other sources if you will overcome these obstacles of transportation and give the miner freedom to hunt for gold, and then you can make something out of the mines. But you propose to tax it. Whatever you get in the way of exports is taxed, because they buy a commodity, that you tax at the custom-house. Our Constitution wisely provided that exports should not be taxed, and bullion is emphatically an export. Every tax that you levy upon bullion is in violation of the spirit of the Constitution forbidding a tax upon exports. It is a tax upon exports. The bullion that we produce is all exported, and it is taxed once when it returns in the way of commodities. Let us produce this bullion; let us get rich in its production, and we shall have plenty of trade and plenty of imports to tax, because we will then buy the luxury of the Old World. I say, therefore, that if the present age is to realize anything from its mineral wealth, it must realize it by pursuing that course which is absolutely necessary for its development. It takes but very little to destroy the prosperity of that country. You have now a tax of one half of one percent. upon bullion, which is wrong.

Let me state a fact here with regard to mining enterprises. Since California was first discovered there have been, I presume, in all, about eight hundred thousand men engaged in the business of mining. Of that eight hundred thousand forty per cent. have died and twenty-five per cent. have gone out of the business. The balance, or in the neighborhood of two hundred and fifty thousand, are there. That is about the average of those who have been there all the time. Are they rich? No. When they leave the portion of the country in which they have been prospecting they leave it a barren waste. They go and hunt mines elsewhere. They have not enriched themselves; but they have been industrious; they have progressed with its development as far as human energy without more capital and encouragement than they have had could possibly go. If you will look at the roads they have projected and built over the mountains, if you will look at the canals they have constructed for the purpose of conveying water, if you will look at the ruins of their labor upon that country, you will be astonished. All travelers wonder that that amount of labor could possibly have been performed by that number of men. In doing this, what have they done? Have they made themselves rich estates and fine homes? The work they have done in the mountain region would have been sufficient to build up States of greater wealth and prosperity than the great State of Illinois. But who has realized from this labor, and who is to realize from the labor and enterprise necessary to develop the mines hereafter? It is the commercial world; it is your traders; it is the cities of the East; it is the nation generally, by having an export that gives trade an impetus, that gives you a commerce. It is exports that you need to give you commerce; and you ought to leave that as free as possible in the country where it is produced; and particularly should you be governed by this rule: to leave it sufficiently free to allow its production to continue, and continue in proportion to the resources you have to develop. Sir, we have resources that are greater than any other country ever did have to develop. The production from those resources is not at all in proportion to the amount of the resources or the importance of realizing them. I speak of this because it is so important a principle in taxing gold and silver, which you realize the benefits of, which the nation realizes the benefits of, by the way of its trade; but which the miners do not.

Why do they continue? I will tell you why they continue this experiment. Because one in fifty gets enormously rich, and that keeps the other forty-nine busy prospecting, because there are occasional gains; because that people have become fit for this business and are fit for no other. That is the reason why they continue. They have acquired a taste for this gambling. If it is important for this country that it should be developed, if it is important to the country that this should go on, hold out this inducement and hold out greater. If you want that country developed, it would be better to pay an additional reward to the man who discovers a rich mine than to throw any obstructions in his way. But all the additional reward they want is for Congress to declare that they shall remain free to hunt for gold, and to aid, as it is now aiding liberally, to give us transportation. When the gold is produced, that which remains in the country is taxed immediately as money; that which goes from the country, as I remarked before, is taxed in the shape of the commodities that it buys. This builds up a country. Either your mines are worth nothing to the country at all, or they are worth something to the country for the reason that they give you an export trade. You cannot lay burdens on them and develop them. Nine tenths of them are now working, and always will, at a loss. A very little embarrassment further than those they now have will stop half of those that are now producing. There is no use of talking of any mineral wealth unless it can be produced. It can only be produced by removing the burdens upon it. Not one tenth of what should be produced is now being produced. It is because the burdens of nature upon this production far surpass the ability of the men there to overcome. If the burdens of nature with which we contend in Nevada were removed, we would be one of the greatest States, if not the greatest, in this Union. It is unwise to add to those burdens there. It is unwise in California; it is unwise in Idaho, or in Arizona, or any other mineral region of the United States, because it will lessen your revenues.

Sir, you can hardly conceive the number of ways in which the people of the United States would become rich by the production of gold and silver to the extent of $500,000,000 a year. Financiers can tell you something about it. The gold is taxed when it comes back to us in the shape of foreign commodities. The production of it gives employment to a large number of people who are the consumers of your products and give you a fine market. It stimulates trade everywhere. Its benefits I need not attempt to unfold; but, sir, if you wish to realize those benefits you can only do it by removing all burdens upon the production. Why, sir, the most enterprising set of men that ever populated a country have been unable to penetrate even the shell of your mining country; they have not been able to explore a hundredth part of it; and it is because nature has forbidden them to do so without greater capital and different means of transportation from what they now have. In considering this subject it must be considered in all its aspects, and this question of transportation is among the first obstacles that should be understood. I am opposed to this section so far as it has reference to any portion of the mining region.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STEWART. I call for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to have the yeas and nays on an important question of this sort.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest to the honorable Senator that he can make his motion in the Senate, and we are now in Committee of the Whole. I think he had better withdraw it for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Nevada repeat the amendment that he proposes?

Mr. STEWART. The Committee on Finance have reported in favor of striking out the proviso commencing in the seven hundred and tenth line. The committee propose to reject this proposition, which is a House proposition:

Provided, That this section shall not apply to those teams, wagons, and vehicles used in transporting logs for lumber from the forests to the place or places of manufactory, or to the teams, or vehicles used in the transportation of ores from the mines where the same is excavated to the place where they are reduced or worked.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment of the committee has been agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. We had passed over that portion of the bill, and this discussion was really out of order; but I did not wish to raise the point.

The question has been acted upon. If the Senator wishes to have the yeas and nays ordered, he can call them in the Senate. I hope he will not insist upon it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert on page 31, after line seven hundred and thirty-five, the following:

That section one hundred and ten be amended by striking out, after the words "and redemption thereof," the words "nor to any savings bank having no capital stock, and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same on interest for the benefit of the depositors only, and which do no other business of banking."

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to have some explanation of that section. I do not understand it as it now stands.

Mr. SHERMAN. The one hundred and tenth section of the original act in regard to banks and banking exempts from the tax on deposits "savings banks having no capital stock, and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same on interest for the benefit of the depositors only, and which do no other business of banking." The committee were of opinion that it was better to strike out the exception. The deposits in the deposit banks now in the country amount to not less than $200,000,000; and after full reflection and consideration, we deemed that it was not wise to exempt them. The trust companies of the country, which are very large and powerful, insisted upon being classed as savings banks, because they deposited their money with other banks, and consequently were not in the light of other companies; but we thought it was unwise to make any exception, and that all banks of deposit, whether they were trust companies or savings banks, and all other companies, should pay the one half of one percent. on their deposits.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] is not now in his place, and I know that he wishes to discuss this question at length.

Mr. SHERMAN. He can do it in the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I ask whether it is not better to pass it over informally.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better not pass it over. He will have a chance in the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I happen to know that the Senator is particularly earnest about it. I do not know but he may wish to discuss it twice. I think it had better be passed over informally.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I know that he desires to discuss it.

Mr. SUMNER. He has spoken more than once about this matter to me this morning, and I am astonished not to see him here. I think he understood that we should not get so far as this.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senators know that this bill is up, and if they go away and we are to postpone every amendment in this way, we shall never get through with the bill. The Senator from Vermont will have an opportunity to discuss this matter, as I know he desires to discuss it, in the Senate. I trust therefore we may go on. That is the only way we shall ever get through with the bill.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I will divide the Senate upon the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to the amendment in part, but I doubt very much the propriety of applying it to all savings institutions. There are some of them that are limited to $50,000 in their capital, and I shall propose at the proper time—I will not detain the Senate now—to except certain savings institutions whose capital does not exceed that amount. There will be no objection to that, I suppose. I make no motion now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. SUMNER. On that I ask for a division. The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 5, noes 9; no quorum voting.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let it be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The fact that there is no quorum voting suspends the operation of further business until a quorum shall appear.

Mr. GRIMES. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.
Mr. FOOT. I know that my colleague desires to be heard upon this question; and I will state, as the occasion of his absence at this time, that he is engaged on a committee of conference. I therefore ask that it may be passed over for the time being.

Mr. SHERMAN. If that is so, then he is engaged in the business of the Senate, and I certainly will interpose no objection to it being passed over.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I shall withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The call for the yeas and nays may be withdrawn; but the difficulty is that the last vote disclosed the fact that no quorum was present, and the Senate cannot proceed until a quorum is ascertained to be present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn, merely for the purpose of obtaining a quorum; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yea 1, nays 35; as follows:

YEA—Mr. Saulsbury—1.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Morrill, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, and Willey—35.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Harding, Henderson, Howard, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Richardson, Wilkinson, Wilson, and Wright—14.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it be passed over, as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] is not present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over, if there be no objection.

The next amendment was in line seven hundred and sixty-eight, to insert the words "and also all premiums on gold and coupons;" so as to make the clause read:

Provided, That income derived from interest upon notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, and also all premiums on gold and coupons, shall be included in estimating incomes.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to inquire of the chairman if that means that gold shall be estimated at twice its nominal value; that is, whether an income of $1,000 in gold is to be estimated at $2,000 in charging a man with income tax?

Mr. SHERMAN. The provision is very plain:

Provided, That income derived from interest upon notes, bonds, or other securities of the United States, and also all premiums on gold and coupons, shall be included in estimating incomes.

One of the most shameless evasions, in my judgment, of the income tax law was that the holders of United States securities, who were not subject to any other taxation except the income tax to the United States, returned in their income only the gold they received, and yet paid that income in currency. This is for the purpose of making it clear. They no doubt sold their gold or coupons at the current premium, received in currency the proceeds of their investment, twice the amount they returned. It was done no doubt in nine cases out of ten.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I suggest to the chairman of the committee that he had better make this very plain. I think it is just as right to tax a man on the gold he does not sell as the man who sells the gold. The "premium" is the amount the man gets from the sale; and I think that this language will not include the gold which a man receives and keeps.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agree with the honorable member from Indiana that the evasion can be carried on almost as successfully unless the amendment is more comprehensive than it is. The only effect will be that they will keep their gold and coupons on hand until the assessment is made, and sell them afterward.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If I understand the Senator from Ohio, it seems to me this amendment would operate very unequally. Take the case of an importer who holds United States securities and receives his interest in gold. He wants the gold to pay the duties on his imported merchandise, and he uses it in that way; he will not pay a premium on that gold. The Senator from Ohio does not mean that he shall return twice the amount of the interest he has received. That is the case of a man who uses the gold. Then take his neighbor who lives by his side and is engaged in another branch of business that does not require him to pay out gold in duties, and he sells the gold and pays the tax upon the amount he gets for it. Is there not an inequality in that? Suppose he does not sell it; a man can go into any establishment probably in the city of New York or the city of Washington and buy an article for half the amount in gold that it would cost him if he paid in paper. The result will only be to induce persons to deal in that way and you will get nothing by it. It seems to me it will amount to nothing at all. Is it intended to tax the party according to the nominal value of gold in all cases, whether he sells it or not?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If that is the intention it would take in everybody.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will sit down with the bill before him and suggest an amendment to carry out his idea, I shall be very glad.

Mr. TRUMBULL. You will not carry it out by the bill as it is, I am quite sure. If a man gets no premium on his gold he has no tax to pay. The word used is "premium," and the result would be that if a man used the gold without selling it for a premium he would pay no tax except upon the amount of gold he received at its face value.

Mr. MORRILL. It strikes me that the object can be accomplished by simply striking out the two words "all premiums," and it would read:

The income derived from interest upon notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, and also on gold and coupons.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that the amendment read "and also the current premium on gold and coupons received on said bonds."

Mr. GRIMES. Suppose a man does not sell the gold?

Mr. SHERMAN. Then he would be bound by this amendment to return it at the current value in paper.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think we had better disagree to the whole of it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like the Senator from Ohio to explain what he means by the "current premium received." Can he mean that a man is to pay a tax on what he does not receive, because he ought to receive more?

Mr. SHERMAN. What I mean is that when men receive gold for interest on their bonds they shall either pay their tax on that interest in gold, or if they choose to pay it in currency that they shall pay it at the current rate of gold. If the Senator can express the idea in better language I should like to have him do it. That is what we desire to accomplish.

Mr. GRIMES. It seems to me that the language used by the committee in the bill is that which ought to be adopted, and then if you want to reach those who have gold and hold on to it for the purpose of deriving an advantage from the increase in its value, reach them by a subsequent clause to be added to the bill hereafter.

Mr. SHERMAN. We had better do it here.

Mr. GRIMES. You do not do it by your present language.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the question is taken on the amendment as amended, I think it would be better to put the provision in this form:

And shall also include premium at the current market rate on gold or coupons received on such notes, bonds, or securities.

I think that will accomplish the object.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I should like to know what is meant by the current market rate. At what time? On the day it is received or on the day the return is made?

Mr. SHERMAN. On the day it is received.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. Then it should be so expressed.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to make a suggestion on this point. Where a man receives a salary from the Government the Government takes the tax out of his salary as it pays him. Why cannot the tax upon Government stocks and bonds be deducted when the interest is paid in the same way?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer that suggestion. That was a view which was suggested to the committee, but I do not see that it would be exactly fair to the foreign bondholders. Could we do so without violating our contract with them? We levy this tax upon the American bondholder as a burden due by him as a citizen to the Government of the United States, as his portion of the common burden. Can we deduct the tax from the foreign bondholder? How can we distinguish? The Englishman who holds our securities would very seriously object to the deduction of this tax from the interest on his bonds, upon the ground that it would be a breach of the contract he made with the Government.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not see that it would be a violation of contract; but it would be a troublesome thing, I know, to impose a personal tax on a man not a citizen.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to suggest to the chairman of the committee that the objection which he makes to the proposition of the Senator from Vermont is obviated by the first part of the section. The first part of the section provides for a tax upon citizens of the United States residing abroad.

Mr. SHERMAN. But when a coupon is presented, a piece of paper half an inch long and an inch wide, how can you distinguish whether it is owned by a foreign bondholder or by an American citizen? How is the officer to whom it is presented, the Treasurer, to know to whom it belongs and deduct the five per cent.?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is there no way of knowing at the Treasury who presents it?

Mr. SHERMAN. None at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let the amendment be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to reject the words in line seven hundred and sixty-eight, and to retain the words in lines seven hundred and seventy and seven hundred and seventy-one, amended as follows:

And shall also include all premiums at the current market rate on gold or coupons received on such notes, bonds, or other securities.

Mr. JOHNSON. I agree with the committee that this case ought to be provided for; but I am by no means sure that it will be done by the words proposed to be inserted by my friend from Ohio. I understand the object of the committee is to provide that the difference between the nominal value of gold and coupons and their actual value as currency in the market should be ascertained, and that the difference where there is a sale should be considered as income. That I think is proper, because that difference is profit. Take the case of a man who has a thousand dollars' worth of gold: he goes into the market with it. The amendment says its value shall be ascertained at the current rate. What is the current rate? Suppose by bad management he receives less than the market rate, or by good management he receives more, is he in the one case to pay on the profit which he has not made, or is he in the other not to pay on the entire profit which he has made? I suggest to the honorable member and to the Senate that I think the object can be attained without any difficulty by amending the section so as to make it read as I will read it with the amendment which I suggest:

Provided, That income derived from interest upon notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, and premiums received on gold and coupons, shall be included in estimating incomes.

The amendment of the honorable member from Ohio says "premium at the current rate." What does that mean? My friend from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,] let me suppose, has $10,000 in gold which he wants to dispose of. He goes into the market, and he is able to get more than the current rate, or he takes less than the current rate, is he in the first case only to pay upon the profit which he would have made if he had taken the current rate, or is he to pay upon the entire profit; and in the second case, is he to pay his tax on the assumption that he has received the current rate when he has not received it? The object is—I am sure that is the object of the honorable chairman—to tax the actual profit which a man has made on his income. Whatever he has succeeded in realizing money by is to be considered as income to the extent that it is worth more than the property disposed of. I think that object would be accomplished by amending the section so as to strike out the words "also all," in line seven hundred and sixty-eight, and insert the word "received," after "premium," and then it would read:

That income derived from interest upon notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, and premiums received on gold and coupons shall be included in estimating incomes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose he does not receive a premium, but keeps the gold?

Mr. JOHNSON. Then he ought not to pay. You ought not to charge him a tax on what he does not get.

Mr. SHERMAN. Suppose he receives the gold and puts it in his pocket to hoard it. That is the very thing we object to. He then receives the income in that which is better than United States currency. If he was compelled to sell the gold you would tax the premium he received on it; but now you say, if he is able to hoard the gold you will not tax it.

Mr. JOHNSON. But you propose to consider it as income. Is it income? My friend from New York will permit me again to use his name. Suppose on to-morrow morning he receives in gold $10,000. That is income, and you tax it as such, but the Senator from Ohio wants to tax it as $15,000 or $20,000. My friend from New York puts that gold in his pocket. Whenever he sells it, if he sells it for more than $10,000, he makes the difference between the $10,000 and what he gets for it; but suppose he keeps it until the $10,000 in gold is only worth $10,000 in currency, you still tax him on the assumption that he has actually received the difference between $10,000 in gold and $20,000 measured in currency. That does not seem to me to be fair. You may tax him on the $10,000, because he owns $10,000, but it is proposed to tax him as having in his hands property in fact worth $20,000. I say you cannot call it income until he realizes by a sale of the gold.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If I understand what the chairman of the Committee on Finance desires, I think an amendment which I have drawn up will meet it. It is to insert after the word "also," these words, "the difference between the standard value of gold and coupons on the day the same are received and their current value in lawful money at the same time." The difference between them at that time, if I understand it, is what the Senator from Ohio wishes to get at. If a man receives the gold and hoards it up, let him be taxed on that; hold out some inducement to him not to do that. It is the very thing we want him not to do.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think those words would answer the purpose the same as the amendment I proposed. I have no choice as to the language, but am willing to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GRIMES. We are legislating now about the income tax. Is it pretended that a man derives income from gold which he holds in his pocket, any more than I do who hold real estate which I do not choose to part with, anticipating a rise? How could you tax me for income on such real estate?

Mr. SHERMAN. It only applies to gold received on bonds of the United States. I think the words I have already proposed will cover the whole matter.

Mr. GRIMES. The truth is, the committee had it right in the start, when they provided that all premiums on gold and coupons should be included in estimating income. That is the way the committee reported it, and that is the way it ought to stand. Now, it seems that some gentlemen are desirous to reach the gold in the hands of the parties, if they see fit to hold on to it and not to sell it. They have a right to hold on to it and not to part with it. If I own real estate, or any other unproductive property, I may hold on to it; but the moment I part with it, and the moment a man parts with the gold, the profit derived becomes a part of the income, and is liable to taxation.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member will permit me to say that is not what the committee did mean. The committee meant to tax the difference between the actual and nominal value of the gold. I think with him that the increased value of the gold in currency cannot be considered as income until the gold has been sold and the difference has been received. The word "premium," as used by the committee, as I understood the chairman, was intended to be considered as including the actual difference.

Mr. GRIMES. I would not undertake to say what the committee meant, but I know that no other construction can be put on this language legally than that it means the premiums actually received on gold and coupons.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is the construction I put on it.

Mr. COLLAMER. Is it really intended to count as income what a man would make if he did sell his gold?

Several SENATORS. Yes, that is it.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then why not tax a man on what he would have made if he had sold his horse?

Mr. SHERMAN. We still look on gold as money; that is the difference. We do not look on a horse, yet, as money. We have two kinds of money, gold and paper money. We pay gold for interest, and it is received; and now we propose to require the person who receives it either to pay his income tax in the kind of money he receives or else to make up the difference in case he pays it in a depreciated currency.

Mr. COLLAMER. It amounts to this, after all, that you tax a man for that which he might have made with his gold if he chose to sell it instead of keeping it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Under the amendment now moved he has not the right to pay in gold.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then that is entirely a misrepresentation. There is no provision in the law that a man may pay his tax in gold at a less sum.

Mr. SHERMAN. I assure the honorable Senator that no assessor or collector would object to taking it in gold.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not want any experiment of that kind. I object to considering as income that which you say a man might have made if he pleased to do what he did not do.

Mr. HOWE. I have listened to the very animated colloquy on the other side of the Chamber as intently as I could, and I have been a good deal interested in it. I have not been able yet to hear any proposition which to my mind bettered much the recommendation of the committee, and until I hear a better one I am inclined to stand by that. It is very evident that if the interest which is paid on the Government securities in gold is worth any more than its nominal sum you must tax it whether it is converted or not. If you adopt these suggestions that you will only tax the premium when it is actually received, it is very evident that no premium will ever be actually received because the man who is paid $1,000 in gold to-day as his interest, never will exchange it for paper, but he will pay it out for some property or merchandise, and he will buy twice as much with it as he would buy with the same amount in paper; and he will turn the property, the merchandise, the wheat, the flour, whatever he buys with it, into paper whenever he wants to do so. There will be no exchange of gold for paper thereafter. I think the language as it stands will reach all premiums received on gold, and all premiums earned on gold or coupons, and I am willing to stand by the language of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw my amendment. I believe, myself, it is better to adhere to that which has been fully considered by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand that while I was necessarily absent there was passed over an amendment in relation to savings banks. I ask that that be now acted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will now return to the amendment referred to, which is to insert after line seven hundred and thirty-five, the following:

That section one hundred and ten be amended by striking out after the words "and redemption thereof," the words "nor to any savings bank having no capital stock, and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same on interest for the benefit of depositors only, and which do no other business of banking."

Mr. COLLAMER. At the last session of Congress I occupied somewhat the attention of the Senate in relation to this subject, and the Senate at that time by a very decisive vote, notwithstanding the objection of the Senator from Ohio, adopted the qualification and exception which is now by this amendment proposed to be stricken out. The House of Representatives have done nothing with it, but the committee of the Senate proposed to strike out the exception. I should be pleased to hear what is the occasion of the alteration now proposed, and why it is now proposed. The Senate passed upon it at the last session and very decisively.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was in hopes that I should be able to give the Senate the statistics that I have been endeavoring to get in regard to savings banks, but I find it very difficult to get at them except from the reports of the different States, and I will state them as near as I can in round numbers, and if I am incorrect the Senators representing those States can make the correction probably. I had a statement prepared a year ago, I think, but I have not been able now to find it. The amount of deposits in the savings banks in the State of New York, if I remember right, was placed at $108,000,000. The amount in Massachusetts was over fifty millions, and in the other States of New England not so large, but considerable. The whole aggregate of deposits in the savings banks in New York and New England was something over two million dollars if I recollect aright, and I think I am not mistaken, though in the absence of statistics I cannot say positively.

Probably most of this money is made up of the deposits of poor people, especially in portions of New England described by the Senator from Vermont, but a considerable portion of it, especially in the cities, consists of the deposits of people well able to bear taxes upon their income. The total aggregate was so large, and the subject was so fair and so just an object of taxation to my mind, that I believed there was no reason for making the exception. In the State of Ohio, for instance, our people generally, poor and rich, deposit in our ordinary banks. Sometimes they allow interest on those deposits as savings banks do. I believe we have no savings banks, so called, in the State of Ohio, and I am not aware that there are any through the Northwest to any considerable extent; there may be one or two at Chicago. The deposits are made in ordinary banks. I look upon a savings bank precisely like any other bank of deposit. I know of no difference. The difference in their organization is not a reason for a difference in the mode of taxation. A savings bank in New England, described in this section, is one that receives deposits for the benefit of the depositors. An ordinary bank receives deposits for the benefit of its stockholders, and a trust company receives deposits for loan and for the benefit of the stockholders. All of them receive deposits to make money upon for the benefit of somebody, either the depositors themselves or the stockholders engaged in the bank. In principle I cannot see any distinction or difference between them. It seems to me, therefore, that a tax of one half of one per cent. a year on the amount of these deposits is not an unreasonable contribution on their part toward the wants of the country.

Mr. COLLAMER. These banks do not have either capital or circulation.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance discussed the matter very fully, and we concluded that this class of deposits should pay the tax imposed on other deposits in banks—one twenty-fourth of one per cent. each month on the average amount of money subject to check or draft. The tax on deposits in ordinary banks is one half per cent. a year, and the same tax applied to savings banks would yield us $1,000,000 revenue and would not be oppressive to any single individual. I have no doubt that the tax would not be felt even by a single depositor, and the cry of opposition I do not believe would come up from the laboring men of New England.

We are compelled to resort to almost every expedient for taxation; and to make an exception in favor of this class of deposits, an exception that costs us $1,000,000 a year, seems to me without foundation in principle or in reason. Hence when this subject was brought before us again in this bill, we felt it our duty to report a repeal of the exception.

I cannot now state any other reasons than those I have given. At the last session of Congress we excepted from the operation of the tax the deposits of savings banks, and thus lost to the Government revenue $1,000,000. Perhaps Senators may say that the class of savings banks in many of the cities, in New York, for instance, are not the class intended to be described in the exception which has been made, but the practical effect has been to deny us any revenue from any banks which are called savings banks, and if Senators will look to the returns from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, they will see that there are no returns of deposits from any bank in the United States called a savings bank—none that I have been able to find, so that the practical effect of this exception is to lose us $1,000,000 without any good reason.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. There is a distinction, and a very marked one, between the deposits of savings banks and trust companies and those of ordinary banks. We all know that on the amount of deposits in an ordinary bank no interest is paid by the bank, but on the contrary the bank uses those deposits as capital, and on them makes its profits. The contrary is the case with savings banks and trust companies. For every dollar they receive they pay interest at a given rate; and in the case of savings banks which are mentioned in the present law, and which provision was framed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] at the last session, it is intended to be confined strictly to those of an eleemosynary character which never expect to make one dollar out of the deposits for those concerned in the institution.

It is the same with trust companies. For every dollar they receive they pay interest. That interest so paid by the trust company or the savings bank enters into the income of somebody and is there taxed, and in that way it is reached and pays perhaps the full half per cent that is endeavored to be thrown upon it here. The trust companies and perhaps the saving banks themselves generally keep a bank account. They pay out no money at their own counters on checks or drafts, but draw checks themselves on ordinary banks in which they deposit their money. With trust companies generally the money is not payable without five days' notice, and except for the sums of small depositors deposited with that understanding the savings banks do not pay out money except on reasonable notice.

I contend, therefore, that there is a marked distinction between the cases. Alluding to the principle which has been spoken of here, that the desire is to make these taxes equal in their burden on different classes of the community, it seems to me that to tax these deposits is imposing an unjust tax, because the same amount is taxed twice. The depositors receive their interest or their dividends, and in one shape or other the money is already taxed, and to an amount perhaps equal to that now proposed to be imposed.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President—

Mr. GRIMES. With the consent of the Senator from Vermont, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. There are many messages that ought to be referred and some reports that ought to be made.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 772) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions; and they were then signed by the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866;

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 112) for the relief of James B. Royce; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) authorizing a contract with William H. Powell for a picture for the Capitol.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 772) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the Senate took a recess till seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate resumed its session at seven o'clock, p. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 23d instant, General Order No. 23, issued by Major General Banks at New Orleans, February 3, 1864; which was ordered to be printed, and to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a report from the Attorney General, giving a statement of counsel fees paid by his Department; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to make a report from a conference committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will it give rise to debate?

Mr. WILSON. I cannot tell, but I hope not. Mr. SHERMAN. It may be received informally. If it is a question that will give rise to debate, it will displace our business.

Mr. HALE. I think it will give rise to debate.

Mr. WILSON. I shall agree that it be laid over if it leads to debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. With that understanding I have no objection to the report being received.

Mr. WILSON. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes—

Mr. DAVIS. The subject had better be announced.

Mr. WILSON. I am just about announcing it. The committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 51) to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs having met, after full and free conference do agree to recommend to their respective Houses as follows—

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the reception of that report at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator means to the consideration of it.

Mr. DAVIS. To the consideration.

Mr. WILSON. If it is to lead to debate I should be very glad to have it printed, so that we can understand it.

The report was ordered to be printed. It is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 51) entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their amendment to the said bill, and the committee agree to the following as a substitute:

An act to establish a Bureau for the Relief of Freedmen and Refugees.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby established in the War Department, to continue during the present war of rebellion, and for one year thereafter, a Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands, to which shall be committed, as hereinafter provided, the supervision and management of all abandoned lands, and the control of all subjects relating to refugees and freedmen from rebel States, or from any district of country within the territory embraced in the operations of the Army, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the head of the bureau and approved by the President. The said bureau shall be under the management and control of a Commissioner, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, whose compensation shall be $3,000 per annum, and such number of clerks as may be assigned to him by the Secretary of War, not exceeding one chief clerk, two of the fourth class, two of the third class, three of the second class, and five of the first class. And the Commissioner and all persons appointed under this act shall, before entering upon their duties, take the oath of office prescribed in an act entitled, "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862. And the Commissioner and the chief clerk shall, before entering upon their duties, give bonds to the Treasurer of the United States, the former in the sum of $50,000 and the latter in the sum of $10,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of their duties respectively, with securities to be approved as sufficient by the Attorney General, which bonds shall be filed in the office of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, to be by him put in suit for the benefit of any injured party, upon any breach of the conditions thereof.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War may direct such issues of provisions, clothing, and fuel as he may deem needful for the immediate and temporary shelter and supply of destitute and suffering refugees and freedmen, and their wives and children, under such rules and regulations as he may direct.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the President may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint an assistant commissioner for each of the States declared to be in insurrection, not exceeding ten in number, who shall, under the direction of the Commissioner, aid in the execution of the provisions of this act; and he shall give a bond to the Treasurer of the United States in the sum of $20,000, in the form and manner prescribed in the first section of this act. Each of said assistant commissioners shall receive an annual salary of $2,500, in full compensation for all his services. And any military officer may be detailed and assigned to duty under this act without increase of pay or allowances. The Commissioner shall, before the commencement of each regular session of Congress, make full report of his proceedings, with exhibits of the state of his accounts, to the President, who shall communicate the same to Congress, and shall also make special reports whenever required to do so by the President or either House of Congress. And the assistant commissioners shall make quarterly reports of their proceedings to the Commissioner, and also such other special reports as from time to time may be required.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner, under the direction of the President, shall have authority to set apart for the use of loyal refugees and freedmen such tracts of land within the insurrectionary States as shall have been abandoned, or to which the United States shall have acquired title by confiscation, or sale, or otherwise. And to every male citizen, whether refugee or freedman, as aforesaid, there shall be assigned not more than forty acres of such land, and the person to whom it is so assigned shall be protected in the use and enjoyment of the land for the term of three years, at an annual rent not exceeding six per cent. upon the value of said land as it was appraised by the State authorities in 1860, for the purpose of taxation, and in case no such appraisal can be found, then the rental shall be based upon the estimated value of the land in said year, to be ascertained in such manner as the Commissioner may, by regulation, prescribe. At the end of said term or at any time during said term, the occupants of any parcels so assigned may purchase the land and receive such title thereto as the United States can convey upon paying therefor the value of the land, as ascertained and fixed for the purpose of determining the annual rent as aforesaid.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

HENRY WILSON,

JAMES HARLAN,

W. T. WILLEY,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

ROBERT C. SCHENCK,

JAMES S. ROLLINS,

Managers on the part of the House.

GOVERNMENT WHARF AT BATH.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senate to take up a very small bill, which will not occupy any time; it is Senate bill No. 318, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury either to repair certain property or sell it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 318) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to sell certain property of the United States when no longer required for the public service. The bill, as introduced, provided that in all cases where custom-houses, wharves, docks, marine hospitals, with the ground whereon they are built, and other property of the United States, under the supervision, direction, and control of the Secretary of the Treasury, and not connected with the military or naval establishment, shall be no longer used or required for the public service, the Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of the President of the United States, may cause the same to be sold, at public auction or upon advertisement and proposals, for the best price that can be obtained therefor, and, upon payment of the consideration into the Treasury of the United States, make, execute, and deliver all needful or proper conveyances thereof.

The Committee on Commerce had reported the bill with an amendment, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to lease the wharf property belonging to the United States situated at Bath, in the State of Maine, for a term of years, the lessee making all repairs thereupon; or he may sell the same at his discretion if it is no longer in use or required for the public service, and he is hereby authorized to make, execute, and deliver all needful conveyances to the purchaser or purchasers thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed. Its title was amended so as to read, "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to lease or sell certain property of the United States situated at Bath, in the State of Maine."

SWORD TO CAPTAIN STELLWAGEN.

Mr. SUMNER. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred a message from the President, transmitting correspondence in relation to the presentation of a sword to Captain Henry S. Stellwagen, have directed me to report a resolution authorizing the acceptance. I ask the action of the Senate on it now, as it is a resolution of course.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to say that there is the post route bill, that every man in the Senate wants passed, and I presume there is no objection to it.

Mr. SUMNER. I know there is to be debate on that. I happen to know it.

Mr. COLLAMER. On the post route bill?

Mr. SUMNER. Yes; it is so.

Mr. COLLAMER. I never heard of such a thing.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will know it when the bill comes up. The Camden and Amboy railroad matter will be discussed on it.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is not on it.

Mr. SUMNER. It is to be put on.

The joint resolution (S. R. No. 128) authorizing the acceptance of a sword of honor from the Government of Great Britain by Captain Henry S. Stellwagen, of the United States Navy, was read three times, and passed. The sword was presented by the Government of Great Britain as a mark of their gratitude for the assistance rendered by Captain Stellwagen while in command of the frigate Constellation to the British brigantine Mersey, when in a disabled condition.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to call up House bill No. 774, the post route bill.

Mr. SUMNER. There will be a division on that, and a debate.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand that there is not any objection to anything there is in the bill. I presume the gentleman will say that.

Mr. SUMNER. I raise no objection to that.

Mr. COLLAMER. There is no objection to anything there is in the bill. Any bill can be made debatable and disputable by trying to put on it something that does not belong to it. I understand from the intimation thrown out that it is to be proposed to attach to the bill the measure which is known as the New Jersey railroad bill. Every railroad in America is already a post route. Putting that on this bill does not affect it one way or the other.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent to consider the bill he has named. Is there any objection?

Mr. SHERMAN. In view of the declaration already made I feel it my duty to object. I have not the slightest objection to the bill of the honorable Senator, but I know the power that any Senator may now exercise if he chooses.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senator from Massachusetts may make every bill before the body disputable in that way.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me say to the Senator that it has been the purpose of Senators here now for weeks, if the bill that has been passed by the House of Representatives should be baffled in the Senate so that we should be unable to get a vote on it, to attach it to the post route bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. Why not propose to attach it to an appropriation bill?

Mr. SUMNER. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." The first proposition is to attach it to the post route bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. That very road is a post route already. Every railroad in the country is now a post road. I move that the pending bill be informally laid aside for the purpose of taking up the post route bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont moves to postpone informally the pending question for the purpose of taking up the bill which he has indicated.

Mr. SHERMAN. That "informally" means nothing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand such a motion. It is the first time he ever heard it in the Senate. Things are informally done by unanimous consent. The formal motion will be to postpone the pending question.

Mr. SHERMAN. The honorable Senator makes a motion, but he says he does it informally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it could be done informally it would be in the power of the Senator from Ohio to call up the pending bill at any moment.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as I am concerned, I am willing that the post route bill shall be taken up informally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is what the Chair just asked if there was any objection to.

Mr. FOOT. The purport of the motion is simply this, that my colleague asks unanimous consent to take up and consider at this time the post route bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has so stated, and has also stated to the Senator from Ohio that if it be taken up in that way it will be within his power at any time to call up the tax bill, which is the regular order of business. Is there any objection?

Mr. SUMNER. I must object, and I do it simply on the ground that I know there are Senators interested in the question who are not here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If objected to it cannot be done.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put upon its passage the bill to provide for the publication of the opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States.

Mr. COLLAMER. I object to it utterly, and to all other bills. I object to everything.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill which was pending when the recess was taken.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to postpone the consideration of the pending bill that we may get to the bill indicated by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

Mr. CONNESS. The Senator from Ohio will excuse me for an instant. The motion shall not be in his way. I believe I am in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is in order.

Mr. CONNESS. A very extraordinary circumstance to my mind has occurred. The chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads rises to present the annual post route bill for consideration. Nearly every Senator has amendments to offer to that bill which deeply concern his people. My friend from Massachusetts rises and prevents the consideration of that bill by threatening to offer to it as an amendment a pending bill concerning what is called the New Jersey monopoly. Now, I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I had intended to vote with him on that bill, but I shall not be alone, I undertake to say, in voting against it in any form hereafter in which it shall come before this body while such a course as this is being pursued. If there is one legitimate bill for this body to consider in the remaining hours that are left, it is the bill named by the honorable Senator from Vermont; I mean, of course, giving place to tax bills. I am grieved and pained that a threat to attach another bill to it shall be made and then an objection based upon that. It is a course of proceeding according to which we can do no business in this body, because, like the Senator from Vermont, I shall object to any and every bill, and particularly those which come from my friend from Massachusetts, if he pursues this course, and vote against his monopoly bill in any and every shape in which it shall be considered. Now, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator will discharge his duties as he—

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question before the Senate except the pending bill.

Mr. SUMNER. I have to remark on that—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator cannot by way of reply to another question.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I move to postpone that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now the Senator is in order.

Mr. SUMNER. I was merely going to say that the Senator from California will discharge his duties as a Senator on this floor as to his conscience seems best, and I shall discharge mine as to my conscience seems best. I now withdraw the motion.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, to insert after line seven hundred and thirty-five, on page 31, the following:

"That section one hundred and ten be amended by striking out after the words 'and redemption thereof' the words 'nor to any savings bank having no capital stock, and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same on interest for the benefit of the depositors only, and which do no other business of banking.'"

Mr. COLLAMER. The honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance [Mr. SHERMAN] has a manner of talking about this subject of savings banks that strikes me very strangely, but after all, I suppose it can be easily accounted for in the aspect in which he views the subject. He says that we have lost I do not know how much, but I believe he indicated $1,000,000, by not taxing these institutions. It reminds me very much of a neighbor of mine who lost $500 last year by not having any wheat to sell. [Laughter.] Most men have lost money in that way; and that is the way we have lost $1,000,000, by not stealing it. That is a mere form of expression, but it is an imposing form.

The chairman of the committee gave us a statement of the amount of money deposited in the savings banks in New York and New England, for savings banks of the kind and character of which we are talking are almost entirely confined to those States. I know that there are nominally savings banks, so called, in different States at the West, but they are institutions with stockholders just like any other banks, and they take this name because it is a popular name. I desire gentlemen to remember that the savings banks about which we are talking are described as "savings banks having no capital stock, and whose business is confined to receiving deposits and loaning the same on interest for the benefit of the depositors only, and which do no other business of banking;" that is, do no banking business. That is the species of institution about which we are talking. The chairman says that in these savings banks even of this character in the State of New York there are a little over one hundred millions, and in Massachusetts about fifty millions, and in the other New England States less, but the amount in all is $200,000,000. Probably that is rather a large estimate; but put it at that. That is a very large sum of money, it is true, but to whom does it belong? To between seven and eight million people, and it does not amount to twenty-five dollars apiece. All there is of it divided among the people of those States where the savings banks exist, would not reach twenty-five dollars apiece, so that the amount is not really very surprising. It is no very large sum of money compared with the number of people who own it.

It is not, to be sure, to be expected that I can convince a man of the chairman's intelligence of a distinction between these banks and other banks, when he says that he cannot comprehend that there is any. If he cannot comprehend it, it is utterly vain for me to labor with him. The distinction was very well described and defined by the honorable Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. VAN WINKLE,] just before the recess. All other banks receive deposits, and the deposits which they receive and on which they are taxed they use to make money for the bank, for the corporation, for the stockholders. That is invariably the case in regard to deposits in other banks; but these savings banks have no capital stock, have no stockholders, do not make anything for any corporation. The very terms defining them show that they are confined simply to taking money from people who earn small sums and let it out for them better than they can do for themselves. That is all there is of it.

Whatever money is made goes to those people who deposit, and whatever is lost is lost by them; the bank does not lose anything. Some of our ordinary banks receive deposits and allow some interest to the depositors, but it is immaterial in that case whether the bank loses or gains, it pays what it agrees to pay and the profit or loss beyond that is for the stockholders. Most of our banks pay nothing on deposits. They are taken for the convenience of depositors and for the profit of the bank.

If the word "bank" had not been used in naming these savings institutions I hardly think anybody would have ever dreamed of putting them on the foundation of banks; I hardly think it would have excited the cupidity of the most vigilant who were looking for opportunities to get money. It is very unfortunate for these institutions that the word "bank" has been used. The moment that word "bank" is heard certain ears are erect at once and the idea is, what is to be made out of a bank in order to give an advantage to the great nation?

Mr. President, there is one leading feature in our system which we have been desirous as far as possible to retain, and that is, that we should not tax people upon income who had no income that did not exceed $600. I am not tenacious about the amount of $600 particularly. If you put it at $300 or $400, it would be all the same in my mind. I refer to it to show that it was not intended to go down to low-water mark in taxing the incomes of people; that the poor people were not to be taxed. If $600 is too large an exemption, reduce it. I am not now talking about the evasions of which the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] has several times spoken, and perhaps very correctly. He thinks the law should be better executed, and the work more thoroughly done. I thought so too. I think it has been evaded, but I think there is somewhere a point, without now deciding where it is, below which we should not go.

Well, sir, what is the effect of this taxation? Here are little savings banks, say in New England. There are the operatives in our factories. I know that a good part of the honorable Senators who are now listening to me hardly know what that word means. They are an order of people not known among them, but they are a very large number of people in point of numbers in New England, and New York, and Pennsylvania, and are getting to be somewhat numerous in Ohio. These laboring people, men and women, for there are many females among them, earn a little beyond their immediate necessities, say fifty dollars in a year; some of the men lay by $100 in a year, and they put by that little saving in the savings bank. They do not put it all in at once, but at intervals during the year. I believe there is one of the savings banks in the city of Boston which is called the Ten Cent Savings Bank, taking deposits as low as ten cents. I am told there is one in New Hampshire which receives deposits of five cents, so as to reach even the savings of children, the little presents that are given them which they may deposit there. Here is a female or a laboring man who has saved fifty dollars or $100 in the course of a year besides the actual cost of living from day to day. That female, we will say, lives in Manchester, New Hampshire, and she goes to my brother CLARK and deposits with him her money to take care of it for her, and he lends it out on what he judges good security for her. Mr. CLARK does that business as a mere charity, getting nothing whatever for it, and now you propose to say to him that before he shall pay over to her the six dollars interest on her $100 for a year, if he can get that much interest on it, from a Government bond perhaps, thirty-six cents shall be deducted out of that six dollars and paid over to the Treasury of the United States year by year. Is not that going down below low-water mark? Is not that a violation clearly of the general principle that the incomes of poor people shall not be taxed? Is it not a violation of the principle on which your $600 exemption rests? Many of these people after supporting themselves from week to week and year to year have not even $300 or $500, and yet it is proposed to say that they shall pay this income tax. If they lend the money themselves they do not pay it, but if they employ the trustees of a savings bank to lend it for them they shall pay it. *Notwithstanding the professions of the honorable Senator from Ohio as to his inability to comprehend the distinction, I am pretty sure that a large part of the Senate is capable of understanding the difference between that and an ordinary bank, and it is very appreciable to those who desire to understand it. If these poor people have got to pay over one fifth or one sixth part of their interest before they can get it, the payment of interest to the depositors ceases in all our country savings banks at any rate. I do not see why it will not be the end of them all if they have got to give a fifth to the Government. Generally speaking, in these savings banks, after paying the treasurer, and that is about the only expense they have except office room, they divide about five per cent. or sometimes four per cent., I do not know of any that ever get above five per cent., and they have no expense except an office room and the small allowance to the treasurer for his trouble in negotiating the money. If you impose this tax on them the institutions must of course close up. They cannot exist if you require them to give up one fifth part of the income to the Government before they can let these poor people have the interest they get for them. They must return them the money to do the best they can with it themselves.

What good will it do, what benefit will it be, to have these institutions wind up their business? They are mere charities. They are altogether eleemosynary. I do not know how it may look to other gentlemen, but it seems to me that you might as well undertake to levy a tax upon the contribution box of the poor, or the contributions made at the sanitary fairs. There is money there, and if all you want is to get hold of money why not seize on that? I think I could point out to the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee a great many subjects which are legitimate objects of taxation, and which would not be obnoxious at least to the objection of grinding the face of the poor. I would ask why it is that we have lost $10,000,000 by not taxing the farm stock in this country? We have not taxed the horses, the cattle, the sheep "upon a thousand hills" in Ohio. We have lost millions of dollars, then, according to the Senator's argument, by not taxing the stock. We have not taxed the machinery in the factories, and instead of there being $200,000,000 worth of it I undertake to say there is a hundred times that. Does not the honorable Senator believe there is and has been all the while a large body of hoarded gold in this country in the hands of the people? We all know that there are a good many millions. Is there any attempt to tax it? I have not seen any or heard of any. How will you find it? Make a man disclose it just as you make him disclose his income. Whether the men who have hoarded it have lost money or made money is not very material. Then there is the whole land, all the real estate of the country with no tax on it. Why not tax that?

I know not, looking about, why we shall be neglecting great matters and attending to these small items. It seems to me, as I have said, coming down below low-water mark. I will not take up the time of the Senate. Perhaps it is best to levy contributions on the bread at the sanctuary and everything of that kind, especially if it goes to the poor.

Mr. SHERMAN. We tax plate used for religious purposes.

Mr. COLLAMER. You do not tax the Eucharist of the church, or anything contributed for the poor except in this particular.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is very easy to make a tax obnoxious by selecting particular cases and showing their hardships. The Senate probably will remember the celebrated production of Sydney Smith, ridiculing the taxation of Great Britain, and the remark of an eminent speaker in Great Britain who described the process of taxation and said that an Englishman was born to be taxed, lived to be taxed, and died to be taxed. I can select any tax in this bill and show by the same character of argument which the Senator from Vermont uses that it is most terribly oppressive. We levy a tax on shoes. The ragged urchins whom we pass daily on the streets on our road to the Capitol have to pay taxes to the Government on the shoes they wear. I might show that such a tax as that is oppressive, odious, infamous; that a great Government like ours ought not to tax these poor people by levying a contribution on their shoes and their clothing. In the same way I might show that all these taxes are odious.

Why, sir, the food that feeds the poor people of Massachusetts, the operatives who deposit their earnings in these savings banks, is taxed on its way from the plains of Ohio to Massachusetts. Why add to the price of the food of the poor operatives of Massachusetts and of New England a little miserable dole of taxation, and take from the price of their wages by levying a tax of three per cent. on transportation?

The Senator should have considered, on the other hand, that wealthy men in New York and Boston, desiring to use their money rapidly, or having no immediate use for it, frequently deposit for a time in a savings bank $1,000, $2,000, or $5,000, and if this exception is made they are not taxed at all. Why does not the Senator take the other extreme case of a man who having $20,000 on his hands wishing to draw interest on it and yet to have it where he can withdraw it when he desires it, deposits it in a savings bank. The savings banks receive the deposits of the rich as well as the earnings of the poor—perhaps to not so general an extent as other banks, but there is nothing to prevent it. I have been told of cases where they do.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to interrupt the Senator to say to him that my experience is entirely different from that. The charters of the savings banks in New England generally limit the amount which shall be received, and so far as my experience is concerned, and it extends to a number of them, they do not receive deposits over $100, and the new banks that are formed do not go beyond $500.

Mr. SHERMAN. But how often do they receive deposits of $100 from the same individual? Does my honorable friend mean that any one depositor's account cannot exceed $100?

Mr. SPRAGUE. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. I warrant you the savings banks of that kind are comparatively few.

Mr. POMEROY. Except them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should be willing to except them, although I do not like to make exceptions in the tax bill. My honorable friend from Vermont rather makes fun of me on that account. I am perfectly willing to except those banks who receive no deposits except the simple earnings of the poor people that he talks about. If they limited their deposits on hand from any one depositor to $100, I certainly would not follow such deposits; but that is not the case. The Senator, in order to make a hard showing and a hard case, makes an exaggerated statement, and thus seeks to deter us from imposing this tax. There is not a bank in the United States that might not make the same showing. I know of people who own stock in banks, that have but $1,000 or $2,000, and they live upon that little saving perhaps of a deceased husband or a dead father. My honorable friend has no objection to levying a tax upon the dividends, upon the deposits, and upon the circulation of a bank that husbands the resources of the widow and the orphan.

Mr. COLLAMER. I never said that.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, but you might take any bank in the United States, and those banks are generally the depositories of the earnings of the people, and you may find in every bank as a stockholder a widow who depends upon the dividends of that bank for her daily bread. You may find in it the deposits of the orphan, and if you take these extreme cases you might show that every tax upon your statute-book is oppressive. But, Mr. President, that is not the way to discuss this question. My honorable friend did it at the last session, and almost moved my heart for the poor people of Vermont, and I say now that if this tax did not reach anybody but those poor people I should be the last to lay the hand of oppression upon them; but I know that under this exemption many others escape.

But my honorable friend said we have other sources of taxation, and I listened to him in the hope that he might open up to us some rich fountains on which we might lay some of the burdens. He asks, why not tax land? Why, Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States answers that question. If it were not for that provision of the Constitution which requires direct taxes to be apportioned among the States, lands and all kinds of property, including horses and cattle on the hills of Ohio, would have been taxed long ago.

Mr. COLLAMER. That direct tax clause does not cover any personal property. That has been decided by the Supreme Court over and over again.

Mr. SHERMAN. I doubt very much whether that has been decided in the case referred to. Land at any rate cannot be taxed unless by apportionment. The honorable Senator agrees to that; and that principle was extended to slaves, at least by the declaration of the judges; but my own impression is that any direct tax of that kind (although I will not go into the argument) must be apportioned among the States. Take the case of land. Why not tax land? The answer is obvious that we can only tax land by apportioning it among the States; and what then? The State of Rhode Island, with her accumulated wealth and vast resources, with her factories and ships piled mountain high in that rich State, would not pay one fifth of the tax that the poor State of Iowa would. A tax that would be oppressive to the last degree in one of the new States would not bear the weight of a finger on the State of Rhode Island; and so of other States. The State that I represent is so fortunately situated, wealth has now so accumulated in that State, that we could bear a direct tax; and so far as my constituents are concerned they are perfectly willing to bear any form of tax, direct or indirect; but it was not so forty years ago, and a direct tax levied on the State of Ohio after the war of 1812 would have crippled the credit of that State.

Mr. COLLAMER. We levied it for three years afterward.

Mr. SHERMAN. But it was regarded as oppressive and soon repealed, while the excise law was continued for some time. So with machinery. The honorable Senator says we do not tax machinery; but we tax the product of machinery, every bit of it. We do not propose to tax the savings bank but to tax the product of the savings bank, the profit made out of it, and that is all; the deposit in the savings bank, the result of the savings bank. Why not tax gold? I ask the honorable Senator if he would propose to tax gold to thus drive it out of our country? Gold is one of those articles the most heavy and yet the most volatile of any in the world; it is lighter than gas and more timid than a woman, and yet the heaviest of metals. A tax upon gold would drive it out of our country as rapidly as our boats could carry it. Therefore, no one has proposed to tax gold. The result of such a tax would be that gold, being in itself movable and easily transported, would be deposited in the banks of Europe and left there as a safe deposit for future use. A tax on gold has never been proposed by any one.

But it is not sufficient to say that there are other sources of taxation. We come back to this. Here is an exception made from all other banking institutions, an exception which I think is not founded on principle, and which I think ought to be repealed; and here allow me to say that I would not have introduced this question again this year, but we were compelled to consider it for this reason: the trust companies of the city of New York, by a very intelligent gentleman, came to us and represented that they were on the same footing that savings banks were, that they deposited their money in other banks, that although they were stock institutions and received their dividends, they ought not to be taxed, and they demanded to be included in the same exception as savings banks. We found that this exception would make demands from other corporations, and that we either had to make one general rule applicable to all, or we had to have a perpetual struggle with other institutions to come within the exception of savings banks. With considerable hesitation, but after much reflection, we concluded it was wiser and best to remove the exception. I am perfectly willing to take the vote of the Senate and abide their action on it without further debate.

Mr. FOSTER. I have received within a day or two a letter from a very intelligent, practical man on this subject in my State, from which I will read a very few words, with the permission of the Senate:

"I believe for the greater part of the moneys in savings banks are the hard earnings of women without protection, superannuated persons, and young girls and boys."

He then goes on to state a few cases with which he is acquainted:

"A widow lady has about three hundred dollars in our savings bank; an old lady has about the same sum, and a young man, who is non compos mentis, $300 more, making $900, the interest on which, at five and a half per cent. per annum, the amount paid by the bank, is $49.50. From that is deducted the national tax of five per cent. on dividends, and the State tax of three fourths of one per cent. on the capital, making $9.22, which leaves from the income of the $900, $40.28, which is four and a half per cent. net to the individuals."

It is proposed by the honorable Senator from Ohio to reduce that little pittance below the four and a half per cent. which these people now receive. My friend then adds:

"These three persons pay a greater sum of direct tax to the General Government than all the farmers in this town."

And the town where this letter is written would not be a rich agricultural town in Ohio, but it is a rich agricultural town in Connecticut, one of our best townships of land; and these three persons pay now, as he says, a larger direct tax to the General Government than all the farmers in the town, for they pay none at all.

Mr. SUMNER. I also have received a letter from a practical person, dated as late as February 25, and I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to it. It is from one of the collectors of the internal revenue in Massachusetts, as familiar with the sources of taxation as anybody in the State. He has been astonished at what he read in the newspapers of the proposition of my friend from Ohio, and writes to protest against it. He concurs with the Senator from Vermont with regard to the character of these institutions. He writes as follows on that point:

"These savings banks are charities conducted by trustees, without pay or reward, enabling people from their small earnings to safely save small sums, which, aggregated, are at least one half invested in Government loans."

He then says:

"If it is supposed that by this repeal the deposits in savings banks will be diverted into Government securities, the answer is that now at least one half of the deposits of these banks are already so invested. This tax upon them will prove their annihilation, and the course must be to wind them up and either sell these securities in competition with the Government or divide them among depositors. It will work no new investment in Government loans, even if any of them can stand this tax. To state the proposition is to refute its policy. They can receive for interest but six per cent.; the State tax is already three fourths of one per cent.; the United States tax on dividends is five per cent.; and the income tax, I think, one fourth of one per cent. more. Then this additional tax makes four per cent. There is left to depositors only two per cent. Every savings bank in this State, and I believe, throughout the country, must necessarily close its doors if that proviso in the one hundred and tenth section is repealed."

That is a complete answer to the speech of my friend from Ohio; but he will pardon me if I expose in one word the fallacy of his argument. He assumed that the savings banks were something which they are not. He assumed that they were like a trust company, that they were like any other bank or any other corporation. They are not. My honorable friend from Vermont emphatically testified to that when he designated them so completely as charities that you might as well undertake to tax the Eucharist itself as to tax them. When you tax savings banks you tax a charity, you tax the poor, and the poor exclusively. Your tax is not general, applicable to the rich and the poor and that large intermediate class between the rich and the poor, which is the case with all other points of taxation, but it is a tax that strikes absolutely and exclusively the poor.

My honorable friend from Ohio said that the poor boy on his way to school must stop to get his pair of shoes, and he might not have the money to buy them, and yet he must pay the tax on those shoes. But, sir, there was the fallacy in the illustration of my honorable friend. The tax on shoes is a tax equally on rich and poor. Every man wears shoes, and every man therefore pays the tax on shoes, and we all know that it is one of the incidents of life, it is one of the incidents of poverty, that a tax on shoes or clothes or food or any of those articles which are required by the poor, of course is felt more by them than by the rich. But for that very reason, when you come to a case where the tax is absolutely and exclusively on the poor and not on the rich, you should hesitate. My friend from Ohio is clearly mistaken. He gives a bad character to the savings bank, and then proceeds to tax it. He calls it something that it is not, and then proceeds to tax it for what he chooses to call it and not for that which it really is.

Now, sir, I insist that its true character shall be recognized as a charity for the benefit of the poor, and on that account I claim its immunity from taxation.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I have listened with great attention to the argument made in favor of excepting savings banks. In the first place the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] argued the question de minimis; that is that these banks are so small that they ought to be exempted, their deposits are too small; but it still remains for him to show that they are not banks of deposit and loan. It does not matter what you call a bank. That does not change its character. It still remains to inquire what is the nature of it. What is the nature of the business which it does? I believe that all banks may be divided into two classes, and I think they are so divided by political economists: banks of deposit and loan, and banks of issue and circulation. What is the difference then between a savings bank, where the deposits are five cents, and one where the deposits are $500, except in quantity? There is none in quality. But if we except savings banks where the deposits only are five and ten cents and twenty-five cents, and the holders are poor people, shall we not exempt those where the holders are rich people, and where deposits are in large quantities? There is no proposition made here to exempt those banks where the deposits are very small in amount, but it is to exempt all savings banks. I do not see the force of this argument de povertate: because these people are poor, ergo they are to pay no tax. The poor are taxed everywhere. You talk about taxing the savings of a sewing woman. Do you not tax the coal that warms her feet by the fire? You tax the light by which she sews; you tax the cotton she sews, and the needles and everything else; and yet her earnings are to be exempt. But she loans to the Government. Well, if she loans to the Government who pays better interest than the Government? Who is it that pays six per cent. in gold in return for the loan of paper now reduced to fifty cents on the dollar? But what do your savings banks do with their gold when they get it? They go across the street and sell it again for paper at fifty cents on the dollar, and thus double the interest, and make twelve per cent. in that way, because although the dollar they get in exchange for the gold may not be a dollar as to anybody else, it is a dollar as to this Government and this people; we are bound to redeem it some day; make it good some day.

Then again it is put on the ground of charity. Charity! Wherein does it resemble a charity? Gentlemen say because certain humane individuals administer it free of charge. Is that a charity? I have heard of many humane individuals who administer savings banks free of charge running away with the bank and all the money. These humane individuals may manage them very well at times, but I should be rather inclined to think that they make their own accounts upon that score. But what I mean to say is that that is no argument against taxing the fund, against taxing this accumulation of property, because the officers volunteer to conduct the institution gratuitously; it is no reason why this mass of property liable to taxation should be exempt. It bears no resemblance to a charity. It bears no more resemblance to the box of the poor, or the Eucharist upon the communion table, than a hawk does to a hand-saw. What is a charity? A charity is that which is voluntarily given away without consideration, for the support and maintenance of the poor. I suppose there is no other institution in the country that is so dissimilar to a charity as a bank.

I understand that even in New England, from the letters which have been read, the rich and the strong and the powerful have no compunctions of conscience about taxing these institutions. Have you exempted them yourselves? The letter read by the honorable Senator from Connecticut showed they are taxed there; the letter read by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts showed they are taxed there. I do not know whether the little State of Rhode Island, with its enormous fortunes and its immense accumulations of wealth, taxes them or not, but surely they are taxed in Massachusetts and taxed in Connecticut.

Mr. SPRAGUE. They are not taxed in Rhode Island.

Mr. COWAN. I am very glad to hear it. I think it is creditable to the gentlemen of Rhode Island that they do not tax the earnings of their sewing girls and their poor.

Mr. SPRAGUE. We try to induce them to deposit their funds in savings banks.

Mr. COWAN. That is all right. I can understand why people living in the neighborhood of these banks, and knowing exactly their character, may be disposed to make an exception in their favor; but here, where we do not know their character, and where in all their principal features they resemble other banks which we have taxed, I do not see the force of this exemption.

I agree with the chairman of the Committee on Finance. Draw your line, exclude this de minimis about which you think the law ought not to care; but we do not want to exempt large banks, banks of large deposits, banks where the rich take advantage of this scheme for the purpose of putting into circulation the surplus money of the country, because I suppose that is the reason of it. New England is thrifty, New England is economical, and she knows that if there is a parcel of loose coppers about it is better for the community to gather them up into a savings bank and distribute them about for the purpose of making them active capital. If they are so small, draw the line, cut them out, and let us tax the other savings banks, in Pennsylvania and in New York and elsewhere, which ought to be taxed. I am told that in some of the States, if you go into one of the towns and see the finest building on the street, and inquire what it is, they will tell you it is the savings bank. I do not know whether that is the case in New England or not, but it is in some of the States. Should not that institution be taxed? And yet, under this exclusion, that bank would be exempted.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will detain the Senate but a moment. As to the deposits in these banks, I think the sums are generally very small. I can merely say that if rich people do deposit in them, they are taxed on their income. They do not escape taxation by putting their money there, because they pay upon whatever they do get. Therefore, that is no reason.

Mr. HENDERSON. At the last session, when this subject was up, I took occasion to look into the figures and to ascertain what would be the result of this exemption. I stated then, and I state again, and I take pleasure in stating, that I would vote for this proposition if I found all the savings banks in this country of the character represented by the Senator from Vermont, and of the character that they seem to be in his own State. When I come to look at that gallant little State, I find that it has forty savings banks, with a deposit of $1,712,231. There are forty banks, making about $40,000 to each bank. I suppose that the institutions there are strictly and truly what he represents them to be. I regret very much that I have to vote for a proposition that taxes them at all; but I desire to call that Senator's attention to the difficulty that will be in the way of following his lead upon this subject. While he is seeking to exempt the earnings of a few poor in his own State, I apprehend that the result will be to exempt a very large amount of capital in other States. I do not desire to impose any tax that will be burdensome on the poor. I do not desire to impose a tax such as he thinks this tax will be; but I differ with him materially in regard to the character of the tax. In the little State of Rhode Island I find that there are $9,945,867 on deposit. Each depositor in the savings banks there has $263 to his credit. I take the number of depositors and I take the amount they have on deposit and I find that each man on an average has $263. That does not look to me that it is a "nute" society; it does not look to me that it is an institution where the poor drop in ten cents, as represented by the Senator from Vermont. That is a very large average for the deposit accounts of banks of circulation throughout this country. Take the banks of issue in the State of Rhode Island: in 1863 those banks had on deposit only $5,594,394.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is because they do not pay anything on deposits.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, I submit to the Senator from Vermont, what is the object of making a deposit in a bank? Say for instance, I have $263; or I will take his own State. Every depositor in the State of Vermont has $155 to-day in the savings banks. Does the Senator know it? Every depositor has to his credit on an average $155; a very large average for deposits in banks of issue. Suppose that I have $155, and I choose to deposit it in a bank of deposit and circulation. Why do I do so? It is because I am doing my business at bank. I expect to get discounts at that bank, and I expect to patronize the institution. If I do not give them my deposit, can I expect when I want paper discounted to get it done? How is it with persons who deposit in savings banks? They expect to realize a benefit. What is that benefit? They expect the money is to be loaned, and they will receive dividends.

But there is another class of institutions in this country referred to by the Senator from Ohio who is at the head of the committee. I refer to the banks. The difference between a trust bank and a savings bank, as I understand, is this: a trust bank is a bank with capital; individuals go and subscribe capital and the bank receives deposits and agrees to pay a stipulated sum upon deposits, loans the deposits out or discounts upon them, buys bills of exchange, &c. Their profits consist in the difference of interest that they realize over and above what they pay. Not so with a savings bank; a savings bank is a mutual insurance company where all the parties unite together and agree to elect officers, and by those officers to loan the money, and the officers themselves keep their deposits there too, loan the money, and divide the amount they receive in the shape of dividends. I undertake to say there is no difference; and if deposits are to be taxed in one bank they ought to be taxed in another bank. I cannot for my life see the distinction.

I feel the weight of the remarks made by the Senator from Vermont, but I do not think they are founded in justice. He compares this to a tax on the communion plate. The Senator has a peculiar way of saying those things that no other Senator has. He can say them with a force and a power that sinks into our hearts and makes us almost actually believe that we are digging down into the grave, tearing up the coffin of some dead man and taxing it. It is not so.

The Senator from Connecticut asks, why do this thing? and he says the savings banks take the money they receive and deposit it with banks of deposit and circulation until they want to use it. Let me refer to the Senator's own State. In 1863 Connecticut had forty-nine savings banks with deposits to the amount of $23,446,936, and each depositor had $227, a very large average. How much had the banks of circulation in Connecticut on deposit at that time? Eight million eight hundred and ninety thousand two hundred and thirty-seven dollars, only about one dollar for every three in the savings banks. The argument of the Senator from Connecticut falls to the ground; the savings banks did not take their money and re-deposit it in banks of deposit and circulation.

In New Hampshire twenty-seven savings banks had a deposit account of $6,560,308, while the banks of circulation in 1863 had but $1,725,866 on deposit in 1863, there being nearly four times as much in the savings banks as in the banks of circulation. How is it in Massachusetts, where there are ninety-three savings banks? I am willing to exempt the million and a half of money in Vermont, if the Senator from Vermont will confine the exemption to his own State; but how is it with Massachusetts? The Senator from Massachusetts read a letter from some savings bank gentleman, I suppose—

Mr. SUMNER. I beg the Senator's pardon; from one of the revenue collectors of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. He is a very nice gentleman indeed.

Mr. SUMNER. He is.

Mr. HENDERSON. In Massachusetts, with ninety-three savings banks, the deposit account is $50,404,623, or over half a million each, and yet you ask us to exempt the whole. The deposits in all the other banks in Massachusetts are $37,471,133. The savings banks in that State have $13,000,000 more of deposits than all the other banks in Massachusetts. And you ask us to exempt all of it, and a collector of revenue writes here asking Congress to do this thing. I think he ought to be removed, and if the Senator will just give his name I will join willingly and freely to have him removed.

In New York there are seventy-five savings banks, with $76,538,183 of deposits. Do you want us to exempt all that? In that State, contrary to the rule in the New England States, the banks of issue and circulation had a larger deposit account than the savings banks, having $200,824,776. But why exempt the $76,000,000 deposited in savings banks?

I have only looked to the statistics of the six New England States and New York; and in those seven States I find a deposit account of $169,000,000 in the savings banks, and the Senator from Vermont says a tax on that money is taxing the communion plate, is taxing the grave, is taxing the poor. The savings banks throughout the country must have not less than from three to four hundred million dollars on deposit, and we are asked, in the name of poverty and of humanity and of mercy and of kindness to the poor, to relieve them all from taxation. If the Senator from Vermont would merely propose to exempt his own State, to just such banks there as he represents them to be, I do not know but that I should vote with him. I would rather vote with him than to have the exorbitant power of his voice falling on my ear whenever I rise to oppose this proposition. I can hardly bear it. I was not able to bear it at the last session, and had to yield. At this session I am not disposed to do so. I find that we can get a million and a half or two million dollars from this source, and the small, pitiful sum that Vermont will pay ought to induce the Senator to let it pass.

In regard to the profits made, I have not now the statistics before me, but I can state to the Senate that I examined the matter thoroughly at the last session, and I undertake to say that the profits made on these deposits are as great as the profits made in any of the banks in the United States; and in many cases much larger.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator tell us who gets those profits?

Mr. HENDERSON. The depositors.

Mr. HOWE. Are they not taxed for them?

Mr. HENDERSON. Am I not taxed on my money when I make a deposit in a bank of circulation? Am I not taxed in every shape and style that a man can be taxed? The Senator asks me if the depositors in a savings bank are not taxed. They ought to be taxed. What is the difference whether a man deposits his money in one bank or another? He always deposits, expecting to get some benefit from it in some way, does he not? If he deposits in a bank of circulation, he expects to be accommodated by having his note discounted when he wants money, or expects to get a bill of exchange on time or at sight on fair terms whenever he wants it. He always expects to be remunerated for the benefit he confers on the bank by making his deposits with it. No man makes his deposits with an institution without expecting to be benefited in some way.

Mr. HOWE. But when a man deposits his money in a bank of circulation that deposit is not taxed to him, it is taxed to the bank, because the bank has the benefit of it.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is all I want done in this case. I want the bank to pay on the deposit account.

Mr. HOWE. But if the money is deposited in a savings bank, the bank gets no benefit from it, the depositor gets the whole benefit from it, and is taxed on that benefit as income. That is the difference.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me ask the Senator whether he would exempt a trust company from the operation of this tax.

Mr. HOWE. No.

Mr. HENDERSON. Now, I submit to the Senator in all candor, what is the difference between them in principle?

Mr. HOWE. The Senator himself has just stated in explicit terms what the difference is. A trust bank is a bank which uses its deposits for its own benefit, paying an equivalent to the depositor, to be sure.

Mr. HENDERSON. They pay a certain per cent. on their deposits and expect to realize on the advanced interest they make. Sometimes they lose, sometimes they make. Now, I ask the Senator if there were a trust bank and a savings bank in his town, would he not deposit in the one or the other just as he supposed would be profitable to himself?

Mr. HOWE. Certainly I should.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then why should we exempt the one and not the other? If a man in a town in New England or in the city of New York has money to deposit, and he prefers depositing in a savings bank where he calculates to make more, why is it that it ought not to be taxed? Why should it be exempted when if the same amount was deposited in another institution, with an expectation of benefit also, it would be taxed?

Mr. HOWE. The question that the Senator put exposes the fallacy of his argument. If I put my money into a trust bank which pays me four per cent. and uses the money, I am taxed on the four per cent. If I put it into a savings bank which pays me all the money earned, I am taxed on all its earnings. In the one case, the trust bank gets a profit from the deposit over and above what it pays the depositor, and therefore is taxed for its deposits. In the other case, the savings bank gets nothing, but pays the whole earnings to the depositor; and yet you insist on taxing the savings bank which earns nothing, and also taxing the depositor, who gets all that is earned.

Mr. HENDERSON. The depositor, as I understand it, earns all in the one case, and in the other he may not earn all. The difference between depositing in a bank of deposit and circulation and in a trust bank or a savings bank is just the difference between an insurance company made up of capital stock subscribed and a mutual insurance company where every man becomes a member of the company. Suppose I want to start a savings bank in my town; I gather together fifteen or twenty persons and we determine to make our deposits in the institution; other individuals after awhile finding that it was a safe institution would come up and deposit. We would elect officers, and those officers would loan the money and collect it, and after paying the expenses of the officers, the salaries necessary to secure the discharge of their duties, we would divide the profits. I say that there is no difference, and there ought to be no difference, in the burdens levied by the Government on the depositor in a savings bank and the depositor in a bank of circulation and deposit, because the man expects to be benefited whether he deposits in one or the other. I cannot see and never could see any reason for making this exemption.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Missouri, Mr. President, called the attention of the Senate to the amount of the deposits of the discount banks and of the savings banks in various States of the Union, and compared one with the other. He compared, for instance, the deposits in the discount banks in my State with the deposits in the savings banks, and he found that the deposits in the savings banks were larger than the deposits in the discount banks. Did the Senator for a moment consider what those deposits represented? The deposits in the discount banks represented the balances on hand by men who were doing business and depositing in those banks at a given day. The deposits in the savings banks represented the earnings of those depositors for years. Take the average of deposits in the savings banks in New Hampshire. I think the Senator said it was about $160 to a depositor. Will he tell me how long one of these depositors had been in putting that $160 into bank? It might have been put in in five cents, in ten cents, in twenty-five cents, in one dollar, in five dollars, and perhaps in ten dollars, as the person might have earned and saved, and so in years it had got up to be $160, whereas a man depositing in a discount bank might have deposited $160,000 in the same time, drawing out and putting in continually. There is no comparison between the two classes of deposits.

Mr. HENDERSON. Let me ask the Senator upon what principle it is that we tax a deposit in a bank of circulation?

Mr. CLARK. Upon the principle that the bank which there is a rich institution takes the deposit and makes money out of it.

Mr. HENDERSON. I submit to the Senator if he does not know that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred banks of issue do not thank their depositors for the use of the money. Does he not know that banks of issue generally do not desire deposits, but keep them as a favor to the customers of the bank?

Mr. CLARK. In my country they all invite them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Some pay interest.

Mr. CLARK. Not a month before I came away from home there was a scramble between the banks in my town as to who should have the United States deposits.

Mr. HENDERSON. The Senator says the banks of issue in his State invite deposits. It is strange to me that six and a half millions go into the savings banks when only $1,725,000 after all these invitations succeed in getting into banks of issue.

Mr. CLARK. I can explain to the Senator from Missouri very easily. The savings banks give their depositors four or five per cent.; the discount banks will not give them in some cases anything, in some cases three per cent.; hence men depositing do not let it remain there. It is an entirely different case. In one instance the money is put in until the man wants to use it; in the other it is put into a place to save and to keep it.

Mr. SPRAGUE. Let me interrupt the Senator from New Hampshire and suggest that the deposits in the banks of New Hampshire are the proceeds of discounts of notes, to be drawn out immediately. They are not deposited in banks to remain there, but they are for discount of notes offered at the bank and deposited for a few days to be drawn out in the regular course of business.

Mr. CLARK. I will state what is the case probably with every bank that has more or less people doing business and keeping a fund deposited in bank; when they want money they draw from that deposit, and it varies from day to day as men happen to draw; but the deposits in savings banks do not vary in that way. A person puts in money there to keep and to make a little earning upon it. It has been the policy of the Government to exempt under six hundred dollars of income, and if a poor person gets his income in any other way you do not tax him; but if he puts his money into a savings bank and his earnings are less than six hundred dollars, you will tax him. If you can catch him with his earnings in a savings bank, though they be less than six hundred dollars a year, you will tax him if this amendment prevails.

Mr. President, I was remarkably struck with the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. COWAN.] It was exceedingly luminous, it was almost conclusive, when he referred to the Senator from Rhode Island and said he was very glad they did not tax these savings banks in Rhode Island. If then they did not tax them in Rhode Island would it be right for us to tax them? And what was the excuse he gave? The reason why they should not tax them? Because they knew about them; but here in our ignorance, where we knew nothing about them, we could cut right and left, and we should legislate in our ignorance!

Mr. COWAN. Do they tax them in New Hampshire?

Mr. CLARK. No, sir. We taxed them for a short time, I think for three months, and at the next session of the Legislature it was repealed. We do not tax them. It has not been the policy of the government to tax them. These earnings are mites in my State. The people of my State are not a rich people. Those who deposit in these banks are the people who earn from month to month, and if they have a little saving after the month's expenses put it into bank; next month more is put there, and by and by comes a fit of sickness to a mother or child or sister, and the fund is drawn down and exhausted. This very last fall, in raising your soldiers, some of the poor people who had their funds there were obliged to take them to get for them substitutes to go into the Army, while they staid at home to earn money and support their families. The Government had the whole. The savings banks in my town lost more in that way the last fall than they had lost for years. These little deposits draw from four to five per cent. interest, which is carried to the account of the depositor once in six months or once in a year as it may be; and then at the end of five years, if the bank has earned anything more than what it carried to the account of the depositors, deducting the losses, it is all credited off to the depositors then in the bank. Every cent of the earnings of the bank goes to these poor people, and in many of the institutions they are so very careful that a man is not allowed to deposit over $300 or $400, because it is not for the interest of the bank to have a man deposit a large sum and keep it there until he can do better with it and then take it out. They are peculiarly institutions of deposit and institutions of saving to encourage the people to save their money, and to afford to those who do not otherwise find it an opportunity of investing their money. They are, as the Senator from Vermont says, almost eleemosynary institutions, they are almost charities. They have had a beneficial effect on the country. I hope it will not be the policy of the General Government, when they have been exempted by the States, to tax them now.

Mr. FARWELL. I insist upon saying a word on this question. I know the Senate are impatient, and I am not going to take more than five minutes on any question from now until the final adjournment; but, Mr. President, I certainly feel amazed at this discussion. I have my eye upon a rich banker in State street who has a million of money that he is lending—lending it upon real estate on bond and mortgage—and what do you tax him? You tax him for the stamps upon his notes and upon his bonds, and you tax him upon his income. That is all that he is taxed on. Now, here are five thousand laboring people, poor people, who would not have had a dollar had it not been for these charitable institutions, had not these good men given their time, their attention, and care to taking charge of the little mite, and as it accumulated lending it upon real estate for these people, and carefully husbanding the interest. I think the laws of nearly all the States require that a large portion of the money shall be lent upon real estate. The law does not allow these men to go into the market and take notes and bills of exchange and hazard the loss of the money, but the law requires that it shall be put upon real property, and they always get small interest for it; they get no such interest as the rich banker who manages his own money upon State street gets; and now we propose to tax these poor people, whose business is managed upon charity by the best men in the whole country, more than we tax the rich banker. That is the real effect, if I know anything about the savings bank. If I know anything about the foundation upon which this tax is to be laid, it is, lay your tax on money merely because you find a large accumulation of it; and that accumulation has been made through the instrumentality of those men who have been acting as managers of these banks. I say that the chairman of the committee, with all his ingenuity, cannot show that that money would be taxed as he proposes to tax it by this amendment if it was in the hands of a few rich men and being lent in the same way that this is lent. He cannot demonstrate to us that in that case he would get one dollar from it except upon the income tax, and these people must pay an income tax too, unless their income is so small that it is exempted by the law.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I may tire the Senate, but I am not willing that the vote shall be taken until some facts which have not been expressed are made known. I am cognizant of a savings bank having deposits to the extent of $500,000. All the expense attending that bank is for its secretary, perhaps $500 or $700 at the outside; the president and the directors do the business of that bank without a dollar's compensation. The loans are made with the strictest economy; they are made without taking the slightest risk, at the smallest rate of interest, with a view to security for the benefit of an innumerable number of small depositors. The depositors are from the States of Connecticut, and Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. They receive every dollar of the income derived from that capital. A large portion of the money in that savings bank and other savings banks in New England is deposited by the soldiers of our Army. The great idea which the projectors of these institutions had was to induce the poorer class of people to deposit their money and to save for the future, for old age. It has been demonstrated that when people begin to save their earnings they are in every respect more worthy, more prudent, and better citizens; and the philanthropic people and those who have desired to benefit those around them, have been foremost with that view to induce them to save; and to-day the soldiers of your Army constitute as large a proportion of these depositors as civilians. Indeed, owing to the increased cost of living, civilians have been obliged to withdraw a portion of their deposits and the soldiers have taken their places; and to tax soldiers, and to tax the poor and small depositors, is to legislate against their saving and depositing for the future in order to sustain them in their old age, provide for their children, and induce them to be economical and prudent. Sir, it is one of the worst features, in my opinion, that I have seen in the project for taxation which has been introduced into the legislation of this country.

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire before this vote is taken to assure Senators from the States where these banks exist that they are paying no tax on bank deposits now. If Senators will take the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for the last year, they will find that their States are paying nothing in the shape of a tax upon deposits. I call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the fact that his State paid only $235 22 on deposits.

Mr. COLLAMER. I said before that the ordinary banks in Vermont do not allow interest on deposits, and of course people make nothing by leaving their money there.

Mr. HENDERSON. There is a large deposit account in the banks of circulation there, and I do not see how only $235 could have come in.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is a matter concerning the execution of the law.

Mr. HENDERSON. The report of the Commissioner shows that that is all the revenue we get from that State under this particular tax. The Senator from New Hampshire, who seemed very much excited on this subject, says this money is the earnings of the poor, and he wants to keep it. I think if we do not tax it, he will keep it, and whether we tax it or not they seem to know how to keep it pretty well. New Hampshire only paid $646 13 as tax on deposits, though her banks of issue had a deposit account of $1,750,000. The State of Connecticut paid only $4,054 tax on deposits.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to mention to the Senator that that statement was made before the law of last session took effect.

Mr. HENDERSON. This statement covers one year's tax on bank deposits.

Mr. SHERMAN. The present law took effect, I think, on the 1st of July.

Mr. HENDERSON. This return was under the old law. It is schedule B on pages 270 and 271 of the report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for this year. It is a recapitulation of the collections from banks, insurance, railroad, canal, and turnpike companies for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1864. I might refer to various other States in order to show very great irregularity. I attribute it to the fact that the larger number of the deposits go into these savings banks where they are not taxed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I find that when the people of the country are to be taxed; a strife arises as to who shall be taxed, what State shall be taxed, the people of what section shall be taxed. I do not know the particular state of the question before the Senate, but I know there is a controversy as to who shall be taxed, what State shall be taxed, and what section shall be taxed for carrying on this war. It opens up before the intelligent mind a magnificent theme of debate. The honorable Senator from Missouri contends that western interests shall not be taxed; there are other gentlemen who say that New England should not be taxed, and perhaps there are others who say that the intermediate section between the far West and the East should not be taxed. But, sir, there is one section that feels the burden of taxation deeply, and that is the section from which I come, the section of the border—a people who had nothing to do in bringing on this war, who were opposed to its inception, and have been opposed to its continuance. I say, challenging contradiction (but I mean no personal offense to any individuals) that if there is any section of this country that ought to be taxed it is New England. From the hot-bed of New Englandism came the sentiments which disturbed us when we were at peace and in repose. We were a happy, quiet people, peace was throughout all our borders, and had it not been for the teachings of New England we should still be enjoying peace and quiet.

Sir, I cannot sit quietly in my seat and hear this controversy about taxation between the different sections of my country. In early childhood I was taught that I had but one country, and it embraced New England, it embraced the entire North, it embraced the entire South, and wherever the American flag floated there was my country. New England is as much my country as any portion of the United States; Massachusetts is a part of my country; I recollect the example furnished by Hancock, by Adams, and by the other revolutionary sires; I recollect in early life how my soul was stirred by reading the utterances of her noble sons in behalf of liberty, and I have never seen the time when I wanted New England turned out in the cold; and I have never seen the time when I wanted South Carolina, the chivalrous, noble State of the South, turned out in the cold. It is all my country, all my home; but now when demoniac influences have come over the people and we are engaged in fratricidal strife, I find that when a taxation bill comes before you, there is a struggle as to who shall pay the most, the East, the West, the North, or the South. If you had observed the counsels of the great Democratic party of this country, which governed the country for sixty years and carried us to glory and renown, you would not be in the condition you are now. [Laughter.] Gentlemen may laugh; the galleries may laugh. People laugh even when their liberties are about to be destroyed. Sir, there is one little State bordering upon the center, a border State, the first to enter into the Union and the last to abandon it under all circumstances, that says, "Consider well the path you tread; consider what counsels you follow."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. Those in favor of taxing the deposits in savings banks will vote "yea;" those opposed, "nay."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Conness, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Powell, Sherman, Stewart, and Trumbull—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Hale, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Nye, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Willey, Wilson, and Wright—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Harding, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Wade, and Wilkinson—10.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair decides affirmatively. The amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That net profits realized by sales of real estate purchased since January 1, 1864, shall be chargeable as income; and losses on sales of real estate purchased since January 1, 1864, and sold within the year for which income is estimated, shall be deducted from the income of such year.

And in lieu of it to insert:

And provided further, That net profits realized by sales of real estate purchased within the year for which income is estimated shall be chargeable as income; and losses on sales of real estate purchased within the year, for which income is estimated, shall be deducted from the income of such year.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "rates of," before "interest," in line eight hundred and seven.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the words "his share of," before "the gains," in line eight hundred and nineteen.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight hundred and twenty-four, to strike out "carry on" and insert "cultivate."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight hundred and fifty-nine, to strike out "any," and insert "every."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight hundred and sixty-eight, to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the words "or his or her ward or beneficiary" after "she," in line eight hundred and eighty-two.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line eight hundred and eighty-seven, to strike out "all of" after "upon."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out, in lines eight hundred and eighty-seven and eight hundred and eighty-eight, the words "as provided by this act" and insert "as prescribed by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines nine hundred and eight, nine hundred and nine, and nine hundred and ten, as follows:

That section one hundred and twenty be amended by striking out at the end thereof the word "act," and inserting in lieu thereof the word "section."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "husband or" before "wife," in line nine hundred and eighteen.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out of the clause proposing to amend section one hundred and sixty-nine of the present law, the following words, in lines nine hundred and ninety-eight, nine hundred and ninety-nine, and one thousand:

And by inserting in the proviso, after the words "imported articles," the words "except lucifer or friction matches, cigar lights, and wax tapers."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I suggest to the chairman of the Finance Committee that the words "that 'schedule B,' preceding section one hundred and seventy-one," in lines ten hundred and one and ten hundred and two, should not be stricken out. It is necessary to retain those words, in order to fit with what follows the part to be stricken out.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is correct.

The Secretary read the words proposed to be stricken out by the amendment of the committee, from line ten hundred and two to line ten hundred and twenty-three, as follows:

In the paragraphs relating to "Bill of exchange, (inland)," be amended by striking out all of said paragraphs, and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Bill of exchange, (inland,) draft, or order for the payment of any sum of money, otherwise than at sight or on demand, for every $100, or fractional part thereof, five cents.

Loan of money. Any loan of money, or any advance of money on security, whether represented by note, certificate, check, receipt, or other evidence, not otherwise provided for, and not including mortgages, if on demand, for every $100, or fractional part thereof, two cents.

If to be paid at a time designated, for every $100, or fractional part thereof, five cents: Provided, That any note or other evidence of debt, payable on demand, shall be void after thirty days from date, unless it has been protested within that time, or shall have been stamped with duty within that time, at the rate of five cents for every $100 or fractional part thereof; and any pawnbroker's certificate for an amount of loan less than five dollars shall not require to be stamped.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The words "and in," in line ten hundred and twenty-three, should be "in the."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That correction will be made.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest that the words "be amended" should be inserted in line ten hundred and twenty-three.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let that amendment be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be made.

The next amendment was in line ten hundred and twenty-seven, after the word "transportation," to insert "the charge upon which exceeds one dollar."

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to explain that the House of Representatives changed the mode of taxing express companies, and then left the old stamp duty precisely as it was before. As we have already negated the change proposed by the House, we, by this amendment, relieve the express companies from putting a stamp on receipts for the delivery of property where their charge is one dollar or less.

Mr. CLARK. The words of the amendment should be altered.

Mr. SHERMAN. It ought to be "the charge upon which is one dollar or less."

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following words in lines ten hundred and twenty-eight, ten hundred and twenty-nine, ten hundred and thirty, and ten hundred and thirty one:

And that "Schedule C," preceding section one hundred and seventy-one, be amended in all the paragraphs concerning "playing cards" by striking out, wherever it occurs, the word "retail."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line ten hundred and thirty-one the following:

Add at the end of the paragraph marked "receipts" the following: "Provided, That when two or more persons shall sign the same receipt, one stamp, equal in value to the several stamps required by this act, may be affixed to said receipts in lieu of said several stamps."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in the clause proposing to amend section one hundred and seventy-one of the existing law, to strike out "before the words 'refined coal-oil' the words 'crude petroleum or rock-oil' and" in lines ten hundred and forty-eight and ten hundred and forty-nine.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten hundred and fifty to strike out "by inserting the words."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten hundred and fifty to insert the word "bullion."

Mr. STEWART. I move to strike out the word "bullion."

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The word "and" should go before "bullion."

Mr. STEWART. I believe the amendment proposed by the committee is to insert the word "bullion."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the amendment.

Mr. STEWART. I am opposed to the insertion of the word "bullion." I think we shall get less revenue by that principle than we shall by adhering to the law of last session.

Mr. SHERMAN. I, perhaps, ought to explain to the Senate the effect of this amendment, so that the Senator may have the benefit of it. There is a very small tax now levied on bullion, the only tax, I believe, that affects very materially this important product of the State of the honorable Senator. When that is exported under the present law there is a drawback, so that the English, who get nearly all our bullion in the present condition of affairs, pay us no tax. We propose not to allow the drawback, so that all the gold produced in this country shall pay at least the small tax levied on it. The effect of striking out the word "bullion" would be that all that goes to Europe would pay no tax and all that is consumed in this country would pay the tax. We were very clear on this subject, and were unanimous that we ought to levy the tax on bullion, so as to make the English pay on that which they take from us.

Mr. STEWART. That is just exactly the effect I understand it to have. I understood the provision precisely, and that is just exactly what I am opposed to. I am opposed to taxing it as an export. I do not believe we shall get as much revenue. I believe it is wrong in principle to tax any of the raw materials that can be exported. It would be looked upon as very absurd to tax bullion or to tax any export that we have to the same extent that you would tax an import.

Mr. CONNESS. The Constitution does not permit a tax on exports.

Mr. STEWART. This is virtually a tax on exports. Taxing the bullion is taxing the export, because it is all for export. All articles that are produced exclusively for export should go out of the country free, and for the reason that we should have as much go out of the country as possible, and why? No matter who buys it—whether the English or French, or anybody else—they have got to pay for it. If they pay for it in gold, no gold goes out of the country; but that is not the truth as a matter of fact; they pay for it with a commodity of some kind, and that commodity, when it comes here to be used, instead of being taxed one half of one per cent. is taxed fifty per cent., and the tax falls on a class of persons who voluntarily pay it, who will pay it rather than not have the luxury. We can make more money by allowing it to go free out of the country and encouraging its product than we can by placing a tax on the labor that produces it, decreasing its value, putting an additional burden on it, making it worth one half per cent. less and decreasing the amount produced. That also applies to coal-oil. Here, too, I think the committee have made a mistake in the principle that they apply to coal-oil. I think they are going to injure that source of revenue. I put it solely on the ground of getting more revenue. The production of coal-oil is in its infancy. It is developing a great, and new, and important source of wealth. We are already able not only to compete with but to surpass any other country in that production. You place a tax upon the exportation of it, and although it may seem to you a slight tax the effect may perhaps be that before another year you will have competitors, so that you will have no market abroad, and the coal-oil "bubble" will burst. Your oil wells will not have dried up, your coal-oil will not have been exhausted, but the present enterprising class who are developing them will have been destroyed before you know it, and twenty years will elapse before you can get them to go into it again, because "a burnt child dreads the fire." I think so much of this section as refers to coal-oil is a dangerous experiment. The position in which it was put by the law of last year is evidently better and safer, and it is particularly so as to gold and silver. Let them go out free.

I am opposed to taxing wheat that is exported. I am opposed to taxing any article that can be exported until we have exports enough so that we can bring the world in debt to us. Why not do the same on any other commodity that is to be exported? Is there any reason in it? I say let everything that can be exported go out of the country free until we have exports enough, so that the world will owe us. That is the theory upon which you will increase your credit and at the same time get three or four or five times the revenue by taxing the commodity that is returned. I object to this not on account of the amount, but because it is wrong in principle. It is wrong in principle to apply it to a raw material. It is wrong in principle to apply it to wheat, coal-oil, gold, or silver, or cotton, and it will be found so. If we have more than other nations, if we have this vast wealth that can pay our debt, we must get it out and sell it to the rest of the world and bring the world in debt to us. We have no particular use for bullion here. We have no particular use for gold and silver here as a circulating medium; we have got circulating medium enough, but we want the basis for it. Why tax it when it goes out of the country and by increasing your commerce brings back articles that you may tax four times as much, because it falls on a class of the community that will have luxuries? It is wrong in principle, and therefore I move to strike out the word "bullion."

Mr. CONNESS. I do not agree with my neighbor on this proposition, which I regret. The effect of the Senator's argument seems to be that if you should not insert the word "bullion" there, and thus stop the benefit of drawback that the man has in our country now who sends his gold to a foreign country, it is equivalent to levying a tax of one half of one per cent. upon the gold belonging to our own people and remitting it on that belonging to foreigners. Let me take the city of San Francisco, for instance. There is a population of importers composed of a part who are Americans and who have their principal dealings with our Atlantic cities; who buy in our own American markets for the people of California and Nevada. Another portion are foreign importers who import all the goods they buy from European countries. They, under the provision of the law as it stood, would be entitled to a drawback. That portion of the gold which had come into their possession and had been taxed one half of one per cent. at the Mint or assay office would have been entitled to a drawback and the return of the one half of one per cent., while our own people who bought in our own markets were taxed one half of one per cent. on their bullion.

I would join the Senator in saying that the tax of one half of one per cent. at the Mint is a tax on the gold product. It makes every ounce of gold worth that much less, and to that extent it discourages the production of gold, and on principle I am opposed to it. But last year, when this question was very thoroughly discussed here, discussed to my satisfaction and a little beyond it, we agreed to this tax of one half of one per cent. as a settlement of the question, and we agreed that it should not be considered as an export tax because the Constitution forbade us from imposing an export tax upon anything, but we held that we had a right to regulate the commodity and to require it when it was changed in our Mints and assay offices from one form to another, to pay a tax if we saw fit to do it. I did not agree with the policy, but accepted it as the best solution of what appeared to be a determination on the part of the people here to tax the product of our mines. I cannot accept my neighbor's theory that that tax shall now be so regulated that it shall fall exclusively on our own people, under the mistaken idea, as I believe, that we shall thereby increase our exports and bring the whole world in debt to us.

I disagree with my friend in another respect, and that is when he says we do not want gold and silver. I think we want it about as much as we do holiness at this time, and a little of both, a great deal of both, would serve us. I think we want it here. I think it is not enough to say that we have a circulating medium when that medium is paper, because a circulating medium of paper that is not redeemable with gold, which the whole world has accepted as the standard of value, is a very unsafe medium for our commercial transactions. It is true that as long as our people agree to take it from one another we do very well; but we have increased it to such an extent now that the prices of all commodities have risen until they are double at least what they formerly were. We are all looking now for the termination of this war and for the return to specie payments as the day of happiness, when a dollar in paper will be the equivalent of and be convertible into a dollar of gold, when our bonds will be paid at our national Treasurer's office in gold as they become due. I am not in favor of paying a premium to encourage the exportation of gold and silver from our country.

Mr. STEWART. My position is to leave this matter just as it was regulated by the law of last year. It was wisely regulated, although I think the tax of one half of one per cent., it could be perhaps demonstrated, was not, under all the circumstances, entirely wise, but still I do not propose to speak of that.

The Senator says, why not let our own people have it as cheap as we let Europeans have it? The answer is very plain. If we use it ourselves and convert it into jewelry and the like, if it remains in the country, it is not taxed as much as it is if it goes out and buys a commodity. Why do you want exports? Why do you want bullion sent out of the country? Why do you want wheat sent out of the country? Why do you want cotton sent out of the country? Why do you want coal-oil sent out of the country? For this simple reason: exports buy commodities, and those commodities come here and pay heavy duties. You can make more money in that way. There is an additional reason, and a very sound reason, and that is that if you have more exports than you have imports the world will get in debt to you and will pay you in money; the world owes you; your credit is good. It is with nations just as with men. If we can so conduct the business of the nation as to get the nations of the earth indebted to us it will be by using the advantage we have of having things to sell which they must buy. If we can do that and get them in debt to us our credit will be good, our bonds will be good. It is a very simple and plain proposition. The advantages are all with us. It was a wise provision of the Constitution that there should be no duty on exports. Why should that be a constitutional provision? You have no duty on exports, and you let them go free to foreigners while you charge your own citizens. That is the effect of the provision in the Constitution, and for a very wise purpose, because exports induce imports and you can get larger returns. Your gold and silver would be worth very little if you had no place to export them to; your coal-oil well would be worth very little; your broad acres in Illinois would be worth very little, if you had no market for the products.

The time may come when you will have to tax wheat and flour. Gentlemen then will object to letting flour go free out of the country. Why? Take two bushels of wheat, which illustrates the case very well; one is consumed by the farmer. Unless you tax it in the shape of wheat you never tax it at all. The other bushel is taken to Europe; it is there exchanged for a yard of cloth; that cloth comes back to New York and is taxed. This matter of drawbacks was wisely provided to meet that contingency, and should not only have applied to gold, but should have applied to coal-oil, as it did originally. This experiment that you are making to tax the raw material, to tax exports, you will find is wrong in principle; and if you depart from the principle of the Constitution, that exports shall not be taxed, and get around it by any indirection whatever, you will find that you will have less revenue than you would have by encouraging by all means the development of anything that can be sold to other countries, either for commodities or to involve them in debt to us. I think this is a question of principle that should be looked into and thought on before this amendment is adopted, for I believe it is a departure from our true policy.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on inserting the word "bullion;" and the negative of that is the affirmative of the Senator's motion.

Mr. STEWART. I vote against the insertion. I want the yeas and nays, because it is a question of principle.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 3; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nesmith, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Willey, and Wilson—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Davis, Hendricks, Nye, Powell, Riddle, Saulsbury, Stewart, Van Winkle, and Wright—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Cardie, Doolittle, Hale, Harding, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morrill, Pomeroy, Richardson, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out after the word "bullion," just inserted, the words "quick-silver, lucifer or friction matches, cigar lights, and wax tapers."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following words at the end of the second section of the bill:

And this section shall take effect from and after the passage of this act, anything hereinafter to the contrary notwithstanding.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the third section of the bill, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of April, 1865, there shall be levied, collected, and paid, in lieu of the duty now provided by law, on all cotton upon which no duty has been levied, collected, or paid, and which is not exempted by law, a duty of six cents per pound until the 1st day of July, 1866, and on and after that date a duty of five cents per pound, which shall be and remain a lien thereon until said duty shall have been paid, in the possession of any person or persons whomsoever; and the allowance or drawback which shall hereafter be allowed upon articles on which any internal duties or tax shall have been paid, manufactured exclusively of cotton, shall be at the same rate per pound on such articles so manufactured, when exported, as shall be proven to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury, under such regulations as he may prescribe, to have been actually paid per pound on the cotton from which said articles are manufactured.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to have an explanation of that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance are in favor of levying a tax on cotton, but not in the form proposed, and we differed in regard to the mode of the drawback when the article was manufactured in this country and exported. On the whole, I think it would be better to let the section go out, and let the committee of conference draft a section which will cover the whole matter. We propose to strike it out. I am, however, in favor of a tax on cotton.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know how the committee of conference is going to know what is the sense of the Senate on that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate will be represented.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senate will be represented, but a committee of conference professes to carry out the views of the Senate on important questions. How are they going to know unless we have some action on it?

Mr. SHERMAN. In order to raise the only question there is in this whole matter, (I suppose it is in order to amend the part to be stricken out,) I move to strike out all after line ten, so as to leave the tax on cotton.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question then is on striking out so much of the section as follows the tenth line.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to know of the Senator whether he proposes anywhere a modification of the tariff to correspond with the change in the tax on cotton.

Mr. SHERMAN. The tariff ought to be modified or the present drawback remain. Let me state the law now, and Senators will see the difficulty. This section proposes to tax all cotton produced in this country six cents a pound until the 1st of July, 1866, and after that five cents a pound. The latter clause of the section allows to the domestic manufacturer a drawback, when he exports any goods made out of American cotton, to an amount equal to the amount of the tax. That is the proposition. That is, upon every pound of cotton cloth manufactured in this country, when he exports it for a foreign market he is entitled to a drawback of six cents a pound. This is so marked a discrimination in favor of our industry as to amount to a bounty almost equal to the cost of manufacture. What is the cost of manufacturing a pound of cotton, I ask my friend from Rhode Island—ordinary sheeting?

Mr. SPRAGUE. About twenty cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. If I am correctly informed, a pound of cotton makes in ordinary sheeting about five yards.

Mr. FOSTER. Three.

Mr. SHERMAN. I rely on my friend, [Mr. SPRAGUE,] who is engaged in the business.

Mr. ANTHONY. He refers to printed goods.

Mr. SHERMAN. He says from three to six, and I take five as a medium. It is proposed to pay to the American manufacturer for exporting cotton goods an enormous bounty. Suppose that in this country we produce a million bales of cotton, and of that quantity we manufacture five hundred thousand bales, and export the other five hundred thousand bales. In the first instance it all pays alike a tax of six cents a pound. But suppose that one hundred thousand bales of that which we manufacture here is exported to foreign countries in the manufactured shape, we are to pay out of the Treasury of the United States to the manufacturer or the exporter six cents a pound upon all the cotton so manufactured, while if it is manufactured in England we get the whole amount of the duty. Can we afford to pay such a bounty to the domestic manufacturer? The amount of bounty that would be paid to the domestic manufacturer is at least one third and perhaps one half the entire cost of the manufacture.

Mr. FARWELL. I desire to inquire of the chairman if there is no provision for a drawback on the raw cotton exported.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no provision for a drawback on the raw cotton. If raw cotton is exported it pays us a duty; but if we manufacture that cotton here, add to it a little labor, and then export it, it is proposed that we shall pay back to our manufacturer all the duty, so that so far as revenue is concerned the United States would be interested under this system in having all our cotton manufactured abroad. The United States as a Government would be interested in preventing a single pound of American cotton from being manufactured for exportation. It seems to me that is wrong.

But on the other hand the home manufacturers say that we levy a duty on cotton of two cents when we import it, and that the English manufacturer gets his cotton free of duty, and that the English are now using a large quantity of India cotton on which they pay no duty, while if the American manufacturer uses the same cotton he must pay a duty of two cents in gold, and that the present tariff law is a discrimination against him if you do not allow the American manufacturer some drawback. We propose to put him on the same footing as to our domestic cotton with the foreign manufacturer, but he says he will be laboring under a disadvantage if he should be compelled to use the short staple cotton, and therefore the effect of our laws will be a discrimination against him. But in reply to that it may be said that under the present law, which is not repealed by this bill, we allow a drawback of two cents a pound on all domestic cotton manufactured and sent abroad. It seems to me that is enough.

I do not want to be unjust to our domestic industry. I want to give it fair and reasonable protection and give it the benefit of our tariff law, but it seems to me that to give a bounty of six cents on every pound of cotton manufactured in this country which may be exported would be giving a bounty which the Treasury cannot bear. It would make it the interest of the United States, plainly and palpably, that the cotton produced in this country should be manufactured abroad rather than at home, because if manufactured at home and sent abroad in the form of the manufactured article we should not get a single dollar of revenue from the cotton. Under the operation of the section as it stands, we get six cents a pound tax on the cotton if it is manufactured at home and consumed here, but if it is manufactured here and then exported we do not get a cent except simply on the wastage in the process of manufacture.

Mr. JOHNSON. That "simply" includes a great deal.

Mr. SHERMAN. The law now allows them a drawback.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand the Senator from Ohio to say that the two cents drawback is not repealed.

Mr. SHERMAN. The old law imposed a duty of two cents and allowed a drawback of two cents.

Mr. COLLAMER. Does the Senator propose to repeal the drawback?

Mr. SHERMAN. This section of the House bill proposes to give the full six cents as the bounty, so that we get no revenue.

Mr. COLLAMER. But how does the Senator propose to have it?

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment is to strike out the drawback here, leaving the old drawback to stand. This amendment leaves the present drawback of two cents a pound as a compensation against the duty imposed by the law and to put our home manufacturer on as good a footing as the English manufacturer. I do not know whether it accomplishes that purpose. My desire was to leave this whole question open for the committee of conference. Gentlemen who have conversed with me from the manufacturing States say that this is not fair to their States.

Mr. COLLAMER. We cannot live under it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to be oppressive, but at the same time I do not want to refund a tax which we have levied and which we have levied alike on all cotton. I do not want to give up those taxes merely to induce the manufacture here.

Mr. ANTHONY. The internal revenue tax upon a pound of cotton manufactured is a great deal more than the drawback. I do not know what language to use to make it plainer, that when we impose a tax upon the raw material we should allow a drawback upon the exported manufactured article. I think that principle runs through our whole legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is done except in this case. There is no other manufacture in which the raw article is exported from this country to the foreign manufacturer. For instance, when a steam engine is made in this country and is exported, we allow a drawback of the last tax, not of all the taxes, the five per cent. tax on the manufacture, and then it must come in competition with an engine made in England, and the raw material out of which it is made being all furnished in England free of tax, to put our home manufacturer on the same footing with the English manufacturer we must allow a drawback. That is clear and manifest, and that the law does; but in this case we produce the cotton, we levy a tax upon the cotton, it goes to England and is there manufactured. There is the difference.

Mr. ANTHONY. That theory would hold good if there was no cotton used by the English manufacturers except what they get from this country; but a very large portion, much the largest portion, of the English cotton goods are manufactured from cotton that is raised in other countries and that comes into England without paying any duty whatever. We have a considerable export of cotton goods; I suppose my colleague can tell better than I can how much it is; I suppose it is not over four or five million dollars' worth at present; it has been more than that. If this amendment prevails not a yard of cotton goods can be exported, and we shall have to send out of the country an equivalent value in gold to make up for the deficiency. All the cottons that we send to Brazil, where we are competing with the English, would be cut off.

Mr. HOWE. How cut off? Do they not pay the same duty?

Mr. ANTHONY. They do not pay the same duty, because they manufacture from cotton that pays no duty. They will not get it from us cheaper if we have to pay six cents a pound duty.

Mr. CLARK. Allow me to ask the Senator from Ohio a question on this point. I understand him to say that if a tax is laid upon cotton in this country, and a drawback is laid when it goes abroad, it produces nothing to the revenue.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does not on the cotton itself.

Mr. CLARK. If you lay such a tax as to kill all your export trade, are you not exactly in the same condition?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not believe that will follow. I do not see how it can.

Mr. CLARK. If it could follow, we should be in the same condition precisely.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, if that was the fact.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think my friend from Ohio is entirely mistaken in this case. In the first place the drawback in all such cases is allowed to enable our manufacturers to compete with those of England in the same material. They receive in England the cotton without paying any duty.

Mr. SHERMAN. They do not receive ours unless they pay this six cents.

Mr. JOHNSON. What I mean to say is that there is no duty imposed upon it in the hands of the English importer.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes there is.

Mr. COWAN. We do not allow a drawback on raw cotton; that is the peculiarity.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understand that very well. This tax is six cents on the pound. How many pounds of cotton does it take to make one pound of cloth?

Mr. CONNESS. I feel interested in hearing this discussion. I do not think it belongs to a few Senators. I trust the Senator from Maryland will address the whole Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Sometimes it is objected to me that I speak rather too loud. How many yards of cloth does it take to make one pound of cotton? There is an allowance of twenty per cent. for waste, which is hardly good for anything. You get the tax on that, do you not? Six pounds of cotton make five pounds of cloth. You get that. Is it not all-important that our cotton manufacturers should be put upon a footing to compete with the English manufacturers? We now do compete, as I understand; we have done it for a good while in the coarser kinds of cloth; we send cotton goods all over the world; but if you refuse to allow this drawback we shall not be able to send any. There are some of the manufacturers in the East, I think, whose establishments have been constructed for the very purpose of competing with the English manufacturers, and to refuse this drawback will close their doors; and therefore, even if you did not get revenue by this particular mode of taxation, you get it in another way; you get it because our ability to compete abroad increases very much the wealth of the country, and upon that increase of wealth you have the power to tax and you do tax. You tax this very product; and the direct internal tax, as my friend from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] suggests, amounts to more than would be this drawback, and if you break down the trade you lose that direct tax at once.

Mr. HENDERSON. Under the law of 1864 a tax of two cents a pound was imposed on the raw material, cotton, and in section one hundred and seventy-one, in relation to drawback, it was provided that "there shall be an allowance or drawback on all articles on which any internal duty or tax shall have been paid, except raw or unmanufactured cotton, refined coal-oil, naphtha, benzine or benzole, distilled spirits, manufactured tobacco, snuff, and cigars of all descriptions, equal in amount to the duty or tax paid thereon, and no more." But when they came to cotton manufactured they declared that an additional drawback should be allowed. Under that law, upon cotton manufactured, an ad valorem duty of five per cent. was imposed, and whenever an exportation takes place, of course that five per cent. ad valorem is paid back to the manufacturer or to the party exporting; but the law-makers of 1864 were not satisfied with that drawback, but they gave an additional drawback. The provision is in a proviso to section one hundred and seventy-one:

"And provided further, That in computing the allowance or drawback upon articles manufactured exclusively of cotton, when exported, there shall be allowed, in addition to the five per cent. duty which shall have been paid on such articles, a drawback of two cents per pound upon such articles, in all cases where the duty imposed by law upon the cotton used in the manufacture thereof has been previously paid; the amount of said allowance to be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

Much to my astonishment Senators rise and say that if the proposition of the committee shall be adopted it will be utterly impossible any more to export cotton fabrics from this country abroad. Why? Will some Senator tell me why? I do not understand it. Does not the cotton manufacturer, when he exports the article, get back what he paid? He surely does; he gets back every dollar paid under the revenue law. Does he not get it back just as any other exporter of an article gets it back? Take the article of tobacco, that is manufactured very largely in my State. I ask Senators if there is any difference whatever between the cases. When we export the article of tobacco what do we get back? We get back the thirty-five cents a pound that we paid upon the article. Do we get back the two dollars a gallon on the whisky and brandy used in its manufacture? Do we get back the duties paid by the owners of the sugar and the liquors that go into the manufactured article? Why not give all that back to us? Large quantities of brandy are used in the manufacture of tobacco, upon which we have to pay two dollars per gallon first proof.

Mr. FARWELL. Allow me to ask the Senator if the weight of tobacco is not increased very much when it is manufactured from the leaf to the exported product?

Mr. HENDERSON. Not at all. I can tell the Senator that brandy is used simply for the purpose of preserving the article, and that it is largely or nearly entirely evaporated. It may increase somewhat, but not materially, and we get no drawback for that article; we only get the drawback on the thirty-five cents a pound we pay after the article has been manufactured.

Now, we are told most strangely, indeed, that unless the manufacturer of cotton gets back the tax that was paid by the man who purchased the article of cotton in Louisiana, or in Alabama, he cannot afford to export it. I do not put my judgment above that of other Senators, but I say that if that be true you ought not to levy this tax upon the cotton, for it is an export tax. How dare you levy an export tax, anyhow? If this be an export tax, how can you levy it? If it be justifiable in any sense of the word to levy this tax on cotton, it is simply because the demand in other portions of the world is such as to make the foreign manufacturer pay the tax that is levied on the raw material. Is it not so? Why do you levy this tax of six cents a pound on the raw material of cotton in this country now? It is simply because you believe the demand for the article in Europe is such that you can make the manufacturers in England and France pay the tax. If you cannot do that what right have you to impose this unjust burden on the man that is bound to export cotton from this country? It is indirectly an export tax, unless the demand of foreign countries be such as to justify you in imposing this tax and refusing drawback, because you do not allow the drawback on the exported article in the raw or unmanufactured shape. Why is this? It is simply because you believe the foreign manufacturer will pay the duty. If you cannot make the foreign manufacturer pay it, you have no right to levy it, and you cannot levy it without breaking down an industrial pursuit. Is not that proposition as clear as any proposition can be? Why is it that the Constitution says that you shall not levy an export tax? Because, if Congress had that power, where an article of industry in this country was produced in any State in excess of the demand in this country, the people of that State would be literally ruined.

Now, why is it not proposed to levy this tax on cotton? Simply because you can make the foreign manufacturer pay it. If that is true, how do you hurt the manufacturer in this country by refusing to give him a drawback on the raw material after it is manufactured? I say this proposition cannot be gainsaid: if you cannot make the foreign manufacturer pay this tax which you levy when the article is exported, you ought not to levy it; if you can make him pay it, you ought not to allow the manufacturer to have the drawback when he exports. You give the manufacturer everything that you took from him. It is true you have increased the price of the cotton in the hands of the manufacturer, but can the foreigner get it without having the increased price put upon it? Can he get it without having this six cents tax imposed upon it? He cannot, and you all know it. If he can get it otherwise, you are not justified by the Constitution, by common sense, by reason, by common regard to the industrial pursuits of other portions of the country, in levying any such tax; but if you can make him pay for it, he cannot get the cotton any cheaper than our manufacturers can, and cannot get it as cheap, because he has to pay not only the six cents a pound, but the cost of transportation, the laws of interest, and everything of that sort, before he can get hold of the raw material. When he does get it, he can manufacture probably no cheaper than our manufacturers. If he can manufacture as cheap, we come in fair competition. From the manufacturer we now take five per cent. ad valorem. Under this bill we propose to take six per cent. ad valorem, and when he comes to export to give him back every dime we took from him.

What is this proposition? A man in the city of New Orleans purchases cotton. A gets it there; he sells it to B, B sells it to C, C sells it to D, D sells it to the manufacturer in Baltimore or Boston, Rhode Island or Connecticut, or elsewhere, wherever it is manufactured, and it is manufactured in a great many places. When it is put into the manufactured fabric by the manufacturer he has to pay six per cent. ad valorem under this bill. When he exports the article he gets back the six per cent.; but he says, "I am not satisfied with that." Why? "A, down at New Orleans, when he got this cotton paid six cents a pound tax on the raw material, and I want that also handed back to me." I say he never paid a dollar of it; but he says somebody paid it. It is true somebody paid it; but did the foreign manufacturer get the cotton which he used for one cent less than the manufacturer here? If he did, do not impose the tax. Hence I voted for striking out the tax. I saw that the manufacturers of the northern States did not feel easy under the provision; they did not like it; they thought we of the West were doing them injustice. Then I said, "I am perfectly willing to go back to first principles; strike out the tax on cotton entirely, and then you cannot grumble." They did not see, however, that they would be any better off. The foreign manufacturer gets the raw material as cheap as our manufacturer, except the cost of transportation, loss of interest, &c.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask my friend from Missouri whether it is not strictly in accordance with the spirit of the Constitution that all articles of every kind when exported should be relieved of any internal burden, simply for the reason that the Constitution forbids any duty upon exports, and whether, therefore, it would not be right, if the raw material is taxed and then exported, to allow a drawback upon that; whether if it be manufactured and exported the drawback ought not to be allowed upon that; whether, in other words, the drawback is not for the purpose of accommodating our internal system of taxation to the provisions of the Constitution which forbids a duty on exports.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no time certainly to enter into that constitutional question; nor do I know that I am qualified without further examination to discuss it. I am stating now what my course was in the Senate. The Constitution says that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

Mr. DAVIS. If the honorable Senator will permit me, I will make a single suggestion. It seems to me that that inhibition of any duty on any article to be exported is in the form in which it is proposed to be exported; and any tax put upon the article before it had assumed the form in which it was proposed to be exported could not be the subject of drawback.

Mr. HENDERSON. I am not disposed to be led into a discussion of that question, because it will take up more time than the Senate has or will have. I am speaking of it now as a question of policy, and of the course that I pursued in committee, and the course I am willing now to pursue before the Senate. I am willing to vote with gentlemen who are interested in the manufacture of this raw material, to strike the whole tax out, or I am willing to sustain the report of the committee as presented, so far as my vote is concerned; and of course I carry no further influence than my own vote. If gentlemen insist on taxing cotton, the raw material, they certainly do it upon the ground that it can stand the tax; that the foreign manufacturer must pay the tax we levy here. It can be done on no other ground. It cannot be justified otherwise. You may talk about this constitutional question as much as you please; but if you have the right to come into my State and to say to my State, growing an agricultural article of production in excess of the demand in this country, that you will impose a duty upon the raw material and compel us to export it without giving us a drawback, you can break down the industry of any State in the Union. I do not intend to discuss the constitutional question, but I say the practical effect would be the destruction of the industry of any one of the States of this Union. You cannot levy this tax without admitting that the foreign manufacturer is bound to pay it; and if that be true I take it for granted you ought not to have a drawback after you have manufactured the article. Therefore I say that so far as my vote goes, if you insist that the raw material shall pay the tax, I shall insist after that that you shall not have a drawback except to the amount you paid upon the manufactured article, the six per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, in my opinion no tax can be imposed upon the raw article, the cotton, that is exported, and no impost or tax can be imposed upon any article that is presented at the port of departure for exportation. No impost tax can be placed upon wheat because in that form it is proposed to export the article. When wheat is made into flour and is proposed to be exported, the ship loaded, and a clearance obtained, no tax can be imposed upon the flour; and if the wheat has paid an internal tax, you cannot ask a return to the exporter of the amount of internal tax paid upon wheat. I present that article simply for illustration. My idea is that where an article is produced in the country, and by the process of any manufacture its form is changed, it is only the impost upon the form that it has assumed when it is proposed to be exported that can be claimed as a drawback. But a return of any tax imposed on it in any form in which it had existed before this transformation into the particular condition or form in which it is proposed to be exported could not be claimed as a drawback. The article prohibiting the tax is simply that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

It is the article that is proposed to be exported to which this prohibition of tax implies. You may extract bullion from the mines. That is a raw material. You cannot, in my opinion, tax the exportation of bullion in that form; but if you work it up into plate and jewelry, and propose to export that, that plate and jewelry are subject to exportation, but the exporter of them in that form is not entitled to a drawback for any tax that was imposed internally upon the original article.

On the subject of cotton I entertain a very confident opinion, and a very clear one, to my own mind at least. Cotton is a raw material in its raw state. If it is proposed to be exported in that form you cannot impose a tax upon the export, because it is an article in that form that is proposed to be exported; but if you spin that cotton into yarn, you cannot in exporting the yarn claim a drawback for any tax imposed internally upon the original cotton wool. The same is true where cotton is manufactured into cloth or into any fabric whatever. If you propose to export the fabric that is manufactured from cotton in that form, it is exempt from any export duty; but if you export it in that form the exporter cannot claim as a drawback any tax that has been imposed upon the raw material or the cotton wool, or even upon the cotton-spun yarn. He is simply entitled to an exemption for tax upon the article in the form in which he proposes to export it. He is entitled to exemption of any impost tax upon the article that he proposes to export. The inquiry is, what articles does he propose to export? If it is the raw cotton, he is entitled to exemption from an impost duty upon the article in that form. If it is a cotton fabric, he is entitled to exemption for any impost duty upon the article in that form; but he is not entitled, as a drawback, to any impost duty that has been paid upon the raw material before it has been manufactured into cloth. I think that is the whole of it, and very plainly so.

Mr. SUMNER. This is a very important question. I really wish that it could have the attention of the Senate. It certainly has not had it thus far. I believe, upon the whole, that the proposition of the Senator from Ohio to strike this whole section out and carry it to the conference committee is the best thing that can be done under the circumstances, though I think that ought not to be done without the consideration of the Senate, so that the committee may have, in a certain sense, instructions from the Senate as to what course they shall pursue. Thus far in the debate the discussion has been confined to the latter part of the clause relating to a drawback. It is that that has occupied the attention of the Senator from Kentucky, and also of the Senator from Missouri; but to my mind the earlier part of the clause is perhaps more important in its bearings. The latter part, which the Senator from Missouri discussed, relating specifically to the drawbacks, is necessarily applicable only to those cottons that are exported. Now, the tax of six cents a pound, which is imposed in the beginning of the section, is applicable to all cottons at home; and it is to that that I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio. If that tax is imposed without some corresponding change in the tariff the greater part of the cotton mills of our country must stop. So far as cotton is manufactured at the West, the business will be suspended. In New England—

Mr. SPRAGUE. They are about all stopped now.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; the Senator says they are about all stopped now.

Mr. CLARK. Then they cannot start again.

Mr. SUMNER. They cannot start then, as the Senator from New Hampshire suggests; but there is the practical point which has not been touched in this discussion thus far. If you impose a tax of six cents on cotton you make it impossible for the American product to compete with the English product. The result will be that your country will be flooded with the English cottons manufactured from Surat cotton. They are coming in now; but then if you add a tax of six cents a pound, the flood will go on until the cotton business of this country will be entirely overflowed. I have one or two figures relating to that point which are important:

"Goods from Surat cotton, three and a half yards to the pound, forty-eight threads warp and forty-eight threads filling, come in at one cent and a quarter per square yard. Now a tax on cotton of six cents per pound would be a tax of nearly two cents a yard on these goods; six per cent. on the manufacture would be from one to three cents more; and even with gold at 200 these English-made goods would come in freely. I am told that Mr. Stewart, in New York, is now importing freely."

Mr. GRIMES. Will not all that be remedied by increasing the tax?

Mr. SHERMAN. That whole difficulty has grown out of an error in the former tariff law. If a line had been engrossed as it should have been that defect would have been corrected.

Mr. SUMNER. But the practical point I was coming to is, will it be corrected? If, for instance, you raise the tax on cotton to six cents a pound without some corresponding change in the tariff, where are you? The point that I am calling the attention of the Senate to is precisely this, that with an increase of the tax on cotton to six cents a pound, and without any corresponding change in the tariff, you ruin the cotton business of the country. I do not go into the question of drawback which other Senators have discussed. I confine myself to the question of the tax of six cents a pound on cotton. As this whole subject is now going to pass into the hands of a conference committee I desire that the committee should be prepared to deal with that aspect of the question, and that if they do impose a tax on cotton they shall see that the tariff is amended so as to correspond.

Mr. SHERMAN. The tariff bill is now pending in the House of Representatives, and I presume will be passed. The defect to which the Senator refers will, I think, be corrected. I am perfectly willing to give a reasonable and fair protection, more than equal to our internal tax. I am here now between two fires, and I wish to state the position in which we are placed. A number of Senators are opposed to all tax on cotton on the ground of principle. Other Senators say they are opposed to the tax on cotton unless we will allow a drawback on that which is manufactured at home and exported abroad; and between the two I am afraid we shall lose all revenue from this article, from which I think we ought to derive a large revenue.

There is no constitutional difficulty in the way. The Senator from Kentucky a while ago stated the correct principle. We may levy a tax on the horses of this country, and if they are exported certainly the duty that had been paid upon them would not be remitted. So of carriages; we may levy a tax on carriages here in this country, and if we should happen afterward to export the carriages no one would think of refunding the tax. We may levy a tax on cotton or any other production of this country; and if we levy it on what is consumed at home as well as what is exported abroad it is not an export tax. An export tax within the meaning of the Constitution is a tax levied on an exported article from which the article consumed at home is exempt. That is the meaning and the definition given in the books on taxation. An export duty is a duty levied on the exported article. Where the duty applies to the article consumed at home and abroad it is not an export duty. It is a duty or an excise according to the nature of the article taxed. There is no difficulty, therefore, in my judgment, in the way of our taxing cotton.

The question is how can we levy that tax so as not to do injury to our own industry? The Senator from Rhode Island said that the domestic manufacturer labored under some difficulty in competing with the foreigner. That is a mistake. By the tax on manufactures there is a duty of five per cent. internal tax levied on all manufactures of cotton, and not one cent more in any form. That is the aggregate of internal taxation on manufactures of cotton in any form. When this manufactured article is exported every cent of that is refunded under the operation of the law as it now stands. The Senator from Missouri is right on that point. If these manufactured cotton goods are exported to a foreign country every cent of duty paid here at home is refunded in the first instance, so that the article may be exported free of any duty whatever levied in this country. That was done to put the manufactured article here on the same footing with the article manufactured abroad. That is the present law. Now Senators want us to impose a duty of six cents on all cotton, to be levied on the English purchaser as well as upon the home purchaser, so that they are then put on the same footing precisely, and then after that is done they want us to say to the home manufacturer, "If you will manufacture this cotton in Lowell we will pay you back all the duty we collected from you."

Mr. COLLAMER. If it is exported, not manufactured.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, if you will manufacture it at Lowell and send it abroad we will pay you back all we collected from you; but we will not pay the Englishman who has taken it to Manchester and manufactured it. In other words, we pay to our home manufacturers, in addition to the drawbacks already allowed by law, a direct bonus or bounty of six cents a pound for all that is manufactured in this country for foreign markets.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator should remember that the Englishman has another kind of cotton out of which he can manufacture the coarse goods and drive you out of the market if you impose that tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. On that point I will say I am willing to give to our manufacturers an amount of drawback on raw cotton equal to the amount of our duty on raw cotton. That puts them certainly on the same footing. I am willing to go farther. I am willing to admit this Surat cotton free of duty, and put you precisely on the same footing as the English manufacturer; and then I am willing in addition to that to give you a larger duty on the manufactured article so as to enable you fairly to compete with foreigners.

Mr. CLARK. I want the Senator to think for a moment whether we can tax a product so fine as our cotton to that extent that it can be made to compete with the coarse Surat cotton.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to do anything to put the domestic manufacturer on a footing with the foreign manufacturer; but I am not willing to put my hands into the Treasury of the United States, and give every man who manufactures a pound of cotton in this country for exportation six cents a pound on his exportation. That is the result of it. I am perfectly willing to let the present law stand, which gives you the two cents a pound, which was intended as a kind of offset.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will permit me, that assumes that if you tax the cotton that goes into the article to be manufactured you will not be driven out of the market, as you undoubtedly will.

Mr. SHERMAN. Why?

Mr. CLARK. When you tax the cotton and manufacture taxed cotton, and attempt to export the fabric, you will lose your entire foreign market.

Mr. GRIMES. How much is the foreign market?

Mr. CLARK. It has been from three to five and six millions a year.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the history of the last three years has shown that when cotton was worth more than one dollar a pound the English people came here and got all they could of it; and when it goes down they will gladly come here and pay the reduced price and pay the six cents a pound to us, and carry it abroad and manufacture it.

Mr. CLARK. I do not desire to disturb the Senator in his argument; but I will ask him whether he would take the condition of things which has existed for three years in this disturbed state of the market as a criterion on which to judge of trade? For two or three years the British could not get this Surat or Egyptian cotton in any sufficient supply, and they were obliged to take our cotton at almost any price; but now they have got the market full of that kind of cotton, and are under no necessity of taking ours, no further than ours is unquestionably the better article.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to put the two on the same footing in the purchase of cotton, and then give the American manufacturer any reasonable amount of protection for the home consumption. I have sufficiently explained my purpose. My own conviction is that it is better to let the drawback stand precisely as it is now, to levy the increased duty on cotton, giving the drawback of two cents a pound under the present law. But in order to leave the matter open I am perfectly willing that the suggestion of the Committee on Finance be acted upon, and the whole section be stricken out and the matter left to a conference committee.

Mr. CLARK. My judgment is that at this late period of the session the amendment of the committee had better be adopted; and I want to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that when we laid a duty of two cents a pound on cotton we thought it wise to put on a drawback; and now he proposes to put on four cents additional, twice the amount put on in the first place, and give no drawback. It would ruin the trade.

Mr. SPRAGUE. In this connection, I desire to state very briefly the condition of the manufacture of cotton in this country. It is peculiar. I wish every Senator to know the fact, and I state it as a fact, that one fourth of the cotton manufacturing of this country at the present time is employed and three fourths is idle. It is owing to the taxes; it is owing to the condition of the country; it is owing to the restrictions upon the outlet of cotton; and it is owing more, perhaps, than to any other cause, to the restrictions in the cultivation of cotton. The difficulties attending its production have so increased the price that there is not a manufacturer in the country to-day who is willing to buy the article. Nobody can afford to pay the price that is required to manufacture and to bring into market any article of cotton. A yard of cotton cloth which a few years ago could be purchased at five or ten cents a yard is to-day from forty to fifty cents a yard; and that is purchased by those people who are unable and cannot afford to pay for the article they require. There is no article that they can use as they can use cotton. They cannot use woolen in certain seasons of the year. They are obliged to use cotton.

Sir, the policy of the Government as exhibited by this tax bill, is to tax an article which the people of the country require as a necessity, and the price of which, if produced, is beyond anything they can purchase. The result of that policy is that the great manufacturing interest of this country has been obliged to reduce its operations, to my personal experience, to one fourth its usual operations. The people of this country will not consume the article which you tax. You would derive more revenue from a duty of three per cent. on cotton than you would from a duty of five per cent. or six per cent. as you now propose. I find fault with the policy of those who have charge of taxing the industry of this country that they do not seem to discriminate between those articles that are subject to the conditions of this war and those articles that are not. Here is this article of cotton. I ask Senators to look at it. The price of cotton has risen from ten cents a pound up to two dollars; and still the Senate of the United States seem to find no pleasure except in continuing to tax it. It is an article that is used by the poorest class of the people of this country.

I have very little interest in making these suggestions to the Senate. I do not care one iota, so far as I am personally concerned, what tax they impose upon cotton or its manufacture. But, sir, these increased taxes affect a class of persons that can ill afford to pay them. The salary and wages of the persons who wear and consume this article, even at this time, will not permit them to pay this exorbitant price which has been occasioned by this war, by the blockade, and by the taxes imposed by the Government.

Sir, nothing has made me tremble more, or fear more for the safety of this Government, than the discriminations which I have seen exhibited by those who have charge of levying taxes and duties upon the interests of the country. Such discriminations are made and duties are imposed on interests ill able to bear them in almost every item of the bill under discussion. From the votes that we have had here this evening I have no hopes that the industry of this country will in any way be protected; that those who have a right to be protected, those who are poor, those who require a cheap commodity, will in any way be regarded here. I simply desire to enter my protest against this constant, this every day desire on the part of Senators, who apparently see but one great interest to tax, and seeing no other, desire to tax that regardless of whom it may affect.

Mr. SHERMAN. I rise for the purpose of asking the Senate to let us take a vote at once on these various amendments. This bill has yet to go for revision in its various features to a committee of conference, and then when that committee have reported, every Senator can vote for or against the result of that report. The state of business is such that it is almost indispensable that we should finish this bill to-night. It must go to a committee of conference at any rate. To-morrow we shall have the Indian bill, the civil bill, the tariff bill, and I do not know how many others. I therefore appeal to the Senate to let us take a vote on these various amendments, and let the bill go to a committee of conference, and then each Senator can act as he chooses on the report of that committee. It is an unpleasant mode of proceeding; it is a totally indefensible system of legislation ordinarily, but we are just in that condition that we are compelled to do this or the bill will be lost. I shall withhold any debate myself upon the various amendments, unless where explanations are required, and I shall even not oppose one or two amendments to which I am much opposed, especially that in relation to bank taxation, in order to have them presented to a conference committee, and then when that committee shall submit a report every Senator can vote for or against that report.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On any ordinary measure I would agree to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio, but on this bill I will not. Rather than submit this measure to a committee of conference to legislate for us without the possibility of our knowing what the law is that is to tax the people, I will stay here day after day until we adjourn. Yes, sir, I will consider an extra session a calamity much less than the misfortune to the country of passing this tax bill without every Senator who desires to understand it having an opportunity to understand it. I think that the bill has come before this body in a very singular shape. It is a very difficult bill to understand. We cannot read the bill and know what it is. We must examine the past legislation of the country, and know to some extent the confused decisions of a not very competent officer in the Treasury Department. I speak of the head of the Revenue Department of the Treasury, not of the Secretary. Whether we can get through this bill or not to-night, I do not choose to discuss. I will sit here as long as it is the pleasure of the Senate to stay; but I am not willing to extend this system of legislation by committees of conference.

I have a little to say about the particular question that is before the body. I understand the proposition of the Senator from Ohio to be to strike out all after the tenth line of this section. I will ask the Senator if that is so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; but I intend to withdraw it. I will allow it to stand so as to hear what the Senator has to say on the subject; but I have made up my mind to let the whole section go out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, I supposed this was a bill for revenue, and not a bill for protection; and I understood this section to be based upon the idea that we might look to the production of cotton in this country as a source of revenue. The tax now is two cents per pound. This bill for a time proposes that it shall be six cents; that the production of cotton will justify that tax, whatever use may be made of the cotton. If that is the judgment of the Senate, let it be so; but I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Rhode Island that this is a very terrible tax. Cotton used to be produced in this country, and sold to the manufacturer at eight cents a pound, and then the people got clothes that they could pay for. The Senator from Rhode Island intimates that the price will soon go up to such a point that the people will not be able to buy clothes. I do not desire to see that. I do not expect to vote for this very high tax; but if it be adopted by the Senate at six cents a pound, then upon what idea is it adopted? That the cotton, when produced, will bear that tax, whether sold to the foreigner, or sold to our own manufacturer. If I understood correctly the position of the Senator from Kentucky, I do not quite agree with him.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator permit me to state my position in a word or two? It is simply this: a drawback may be allowed upon the export of articles upon two principles: first, that the article is not properly subject to the tax in the form in which it is proposed to be exported. For instance, whisky is taxed at the distillery. If whisky in that form is exported, my opinion is that the tax upon the whisky that has been paid in that form may be refunded, and ought to be refunded, because in that form, being exported, it is not subject to a tax at all. But, on the contrary, if cotton is manufactured into a fabric in that form, and if it is exported, it is not subject to a tax at all, because there is a prohibition of a tax upon exports; but the man who exports it is not entitled to have a drawback for any tax that has been imposed upon the raw cotton wool, upon the principle that raw cotton wool if it is exported in that form would not itself be subject to a tax; in other words, that it is only the article in the form in which it is proposed to be exported that is prohibited from being taxed by the provision of the Constitution which prohibits any tax upon exports. I admit that Congress may give the benefit of a drawback—I may call it a drawback—upon the exported cotton fabric; but that is not a protection given under the provision of the Constitution which says that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State."

It would be simply in the nature of a premium or a bounty upon the export of the article in that form. My own opinion is that the raw material ought not to be taxed for home consumption, because, in my judgment, it would be impolitic and would be oppressive to the people to put this tax upon the raw material that is to be manufactured and consumed at home.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I hope the Senator from Kentucky will take it in good part if I suggest to him that he always expresses himself so very clearly that it is but seldom necessary for him to interrupt any gentleman to restate his position. I think I understood him correctly before.

I think myself that an internal tax may be imposed upon any article if that tax has no reference to its exportation; but if it be a tax with a view to the exportation, it cannot be laid. Suppose there are a thousand bales of cotton produced in any particular locality. Those thousand bales may be taxed at the rate of six cents a pound in the locality where they are produced, and afterward a portion of them may be sold to the manufactory in the northern States, and a portion may be taken to port and sold abroad; but they go out with the cost that is upon them at the time they reach the port. One objection that I have to this section is, that I think, in spirit, it does violate the Constitution. It proposes that the cotton that is used in this country shall not pay six cents tax, but that all cotton that is exported and sold abroad shall pay six cents. Although in words it may not be a violation of the Constitution, it is in effect. I should like to have the attention of the chairman to that proposition, that as the section stands it taxes cotton that is used in the country nothing.

Mr. HOWE. Oh, no.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir, it taxes it nothing, for the reason that if the manufactured article be carried out of the country, then there is a drawback to the full extent of this tax.

Mr. SHERMAN. But that which is consumed at home will have to pay the tax.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is so. I am speaking of the article that is manufactured in the country and afterward in the manufactured condition sold abroad. To that extent it pays no tax, while all cotton that is intended for exportation is to pay six cents. In spirit, to that extent, I think it is a violation of the Constitution; but I do not care about discussing that question at this time.

Now, sir, what right have the eastern States to ask of us that there shall be a tax of six cents a pound upon cotton, and that they shall be allowed to recover that back from our people if they sell to us; but if they go into foreign markets to compete with manufacturers abroad, that that shall be refunded? I cannot see the right of it. All that they can ask of us in imposing a tax upon cotton is that they shall have an equal chance in the markets there and in the markets abroad. In the markets at home they have more than an equal chance, because they have the protection of the tariff. They have a protection of thirty, or forty, or perhaps fifty per cent. here at home; and then if they pay the same tax upon the cotton that the foreigner has to pay to us when he buys the cotton, it is certainly all they can ask. Has it ever been known before that they shall have an advantage given to them in their efforts to secure a foreign market? Heretofore it has been considered enough if they were placed upon equal terms and their enterprise and their labor were not crippled by any legislation on our part; but now they ask the advantage of six cents on every pound of cotton that they convert into fabrics which they propose to sell abroad. I think it is not right; and if the Senator from Ohio withdraws his amendment I shall renew it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Do you want a vote upon it?
Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; I think the proposition ought to be adopted.

Mr. SPRAGUE. It is proposed here to tax cotton six cents a pound, while cotton can be produced in other countries without any taxation whatever at as cheap a price as the cheapest in this country. I ask the Senate to understand that when they are voting on this question. The cotton produced in Mexico, in Central America, and in Egypt, is as favorable to any fabrics that are used by the people as the cotton that is produced in any portion of this country. You tax the cotton produced in this country, and permit the cotton to be manufactured in England untaxed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, to strike out all after line ten of section three.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will withdraw that, and let the vote be taken on the section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Very well; I will let it go.
The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance to strike out the whole of section three. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will offer at this place, from the Finance Committee, a new section which I believe will be satisfactory to everybody. It comes in appropriately at this portion of the bill, and therefore I would rather have it here:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1865, the gross amount of all duties, taxes, and revenues received or collected by virtue of the several acts to provide internal revenue to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt, and of any other act or acts that may now, or hereafter, be in force connected with the internal revenues, shall be paid by the officers, collectors, or agents receiving or collecting the same, daily into the Treasury of the United States, under the instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury, without any abatement or deduction on account of salary, compensation, fees, costs, charges, expenses, or claims of any description whatever, anything in any law to the contrary notwithstanding. And all moneys now directed by law to be paid to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, including those derived from the sale of stamps, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States by the party making such payment; and a certificate of such payment, stating the name of the depositor, and the specific account on which the deposit was made, signed by the Treasurer, Assistant Treasurer, and designated depositaries, or proper officer of the deposit bank, and transmitted to and received by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be deemed a compliance with the law requiring payment to be made to the Commissioner, any law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That in districts where from the distance of the officer, collector, or agent receiving or collecting such duties, taxes, or revenues from a proper Government depository, the Secretary of the Treasury may deem it proper, he may extend the time for making such payment, not exceeding, however, in any case, the period of one month.

And be it further enacted, That so much money as may be necessary for the payment of lawful expenses incident to carrying into effect the various acts relative to the assessment and collection of the internal revenues after the 30th day of June, 1865, until the 1st day of July, 1866, and not otherwise provided for, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. And it shall be the duty of such of the collectors of internal revenue as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct to act as disbursing agents to pay the aforesaid expenses without increased compensation therefor, and to give good and sufficient bonds and sureties for the faithful performance of their duties as such disbursing agents, in such sum and form as shall be prescribed by the First Comptroller of the Treasury and approved by the Secretary.

Mr. President, this is a very important provision, carefully prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury, and I believe heartily approved by every member of the Committee on Finance who has examined it. It applies the same rule in the receipt and disbursement of the funds from the internal revenue that are now applied to the receipt and disbursement of customs, and withdraws from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue all control over the money, and requires the money to be paid directly into the Treasury and paid out on warrants as any other money.

Mr. HOWE. This is a very important provision, as the Senator from Ohio states, and it is a very necessary one. I approve it entirely. I recollect a similar provision was drawn at the last session, and it was adopted by the Senate. It was then found necessary to make a great many amendments in the law in order to incorporate that with the law. I do not now recall all the amendments that were then necessary, but I recollect two provisions in the law which it seems to me will be very inconsistent with this; one of which directs the assessors of the several districts to audit the accounts of their assistant assessors and pay them by drafts on the collector; and that still stands. There is no other mode, as the law now stands, of auditing, settling, and paying the accounts of assistant assessors, except having them audited by the assessor, and paid by draft on the collector.

Mr. SHERMAN. We require in a previous amendment all these accounts to be submitted to the proper accounting officers.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator is mistaken. The accounts of the assistant assessors are not required to be presented to the proper accounting officers. There is another provision in the law which seems to me to be very incongruous with this. The law still retains in the employ of the Government a cashier of internal revenue, a salaried officer, giving a heavy bond, who will have nothing in the world to do if this amendment is adopted, as it ought to be adopted. I only call attention to these provisions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 45, section four, line eleven, after the word "benzole" to strike out the word "coal."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 45, section four, line thirteen, after the word "cotton" to strike out the words "manufactured tobacco, snuff, cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots;" so that the section will read:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the duties imposed in section ninety-four of the act to which this is an amendment, as hereinbefore amended, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon the goods, wares, and merchandise therein mentioned, except as hereinafter otherwise provided, an increase of one fifth or twenty per cent. of the duties or rates of duty now provided in said section, whether ad valorem or specific: Provided, That the additional duties or rates of duty herein mentioned shall not apply to coal illuminating oil, refined, and naphtha, benzine and benzole, coal, paper of all descriptions, printed books, magazines, pamphlets, reviews, and similar publications, cotton.

Mr. HENDERSON. I trust this amendment will not be agreed to. Whatever tax will be put upon tobacco will be placed in a previous section. The Senator from New Hampshire and myself have agreed upon that.

Mr. CLARK. This amendment should not be made, as we have arranged the tax in other parts of the bill. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not be agreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to inquire whether it is in order to move an amendment to this section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not until the amendments of the committee have been concluded.

The next amendment was to strike out the fifth section of the bill, in the following words:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of notes of any State bank or State banking association paid out by them after the 1st day of January, 1866.

Mr. GRIMES. On that I want a vote.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the Senator from Ohio who has charge of this bill to allow that amendment to be passed until we come to consider the one at the end of the bill, which, I suppose, he intends to propose in lieu of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to allow the action of the Committee on Finance to stand at present, and let the matter go to the committee of conference. We cannot enter into the debate on the subject now.

Mr. GRIMES. I want a vote upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Iowa wants it stricken out, and I want it retained.

Mr. GRIMES. I do not want it stricken out. I want it to stand.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want it stricken out, but I do not think we have time now to enter into a discussion of the subject.

Mr. CONNESS. Let us take a vote upon it.

Mr. GRIMES. It is useless to send a question of this kind to a committee of conference, when the Senate itself may be in favor of agreeing with the proposition of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance to strike out the fifth section of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES and Mr. HENDERSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. GRIMES. I have only one word to say in this connection. It is known to most members of this body, at any rate to all those who were here when the original bank bill was passed and when the amendment to it was passed a year ago, that I voted against both of those bills, because I did not believe at the time that it was expedient or wise for us to go into that system; but Congress decided otherwise, and the country has sustained Congress in that action. Now I think, if it be true, as the Senator from Ohio has told us, that these State banks, notwithstanding they have been diminished in number, have continued to increase the volume of their currency, so that they have out now somewhere between one and two hundred millions—

Mr. CLARK. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. HARRIS. They reduced their circulation over thirty millions last year.

Mr. GRIMES. My authority is the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have the official statements here.

Mr. GRIMES. If that be true, I say the Government must obtain some control over them, and we may just as well let these banks know at this time that at some future time they must adopt the other system of banking that has been agreed upon by Congress and sanctioned by the people, or they must close up their shops. Hence I am in favor of this proposition.

Mr. RAMSEY. I desire to offer an amendment to this section by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That banks incorporated under State authority, whose circulating notes are secured wholly by deposit of bonds of the United States at their par value to the amount of ten per cent. beyond the amount of their circulating notes, shall be taxed upon their circulation and deposits in the same manner and at the same rates as are, or may be, prescribed for the taxation of national banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, if the Senate is not willing to let this matter go to a committee of conference I am willing now to meet the question fairly. I think we must either repeal the national banking law or we must forbid the circulation of State banks. We are just in that predicament when in my judgment it is vitally necessary. I have a mass of documents and papers here, and intended at some length to explain to the Senate the importance of this question and my own views upon it; but I could not do so at this hour of the session. Although my strength is sufficiently preserved to do it, I do not want at this period of the session to speak to the Senate on the subject; nor do I want to delay a vote on the passage of this bill, because to do so, I think, would endanger the passage of the bill entirely.

The statement made by the Senator from Iowa is correct as to the great body of the States. The amount of circulation in 1863, in all the States now within our jurisdiction, including New Orleans, was $173,039,185. The amount in January, 1864, was $169,926,129, showing a small decrease in one year; but nearly all that decrease was in the States of Louisiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, Missouri, and Indiana. In the eastern States the increase during 1863 was millions.

Mr. CLARK. How much?

Mr. SHERMAN. About ten million dollars absolute increase.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator from Iowa said, and to that I took exception, that the increase had been almost one hundred million dollars.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now let me tell you the condition of affairs. In my State and other States, some of the State banks, availing themselves of the privileges of the national banking law, there being no restriction upon their State circulation, all the restrictive measures having failed at the last session, have actually organized under the national law, and have increased their State circulation and have received at the same time circulating notes under the national system, and are now going on and conducting business in that way. The amount of State circulation at this moment outstanding, and upon which there is a tax, was on the 1st of January, over one hundred and thirty-six million dollars. Although the amount of national circulation has gone up to something like eighty million, yet the amount of State circulation has not diminished one fourth of that; and the very banks that are organized under your national system are keeping and carrying on a double circulation on the same capital. Not only that, they have actually raised the question of law, whether they are bound to pay taxes on their old circulation, on the ground that the old corporations have ceased to exist and there is nobody to act. In my deliberate judgment, as the result of my sober conviction, we must put an end to one or the other of these systems.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Both.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin says "both." I do not think it wise to put an end to both. I think the national banking system has been a grand and great success, and I would stake my reputation upon it; but it cannot undergo this system of competition with State banks that are now increasing their issue. I have these tables furnished me by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and also by the Comptroller of the Currency, showing a state of affairs that I think ought at once to be checked. The House were at loggerheads about various propositions. Various taxes were proposed. Many members who were in favor of taxing State banks out of existence could not agree upon the terms. Finally, however, they did agree upon this fifth section. That will, I think, effectually do the work, and I trust, therefore, that the Senate will agree to the section. It is true a majority of the Committee on Finance recommended that it be stricken out; but I may say here, without disclosing any secrets, that was done, I believe, for the purpose of bringing it to the attention of the Senate as much as anything else. We were divided about it just as the Senate will be divided. My own convictions are strong on the subject, and I intended at some length to go into the details of the argument upon it; but I will not do so at this late period of the session, as we have barely a quorum present, and if we should break up at last without a quorum, all I should say here would only have to be repeated when we discussed it again; and yet I think it is our duty to stand by this bill and get it out of the way if we can to-night. There are many important questions lying behind it. I, for one, was willing to let this section be stricken out and trust to the committee of conference to keep in a section of this kind. I would rather see the whole banking system suspended one year than see the present condition of affairs continued, and I believe it would be better for the country to do it.

Mr. FARWELL. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee one question. I desire to ask him if he has got any information whether it was not possible for the Treasury to furnish these banks, if they had all chosen to enter into the national banking system, the circulation to supply the necessary amount previous to this time?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am told there is no trouble about that at all.

Mr. FARWELL. I believe with the Senator that the sooner we drive out the circulation of these banks the better.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state further that the House amendment does not operate until the 1st of January next. It gives to the State banks nearly one year to close up their business, and it will not operate very severely. It postpones the operation of all future taxes until the 1st of January. The amendment I have prepared at the close of this bill is based upon a different principle; but as a matter of course, if this fifth section is retained, I shall abandon that amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator from Ohio would give way to an adjournment. ["Oh, no."] It is half past eleven o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. We must get this bill out of the way to-night.

Mr. COWAN. We cannot pass it to-night. There is no use of attempting it.

Mr. CLARK. Let us make all the progress we can with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If we cannot pass it to-night we may as well kill the bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. This proposition has nothing to do with revenue. This is banking.

Mr. HOWE obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDERSON. Senators have to sleep at some time, and if we stay here to-night we shall have to sleep to-morrow. We must have rest; and I propose that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HOWE. I will give way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I make that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest, if Senators are impatient, that we read through the bill and dispose of everything else at any rate, and then we can talk about the question of adjournment.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not consent to that. If the Committee on Finance abandon revenue and commence a banking system, I hope we shall discuss it thoroughly. I will never consent to it as long as I can resist it in any proper way. I do not consider this section as belonging to revenue at all. I consider the whole proposition an outrage upon the States, and I feel it to be my duty to resist it as long as I am able to do so. If it were a revenue question I would go any extent, compromise anything; but it has nothing to do with revenue. It is to carry out a peculiar policy that I do not believe the country wants.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to inquire what is the question in order.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have moved that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri that the Senate do now adjourn, and that motion is not debatable.

Mr. CONNESS and Mr. SHERMAN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Sprague, and Van Winkle—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Lane of Indiana, Nye, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Willey, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—22.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOWE and Mr. CONNESS and Mr. TRUMBULL rose and addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor, he having yielded it to allow the motion to adjourn to be made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know how the Senator from Wisconsin can occupy the floor after a motion to adjourn has been made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He yielded it to allow the motion to be made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then he lost it, I apprehend. I do not understand that a Senator can give way and have a motion decided and still occupy the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not according to the strict construction of parliamentary rule, but it has always been customary in the Senate. Besides, the Senators all rose at once, and the Chair recognized the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CONNESS. I have no objection to the Senator's having the floor, if he does not propose to make a long speech.

Mr. HOWE. I do propose to make a long speech.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is somewhat extraordinary to me that a Senator can allow a motion to adjourn to be made and still occupy the floor after that motion is decided.

Mr. HOWE. I have been here but a few years; but in the course of the few years I have been here I never knew a gentleman to lose the floor by giving way to a motion to adjourn. That is the difference between the Senator's experience and mine.

I am sorry to have this question forced on the Senate when it is so thin, and at so late an hour. It is a question in which I feel a very deep interest. I would a great deal rather see the bill buried than to see that section adopted; and if that section be adopted, I shall vote to bury the bill. There is nothing more certain than that, if I live to vote upon the passage of the bill. There is no necessity for this, and in my humble judgment there is no justification for it whatever.

I am unlike the Senator from Iowa: I voted for this national bank system; I approved of it; I agree that it should supersede the State banks; but I dissent utterly and altogether from that intimation or suggestion which comes from several quarters that if it must supersede the State systems the sooner it supersedes them the better. It ought to supersede them; it is sure to supersede them, because it is a better system; but I did not think it was necessary to tell the Senator from Iowa; I did not think it was necessary to tell the Senate of the United States that it was an operation of some little delicacy to wind up a banking system; that you could not close out a circulation of one or two hundred million in a day without jarring somebody; and it is not necessary to jar the community in order to effect the very end that the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Iowa aim at.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Wisconsin will give way to a motion to adjourn I will make that motion, and will change my vote upon it.

Mr. HOWE. I will give way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the Senate adjourn. I think we shall accomplish nothing by sitting here longer to-night.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Davis, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Trumbull, and Van Winkle—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Nye, Sherman, Stewart, Willey, and Wilson—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—21.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOWE. I am unlike the Senator from Ohio. I have not a vast amount of facts or figures with which to treat the Senate to-night. I have some ideas about this question. I have already said I did not believe it is necessary for the country at large. As an apology for the interest I take in it, as an apology for the fact that I undertake to speak at all upon the question at this hour of the night, I will say that it is a measure which is full of peril to the people of the State I represent. I have heretofore explained the peculiar condition of the banking system in that State; I have heretofore told the Senate the impossibility of their being transferred suddenly from the system upon which they are now banking into this new, and as I believe, better system. I shall not pursue that topic to-night. I undertake to say that it is not necessary for the country at large that this very radical measure should be adopted.

The circulation of these State banks is not increasing. The Senator from Ohio has told you himself upon facts which he held in his hands that on the contrary it is diminishing. There is another fact of which I am very well advised: that banks are being transferred from the State to the national system to-day, and have been for months past, just as rapidly as the Comptroller of the Currency could provide for them. It requires some time, it requires some effort, to provide the circulation, to receive and examine the papers, and to perfect the organization of a bank upon the national system; and I am told that for months the transfer has gone on just as fast as the Comptroller of the Currency could provide for them.

It is said that some of those banks which have changed from State to national banks have not retired their circulation but still keep it out. That is a wrong in itself, and may be remedied as all wrongs may be if you are sensible; but one wrong cannot be remedied by repeating another. If you mean to stop that evil, address yourself to the correction of that evil, and not attempt to perpetrate another.

Mr. McDougall. I desire to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question. By what system does he propose to correct a thousand wrongs? As there will be ten thousand of these institutions, of which at least one tenth will be wrong, how will he correct the one tenth wrong?

Mr. HOWE. I could not very well tell exactly how to treat ten thousand wrongs until I saw them; and as I do not see but one or two just now, I will not undertake to treat the larger number.

It is very easy to impose a tax upon the circulation of those banks which have been transferred to the national system. That will correct that evil. But it does not seem to me to be right; it does not seem to me to be fair to hold up that fact, to hold up the wrong of a few isolated banks as a crime in the whole system, and to insist, because a few are doing wrong that therefore the whole system should be abandoned. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate at any length to-night. The Senate is in no mood to hear, and I have no desire to speak. I am utterly—

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator will yield to a motion to adjourn I will make that motion.

Mr. HOWE. I will yield in one moment to that motion. I am utterly opposed to this section. I think it more pernicious than any other one feature in the bill; and I think it has an amount of viciousness in it which overbalances all the virtue that the extreme friends of this bill can claim for it; and although I have supposed that I should support it, I have never called myself one its extreme friends. I will now give way to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I make that motion.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Doolittle, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Morrill, Powell, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, and Van Winkle—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Farwell, Foster, Grimes, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morgan, Nye, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Willey, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Carlile, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wright—23.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. With the consent of the Senator from Wisconsin, I now ask the Senate to act upon this amendment, to strike out the fifth section. I myself will vote to strike out the section for the present. I shall insist on maintaining it in the committee of conference. If Senators who are opposed to the section desire it stricken out, they can only assent to what I propose. Those who favor it will take the chance of saving it in a committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I sought to obtain the floor some time ago simply to express my dissent from the proposition of the Senator from Ohio to submit this legislation to a conference committee. He proposes that the Senate shall either adopt it or reject it, and he is indifferent which, and let the matter go to a committee of conference to be settled. Now, what is our condition? We have before us a bill that I venture to say not one single individual in this Senate off the Finance Committee understands. I confess I do not. I looked over the bill when it was printed and laid on our tables. I saw that it was so long and so complicated that it would be impossible for me, in the discharge of the other duties that were upon me, to understand it so as to act intelligently in reference to it, and therefore I have not undertaken to compare this bill with the existing law to understand its various provisions. I thought I should be able, probably, as we progressed with the bill to understand the main features of it so as to be able to vote intelligently upon most of the questions that would arise in the discussion of the bill.

Now it is proposed that we turn the matter over to a committee of conference. Why, sir, we might as well not consider this bill at all. When the committee of conference shall have acted upon it, they will come in here with a report, and what will be the argument? You will be told you cannot amend the report of a committee of conference—and such will be the decision of the Chair and of the Senate—it is a whole, an entirety; and then it will be said, on the part of the Finance Committee, "This bill is necessary for the maintenance of the Government; are you going to let a revenue measure fail?" These sagemen gentlemen who will vote to lay aside all other business to take up a revenue bill, will say, "Here is a revenue measure, and you must take it." "I am not for this provision," says one, "that taxes the banks ten per cent. and destroys all the State institutions in the country." "I am not for this provision," says another, "that does not tax out of existence these State banks; but here is a bill as an entirety; I cannot refuse to sustain the Government;" and thus we will all of us be compelled to vote for whatever the committee of conference bring in here.

It has always been bad enough that so much of our legislation was committed to committees of conference, but it is getting worse every year. When I first came to the Senate I thought it was very bad; but we used at that time to be able to consider to some extent the report of a committee of conference; but now it is not considered at all in this body. We have a bill now pending, I am told, in the hands of a committee of conference, which has on it the most important provisions, involving more than a million of money, that this Senate has ever seen. One of the appropriation bills passed the House of Representatives, and came here, and was amended to some extent. It then went back to the House of Representatives. The House have amended our amendments, increasing the appropriations more than a million dollars and then asked for a conference committee. The bill then came in here. Some Senator moved that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House. That motion carried as a matter of course. The amendments put upon the bill by the House were not read; not a Senator knew what they were, or knew they were on the bill. We agreed to the committee of conference; and there is now in the hands of the committee of conference of the two Houses a bill that has on it appropriations for more than a million dollars that have never been read in this body at all, and we shall never know what they are. By and by the report of that committee will come in here, and we shall hear that the fourteenth amendment of the House is agreed to, and the sixteenth amendment is disagreed to; and so on, numbering them up to fifty. If any Senator should then venture to ask to have the report explained, it will be said, "Here we are in the last days of the session; if any time is occupied in explanation and debate, it will defeat the bill; you must rely upon your committee of conference." I, for one, would just as soon vote here to-night that this Senate should not meet until eleven o'clock on Saturday morning, and when we meet agree to take the reports of the committee of conference that may be appointed, as to go on legislating in this way.

Now, I hope that no such course will be pursued with this bill. This important question that is now pending I want decided by the Senate, and I want the committee of conference, when it meets, to be instructed by the Senate as to what they are to insist upon, and not be indifferent about it whether we decide it one way or the other. The committee of conference should be the mere representative of the body that appoints them. That is the business of a committee of conference. It was never contemplated that a committee of conference should be the originators of measures and should be the legislators. The only parliamentary design of such committees was that the committee of each House should represent the sentiment of that House, and when the committees met together they should endeavor to compromise upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses. There is no disagreeing vote when you take such a course as is now proposed. The Senate, by a sort of acquiescence here, is asked either to vote this section in or out; and the chairman of the Committee on Finance tells us he is indifferent which, and does not care which; just let it go to a committee of conference, and they will fix it. Sir, I hope we are not to have such legislation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to make a simple statement in regard to this matter.

I am as much opposed to this form of legislation as the Senator from Illinois, and if I ever boasted of anything—and I do not know if I ever said it before—it is this: during the last Congress that I was a member of the House of Representatives no appropriation bill ever went to a committee of conference with a substantial disagreement between the two Houses, but every appropriation bill was passed at least one day before the close of the session, and was signed by President Buchanan within full twenty-four hours before the close of the session; and not one was closed in the midst of a night session in the House of Representatives. I speak of the last two sessions that I was a member of the House of Representatives. The business was in that condition that we closed every bill of an important character without a committee of conference that amounted to anything at all, and all the amendments in the third degree were considered in both the Senate and the House. The reason was that the business was sent to the Senate at an early stage of the session.

But that is not the condition in which we are now placed. We have got to take things as they are. It is no use for us to find fault, or grumble, or growl. This bill was sent to us within two weeks of the close of the session. From the very day and hour that the bill was received the Committee on Finance went to work, and we worked consecutively sixteen hours out of the twenty-four (at least I did myself) to prepare the bill for the consideration of the Senate. It was brought up here, and it is now here. The Senate are impatient. We are threatened with a long debate. They are not willing to sit it out to-night; and if we come here to-morrow and commence with this bill at eleven or twelve o'clock we shall waste all day to-morrow upon it. There are but three days left of this session. We have the loan bill behind, which is indispensable, and to which this bill must give way. We must take up the loan bill and act upon that. We have the legislative appropriation bill laden down, as the Senator from Illinois says, by appropriations that we never saw before, and some of which we have rejected twice over; and yet they are put on in the House in the third degree. The civil and miscellaneous bill, or the omnibus bill, has not even passed the House of Representatives, and I suppose is going through its first reading to-night, and it is not here. It is not the fault of the Senate. I will say that no appropriation bill has remained in this body two weeks without the full consideration and action of the Senate, so that there is no delay here.

The question now is whether we will allow this tax bill to be defeated on account of the press of business on the Senate, or whether we shall take the only mode that is left to save it. I never would propose this mode of legislation did I not believe that there was a necessity for it. I dislike committees of conference as much as the Senator from Illinois. I think it a bad system of legislation; but we are in this condition: to-morrow morning this bill must give way to the bill to provide ways and means to carry on the Government, the loan bill, and then the appropriation bills will be crowding upon us; and I am afraid one or two of them, especially the Indian appropriation bill, which is fifty-three pages long, and is ready for the consideration of the Senate, will be loaded down with a large number of amendments likely to excite debate. In this condition of the business of the session, I do not see any other way but for Senators to let this bill go to a committee of conference, and then let every Senator decide upon his responsibility to vote for or against the report of that committee. A majority of the Committee on Finance have reported in favor of striking out the fifth section. I think it is wrong; but I am willing to forego any expression of opinion for the present, and let it go to the conference committee with that section stricken out. If any Senator shall consider the action of the committee on that section so important as to induce him to vote against the bill, as a matter of course he will do so; and he will do so whether we spend one day or one hour in talking about it. I trust, therefore, and so far as I can I shall insist, that we shall take a vote on these various propositions and act on them. I will not discuss the matter any further myself.

Mr. CONNESS. If all other propositions remain in doubt or involved doubt, there is one that appears clear to my mind, and that is, that the consumption of hours in this kind of debate should not be continued. Everything that the honorable Senator from Illinois has stated is known to us all. We all deprecate what he deprecates as much as he can; but as the chairman of the Committee on Finance says, there is a condition of things before us, and it is our bounden duty to use the time that we have with the greatest possible economy. Therefore there is but one of two courses to take: the one now suggested by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, or to go on taking the yeas and nays and voting upon these propositions without debate, agreeing that we will not debate them. We will vote as intelligently if we take that course as if we debate them over and over again. I trust, sir, that we shall remain here and dispose of this bill to-night.

Mr. McDUGALL obtained the floor.

Mr. CLARK. I will ask the Senator from California to give way to allow me to introduce a resolution, that I think every Senator here will see the importance of, that it may be passed unanimously.

By unanimous consent the resolution was received and considered, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the 16th and 17th joint rules of the two Houses be suspended for the residue of the present session.

Mr. COWAN. I doubt very much whether that resolution should be adopted. A great many of us have not made our speeches yet. [Laughter.] I should like to hear those rules read.

Mr. CLARK. I will read them:

"16. No bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the last three days of the session.

"17. No bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States for his approbation on the last day of the session."

We always have to suspend these rules at the close of a session.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to have one additional feature added to that resolution, and that is, that when speeches are to be made, they be made to the point, not upon some general subject connected with the establishment of the Government and its maintenance, but to the point in issue.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. McDUGALL. The question pending involves this proposition:

That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of notes of any State bank or State banking association, paid out by them after the 1st day of January, 1866.

The policy of this amendment was indicated in the speech of the chairman of the Committee on Finance upon the introduction of this bill. It may be the opinion of this Government, as far as it is a Government, considering it as a Senate, House of Representatives, and Executive, that it is wise policy to wipe out of existence all the authorities and powers of the States. It may be the opinion of the legislators who have produced these propositions that we will thereby be stronger and better. It may be their opinion that we will produce a more solid, more exact, and more certain currency. It may be their opinion that we will accommodate the interests of the vast country over which has been administered, and before long will be administered, the laws of the Federal Republic by attempting this system of compelling the detailed currency of all parts of the country to be governed by centralized influence; that individual enterprise with regard to currency, with regard to banking institutions, with regard to capital possessing credit, shall be possessed alone by the centralized power of the Government of the United States in the city of Washington. Here is an edict from this Government to wipe out of existence all State power to organize institutions to deal in money in their several jurisdictions.

Mr. President, monetary, administrative, judicial, and military powers must have their several relations. The fathers who laid down the foundations of this Republic were men who had studied the lessons of antiquity. They had learned from Grecian and Roman States many lessons; but there was a little work, not voluminous, which was the favorite of Franklin and Madison and Jefferson, and of the men who laid the foundations of our Republic, the author of which was called Montesquieu. He affirmed as an absolute truth, as the result of great study, (and he was called then the best philosopher on the science of government,) that no republican institutions could be maintained over a vast extent of territory only by association. It is a truth in political science, that in the maintaining of institutions we have to make them more or less immediately. How we will make them depends, of course, upon the particular condition of society and their affinities. It would not be hard to aggregate New England. No Government can be maintained as a republican system of government over vast territories unless they are subdivided into separate portions, where their special administration is exercised in small districts, and where their general power is aggregated in the whole, as it was in Greece, as it was in the Achaean League, as it was in the States of the middle ages, and in the free cities of Europe. This is a truth which history has established, which Montesquieu has recorded, and which the fathers of the Republic introduced into our Constitution as a principle. We have a country extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Gulf of Mexico to the northern lakes, and then again up far away to British Columbia. Does any reasonable person suppose that any one system of banking, for instance, could obtain throughout all that region; that Oregon could accept a system inaugurated by the politicians or the managers in the city of Washington or in the city of New York; or that California could do it, or that Dakota could do it; or Idaho, or Arizona? No, sir. Their interests are adverse, and they have their various modes of transacting business, and for the purpose of transacting their business they require their own mode of doing it. A bold effort is attempted here to thrust upon all this great nation—beginning where the people grow onions and potatoes, then coming to the pine woods, then to the cotton, then to the corn, then the hemp, then the tobacco, and then going further west to the grass fields, and then to our silver and gold in the mountains of the West—the same system of transacting business between man and man. A man in Denver City, worth his fifty or one hundred thousand dollars, says, "I have made money enough; I will withdraw from the pursuits in which I have been engaged, and I will furnish facilities to my fellow-citizens which will give me an income; I will do that instead of putting my money in stocks." They have gold and silver there. You say that he cannot transact that business; he must do it secundum this law. So a man in Missouri has hemp and tobacco fields. A gentleman at Jefferson City, for instance, worth $500,000, is willing to furnish facilities for doing that business. You say to him, "You must do it, not upon the basis of money, but according to this rule." So, go down to Memphis, where there is a cotton market. Cotton commands gold and silver in the markets of the world, and so do hemp and tobacco. Go to Arizona, where they breed gold and silver, and still they must be subject to this Procrustean rule. We hope to develop Arizona into one of the wealthiest portions of our Federal Union; their exchanges are to be governed by this rule of the national banking institutions, and you prevent any person from engaging in the business of facilitating their local exchanges, unless he submits himself to the Federal authority by a tax of ten per cent. You go then to California, and apply the same rule, though we deal in gold and silver. You say that every banking institution that does not belong to your national bank system, even though it deals in gold and silver, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. So in Oregon and in Washington Territory.

What does it mean? I know well what it means. It was devised in the evil spirit of ambition by one who sought by the centralization of power and force here in the Federal Government to make himself strong enough to wield this as an empire. That was his centralized idea which he designed, approximating step by step, and that is a part of the philosophy of our whole policy of finance.

Mr. SPRAGUE. If the Senator from California will give way I will move an adjournment. It is past midnight.

Mr. McDUGALL. I yield for that purpose.
Mr. SPRAGUE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not seek an adjournment. I am only gassing off crude opinions; but though the slag may be about them they are the result of years of contemplation.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from California give way for a moment till I make a suggestion?

Mr. McDUGALL. Certainly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from California observes that the Senate is very thin and the hour is very late. There is a difficulty about this bill. We all desire to have action on it, but we have no rule to limit debate in this body. My suggestion is—I hope it will be acquiesced in all around—that, instead of continuing here at this hour, which is exhausting all of us, we now adjourn, and to-morrow, as we meet at eleven o'clock, let us take up this bill at half past eleven, with the understanding that no person will occupy more than five minutes in discussing any proposition upon it, and then come to a vote. I think in that way we may dispose of the bill in the course of an hour to-morrow. Then, as my friend from California is speaking generally upon this subject, he would, perhaps, postpone his remarks till we reach the loan bill or some other bill.

Mr. McDUGALL. No; I want to make them on this ten per cent. proposition. I am approximating my conclusion; I have not arrived at it yet.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think if the Senate would agree to the suggestion I have made, we could get this bill through in an hour to-morrow.

Mr. McDUGALL. I am talking about this ten per cent.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator consent to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. McDUGALL. I will yield for that motion.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope that the Senate will agree to adjourn. I think we can dispose of the bill in an hour in the morning. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 28, 1865.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

POSTAL LAWS.

On motion of Mr. COLE, of California, Senate bill No. 390, relative to postal laws, with House amendments thereto, which had been returned from the Senate, was taken from the Speaker's table for consideration.

The House insisted upon its amendments to said bill, and asked a committee of conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The SPEAKER subsequently appointed Mr. COLE, of California, Mr. BROOKS, and Mr. ASHLEY, as such committee on the part of the House.

MILITARY ACADEMY BILL.

Mr. BLAINE, from the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy, reported that the committee having met, after full and free conference had agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses that the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same; and that the Senate recede from their second amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I will say that there were two disagreements, one with reference to the appropriation of $25,000 to be used for providing store room for artillery. The Senate struck that out, and the conferees on the part of the House yield it. The other point of disagreement was an amendment of the Senate which took away from the Secretary of War the supervisory power over the matter of restoring cadets who have been dismissed. The Senate yield that.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE moved that the vote by which the report was agreed to be reconsidered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN W. GARRETT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a memorial and letter addressed to the Speaker by John W. Garrett, president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, relative to House bill No. 768, entitled "An act to facilitate railroad communication with the capital of the nation;" which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

LOAN BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the loan bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LITTLEJOHN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 772) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, the pending question being the amendment proposed yesterday by Mr. MORRILL, to strike out the words "other forms than bonds" and "other obligations" wherever they occur, and insert in lieu thereof the words "Treasury notes."

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the following amendment, offered by Mr. WILSON last evening as a substitute for the first section of the bill:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be and is hereby, authorized to borrow from time to time, on the credit of the United States, in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized, any sums not exceeding in the aggregate $600,000,000, and to issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe; and the said bonds shall be of denominations not less than fifty dollars, and may be made payable at any period not more than forty years from the date of issue, or be made redeemable at the pleasure of the Government at any period not less than five years nor more than forty years from date, or payable as aforesaid as may be expressed upon their face; and the interest on such bonds shall be payable semi-annually: Provided, That the rate of interest on any such bonds when payable in coin shall not exceed six per cent. per annum, and when not payable in coin shall not exceed seven and three tenths per cent. per annum, and the rate and character of interest shall be expressed on such bonds.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask for tellers on the amendment.

Mr. HOOPER. If it is in order I should like to make a little explanation of the effect of this amendment, which, I think, was misunderstood last night.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted upon the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL and WILSON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that amendment was a substitute for the first section?

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is it in order to move an addition to the section as it now stands?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to add to the section the following:

And all bonds and other obligations issued under this act shall be subject to State and municipal taxation.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 39, noes 55.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN and HOOPER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read the second section.

Mr. HOOPER. I move to insert after the word "for," at the end of the fifth line, the word "other;" so that it will read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury may dispose of any of the bonds or other obligations issued under this act, either in the United States or elsewhere, in such manner and at such rates and under such conditions as he may think advisable, for coin, or for other lawful money of the United States, &c.

The question recurred on the following amendment offered last evening by Mr. HOOPER:

On page 3, line nine, after the word "Congress" insert the following:

And may at his discretion issue bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act in payment for any requisitions for materials or supplies which shall have been made by the appropriate Department or officer upon the Treasury of the United States on receiving notice in writing through the Department or officer making the requisitions that the owner of the claim for which the requisition is issued desires to subscribe for an amount of loan that will cover said requisition or any part thereof.

Mr. PRUYN. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "or Treasury notes." The House has stricken out those words in the bill, and they ought to be stricken out in the amendment also, so as to make the two conform.

Mr. HOOPER. I rise to oppose that amendment. As the seven-thirty Treasury notes are now the popular loan, and are likely to be so until this bill goes into effect, and until the former loan bills are exhausted, I hope that amendment will not be made. My amendment authorizes seven-thirties, which are the only Treasury notes now being issued, to be issued for this purpose as well as bonds, and I see no reason why this popular loan should not be continued. I think if the House had understood the effect of the amendment which they have adopted, the result of the vote would have been different. I think there was a misapprehension last night in regard to what are Treasury notes. I hold one now in my hand, one of the seven-thirty Treasury notes. Now, I say that no gentleman in this House, nor any other man, in my opinion, ever saw one of these notes in circulation as currency. They are not calculated for currency. They never were intended to be issued as currency, and, in my opinion, they never have been used as currency.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I will ask that the character of the note be stated.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts a question, for I want information upon this subject. I want to know if the amendment offered by the gentleman contemplates the issuing of anything other than seven-thirty bonds? If that be the object, why not make it clear by using language that will express the idea? I am entirely willing to go for that measure so far as the seven-thirties are concerned, but I am opposed to enlarging the circulation. I have voted for the amendment so as to restrict the bill in this respect. I desire that the House shall understand the matter, so that nobody may be hoodwinked.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. As I understand the character of the note which the gentleman from Massachusetts has presented to the committee, (for he has not explained it,) it is simply an interest-bearing coupon note. In answer to his statement that no member has ever seen notes of that character used as circulation, I will say that I have had such a note paid to me in this city during this session of Congress. Until those notes accumulate an interest which makes them worth more than their ostensible face, they are used as circulation.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. The notes of which the gentleman speaks are legal tenders; these are not legal tenders.

Mr. HOOPER. I think that the gentleman has confounded two different sorts of notes. There are notes of three characters issued by the Treasury Department. One class are the United States notes, so called, which are a legal tender and bear no interest; another class are the interest-bearing legal tender notes; but the seven-thirties bear interest, have coupons attached, and are convertible into twenty-year bonds. I think that the gentleman from New York has confounded another class of notes with the seven-thirties. A few of the latter might, by accident, be in circulation; but I never saw one in circulation, and I doubt whether any one has ever seen a seven-thirty note used as currency.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, we cannot by legislation control this question of circulation. Every evidence of the credit of the Government, issued in whatever form it may be, can at times be made a circulating medium. Therefore notes of the character of these seven-thirties, although they are coupon notes, can to a limited extent be used as currency.

Mr. HOOPER. I admit that almost anything, in case of need, may be used as currency; but I mean to say that practically these are not so used, and never have been.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from Massachusetts has exhibited one of the seven-thirty notes with coupons attached, and he alleges that such notes have never been used as currency. Now, sir, I have in my possession a note which I received from the Sergeant-at-Arms, in payment for services as a member of Congress. It is a five per cent. note with coupons attached.

Mr. SCOFIELD. It is a legal tender, is it not?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is a legal tender for the amount of its face.

Mr. SCOFIELD. These seven-thirties are not legal tenders.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Whether a note be a legal tender or not does not alter the fact as to its circulation.

Mr. HOOPER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] will allow me to explain that the note to which he refers is not a seven-thirty Treasury note; it is not a Treasury note, so-called; but it is one of what are called coupon notes, which are a legal tender for their face.

Mr. PRUYN. I modify my amendment so as to strike out the words "or Treasury notes authorized by this act." No Treasury notes are authorized by the bill thus far.

The amendment of Mr. PRUYN to the amendment of Mr. HOOPER was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 48, noes 45.

The question recurred on Mr. HOOPER's amendment.

Mr. SPALDING demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GANSON and EROOMALL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 38.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move to add the following proviso to the second section:

Provided, That so much of the act approved June 3, 1864, as authorizes the Comptroller of the Currency to issue circulating notes to national banking associations is hereby repealed; and the circulation of the said banks shall be withdrawn under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency within one year from the passage of this act; and if the Secretary of the Treasury shall be of opinion that the exigencies of the public service require a further issue of Treasury notes to replace the said circulation so withdrawn, or any part thereof, he shall be at liberty to issue the same in such form and manner (not legal tender) as he may deem advisable.

That is the amendment I referred to last evening in the discussion on this bill.

Mr. BROOMALL. I rise to a point of order. I hold that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. The Chair will of course overrule that point of order. It is not only germane to this bill, but particularly germane to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the point of order is not well taken.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Chairman, the object of my amendment is to take from circulation the vast amount of national bank notes now in existence. It is declaring; in fact, that the system is vicious and has produced much evil in the community. And in case the Secretary of the Treasury thinks that the withdrawal of so large an amount of circulation will be disastrous and injurious to trade, it allows him to substitute Treasury notes not a legal tender to a limited amount. That is a provision to provide against disastrous consequences.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman to limit it to $110,000,000, which is the amount now out from the national banks.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I am willing to leave that discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. PRUYN. That is the effect of it.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Undoubtedly. If the rumors be true in reference to the gentleman who is to be the next Secretary of the Treasury he holds views which in my judgment will make it entirely prudent to intrust him with the privilege of enlarging or contracting the circulating medium of the country.

To sustain this amendment and to indorse the statement made last night that the circulating medium should be founded upon coin, I desire the Clerk to read an extract from the report of Mr. McCulloch, the Comptroller of the Treasury.

The Clerk read, as follows:

PAPER MONEY.—Now, what is needed in a paper circulating medium is that it should be convertible into coin; that it should be sufficient in amount to answer the purposes of legitimate business; that it should not, on the one hand, by being overissued, encourage extravagance and speculation, and give an artificial and unreliable value to property; nor, on the other hand, by being reduced below the proper standard, interrupt business and unsettle values. It should be supplied to just the extent of the demands of a healthy trade. It should be increased as the regular business of the country may require its increase, and be diminished as the proper demand for it is diminished.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. These are the views of the Comptroller of the Treasury in his report of November 28, 1863, and who, it is said, is to be our next Secretary of the Treasury. I think that the views so conservative, so correct, ought to induce us to intrust to that officer a wide discretion on this subject.

The main object of my amendment is to restrict the circulation. We are all agreed as to the effect of that circulation. It has not only deranged the affairs of the Government, but the monetary affairs of the country. It is time that something should be done in reference to the matter.

Mr. MORRILL. I hardly think that the committee desire at this late stage of the session to adopt that amendment, and I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEJOHN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the loan bill under consideration, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. PENDLETON. I ask the gentleman from Vermont to let me submit the following resolution:

Whereas by the second section of the act of September 2, 1789, to organize the Treasury Department, it is made the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury "to make report and give information to either branch of the Legislature in person or in writing, (as he may be required,) respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives, or which shall appertain to his office:" Therefore,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be invited to attend the sittings of the House, during the present session, whenever it may have under consideration bills imposing taxes on the people or authorizing the negotiation of loans or the issuing of bonds or notes or for the amendment of the national banking law, in order that he may give the House information orally touching the necessity of passing said bills.

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to notify the Secretary immediately of the passage of this resolution, and from time to time to advise him when the House will consider the said bills.

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot yield to that resolution.

Mr. STEVENS. There is no necessity for that, as the Secretary of the Treasury has kindly come up here this morning to instruct us without invitation. [Laughter.]

Mr. PENDLETON. I want to give him an opportunity to debate.

COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE.

Mr. WILSON. I ask to be excused from serving on the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill, and that the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN], who understands the points of disagreement between the two Houses, shall be appointed in my place.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be ordered accordingly.

LOAN BILL.

Mr. MORRILL moved that debate in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the pending amendment to the loan bill be closed in one minute after its consideration shall be resumed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LITTLEJOHN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the loan bill.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the second section.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not now in order. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] is pending.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I call for tellers on my amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FERNANDO WOOD and Mr. ASHLEY were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 34, noes 64.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to amend the second section by striking out the words "shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority," and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall be subject to State and municipal taxation in the same manner and at the same rate, but not higher, as other personal estate."

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the third section.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask unanimous consent to go back and make a verbal correction to section two. It is to strike out the words "or other obligations" in line nine. Those words have been struck out wherever they occurred in the first section.

Mr. HOOPER. I object.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to strike out the third section.

Mr. WILSON. Before the motion to strike out is put, I desire to ask the consent of the committee to go back and offer an amendment to the first section of the bill. As I stated before, my attention was called away when the Clerk commenced reading the second section. I had intended to offer an amendment before that time, but was cut off by the Clerk reading the second section before I was aware of it.

Mr. HOOPER. I object.

Mr. WILSON. Then I will move a proviso to the third section, which will accomplish the same purpose. I move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the rate of interest on all bonds issued under the provisions of this act shall be seven and three tenths per cent., payable semi-annually in the lawful money of the United States.

As I said before, I had intended to offer an amendment to the first section to accomplish the same object.

Mr. HOOPER. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. WILSON. Then I move to amend the substitute which has been adopted for the first section, by striking out of lines twenty-seven and twenty-eight the words "when payable in coin, shall not exceed six per cent. per annum." I offer this amendment for the purpose of testing the sense of the House on the question of paying the interest of our obligations in coin. I know of no better statement of the reasons why this should be done than that given by the Secretary of the Treasury in his recent report, and from that I propose to read an extract. The Secretary says:

"The laws authorizing the issue of bonds bearing interest in coin specifically pledged the revenue from customs to the payment of that interest, and provided for the collection of those duties in the same currency. In the opinion of the Secretary, that pledge should not be violated. A departure from it could only be vindicated by one of those State necessities which justify a nation in temporarily postponing its obligations in order to preserve the power to discharge them at a future day. When the pledge was given, no one anticipated a possible continuance of the war for such a length of time as would involve the increase of the public debt to the point it has already attained, or the possible payment of interest in coin to an amount beyond the ability of duties on imports to supply. It will be noticed, however, that our annual coin interest now exceeds fifty-six million dollars. Should the additional amount required for the expenditures of the present fiscal year be raised upon bonds bearing interest in coin, and the revenue from customs not exceed the estimate predicated upon the receipts of the first quarter, it is quite manifest that resort must soon be had to some other source of supply, or recourse must be had to the emission of securities of a different character. It could not be expected that such securities would stand on a level with those the interest upon which is payable in coin, unless an increased value should be given them by a higher rate of interest, or their payment should be secured by a specific lien upon revenue. In view of the serious considerations presented by this question, whether as affecting the market value of coin or the ability of Government to meet its specific interest, should the war continue, from the revenue now specifically appropriated for that purpose, the Secretary is forced to the conclusion that we should in the future rely, for the most part, upon securities bearing interest in currency, convertible into bonds, the interest of which is payable in coin. Notes bearing an increased rate of interest, payable in currency, redeemable in three or five years, and convertible at maturity into five-twenty bonds, would be preferable, in the judgment of the Secretary, to any other form of security. Bonds at long date, the interest of which is payable in currency at the usual rates, would be less attractive, and in the end involve a much greater sacrifice."

Thus it will be seen that the Secretary of the Treasury, after a full and thorough examination and reflection upon the financial condition of the country, came to the conclusion that we should stop the system of issuing bonds the interest of which is payable in coin. I know it was said last evening by my colleague, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. Kasson,] that the Secretary of the Treasury favored the provisions of this bill as reported from the committee. But this House has no authoritative enunciation of the views of the Secretary of the Treasury except that which is contained in the report which he submitted to the House. If there is any change in his views in that regard it ought to be communicated in some official form to the House of Representatives. Until that is done I must take the views set forth in the annual report of the Secretary as those entertained by the head of that Department. That being the case we are but carrying out, by adopting the amendment I have proposed, the line of policy which the Secretary suggests is the proper one for the Government to pursue.

Mr. BROOKS. I am opposed to proceeding one step further in the payment of coin interest on obligations to be hereafter issued, and therefore I oppose any amendment looking in that direction.

Mr. MORRILL. The amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is to strike out the provision providing that the interest shall be payable in coin.

Mr. BROOKS. I will move, then, to amend the amendment in order to say what I desire.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKS. I will give way to the gentleman, and offer my amendment hereafter.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to occupy even five minutes; but I do propose to state the question a little different from what the gentleman from Iowa has done. I do not understand that the Secretary of the Treasury has changed his opinions one iota. I believe that he has administered the duties of his office in the mode expressed in the extract which has been read by the gentleman from Iowa. But the point of difference between the gentleman from Iowa and myself is this, that while I do not think it would be wise for the Secretary to use the power to issue any bonds at the present time with interest payable in coin, yet I do conceive that it is wise for us to give him the power, or otherwise he would be placed in the hands of but one class of money-lenders. I think that no gentleman would be willing to take the office of Secretary of the Treasury at this time without having this option within his reach. It would be impossible for him to carry on the business of his Department successfully without having that authority.

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask my colleague on the committee a single question?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. If it is only to be kept up as a right, will not these money-lenders refuse to lend money on interest in lawful money so as to force the payment of interest in coin at ten or twelve per cent.?

Mr. MORRILL. The experience of those who have administered the Department is entirely the other way. They do find this option to be a power which they can exert and exert successfully for the interests of the Treasury.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to amend the amendment so as to reduce the interest proposed to one per cent. Educated as I have been, it is of but little importance to me, as a member of this House, what may be the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury. The House has the custody of the public money, and it is the duty of the House to exercise its own prerogative and power without any reference to any Secretary of the Treasury.

Sir, we have gone as far as Congress can go and as the country can endure in the issue of bonds the interest on which is payable in coin, unless we tax the people in coin in their direct taxes. Sixty-three million dollars, about the receipts at custom-houses, are now exhausted for the payment of interest on the bonds of the Government in coin. If we go a step further, the taxes have got to be collected in coin, in order to pay the interest on the public debt, and throughout all parts of the United States. We have reached the extreme point where the customs can supply us in coin, and any attempt to go further may be fatal to the interest upon the whole public debt. I am amazed that those who have pledged the public faith for the payment of the interest on the existing debt in coin should attempt to go one step further, and provide for the creation of a further debt bearing interest in coin, when they know the coin can be collected only by direct taxation.

Sir, the great question before this country is not a question of arms so much as it is one of currency. The expanded currency of this country is now $900,000,000, when it ought not to be over $300,000,000 or $250,000,000; and though our victories are numerous, and our importations light, and our exports large, yet gold keeps up at 200, when it ought to be reduced to 120 or 140, if the currency of this country was not constantly expanded.

The legal-tender debt of the country on the 31st of January last was $674,581,000; the national banking currency is now about one hundred million dollars; the State bank circulation is about one hundred and twenty-five million dollars; making an aggregate of $900,000,000 in all.

So long as you expand the currency and make money plentier than anything else, you can continue to borrow money; and this is our condition just now. But if you attempt to change this order of things and to borrow money, pledging the faith of the Government to pay the interest in coin, and tax the people of this country therefor to pay it in coin, when the legal operations of the country are in paper currency, you take the first practical step, in my judgment, toward repudiation, and I beg the House to pause upon this dangerous threshold and to look to the future and beware of that dangerous step. We can scarcely pay now what we owe in coin, and for which the public faith is pledged, and in my judgment he who now goes further prepares the first step toward repudiation. The great debt of this country is now in a few hands, and the time is coming in a few years when he who rises on the stump, especially in the West, in favor of repudiation, will be able to obtain a large and powerful vote, if the interest on the public debt is to be payable in coin when the circulation of the country is paper.

The first error of Congress was in distinguishing between coin and paper. That was the first fatal step. The next was legal tender. Let us now limit our action and go no further.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Chairman, in discussing financial questions it has often been said, and I believe frequently by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] that if the currency should be still further expanded, and if the present financial policy of the Government continued, the West would repudiate the national debt. I desire to state most emphatically that the West will never repudiate, nor will it sanction for a moment the idea of repudiation. The West will stand by the obligations of this Government, let it cost what amount of personal or pecuniary sacrifice it may. When this idea of repudiation is put forward in this House, it should not receive any degree of toleration from those gentlemen who have the honor of representing the great West; from me it never shall, nor even the consent which may be inferred from silence.

The West is rich in material resources, and her heroic and patriotic people are determined not only to maintain the Government in all its integrity, but are also unalterably determined to maintain its honor. Sir, the West will be the last portion of this country to acquiesce in the doctrine of repudiation. We are able to maintain the integrity of this Government; we are able to maintain its credit, and we are as ready and willing to do it as any other portion of this country. Sir, I hope we have heard for the last time, from any source, this talk of repudiation. Should the great city of New York, or any other portion of the East, attempt to repudiate the public debt, which I do not even anticipate will ever be the case, the West, single-handed and alone, would maintain the credit of this country. We will maintain the honor, not only of the West, but of the whole country. He who would talk or dream of repudiation by the West is a madman. Never, never will the glorious West cover itself with infamy by indorsing this cowardly and rascally doctrine of repudiation. The West has given freely of its best blood to put down the rebellion and to maintain the national integrity, and will ever as freely give of its treasure to maintain the national honor. Repudiation and secession should and will sleep in the same inglorious grave.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, pro forma, to amend by inserting "seven" instead of "six." I do this for the purpose of calling the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] to a portion of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury which he did not read, because, I suppose, it did not make for his proposition.

Mr. WILSON. I could not read the whole report in five minutes.

Mr. MORRILL. To show that the opinions of the Secretary of the Treasury remain unchanged, and that what he asks now is entirely in harmony with the views promulgated in his annual report, I ask the attention of the committee to the following words:

"In view of the serious considerations presented by this question, whether as affecting the market value of coin or the ability of Government to meet its specie interest, should the war continue, from the revenue now specifically appropriated to that purpose, the Secretary is forced to the conclusion that we should in the future rely, for the most part, upon securities bearing interest in currency, convertible into bonds, the interest of which is payable in coin. Notes bearing an increased rate of interest, payable in currency, redeemable in three or five years, and convertible at maturity into five-twenty bonds, would be preferable, in the judgment of the Secretary, to any other form of security. Bonds at long date, the interest of which is payable in currency at the usual rates, would be less attractive, and in the end involve a much greater sacrifice."

Mr. WILSON. I read every word of that that bears upon this question.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw my amendment. Mr. PRUYN. I renew the amendment.

I shall vote, Mr. Chairman, in favor of this proposition, if the Secretary of the Treasury be allowed the option to issue such class of bonds as he pleases; and I shall vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa. I cannot vote against a proposition which contemplates paying the interest on the debt of the Government in gold, believing, as I do, that all the interest on the Government debt, as well as all its principal, should have been payable in gold from the outset. And I think that we are bound to believe that the Secretary of the Treasury will use the discretion vested in him so that in issuing bonds under this act he will take care to issue them within the ability of the Government to meet them in coin. I do not think that we ought to take for granted that in the outset he will aid in what is called the work of repudiation, but that he will exercise the discretion vested in him within the limits that the Government finances will warrant. I shall vote to give him the discretionary power, and against the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope that the committee will not abandon the idea of paying the interest in coin. I am sure that the Government will ultimately gain nothing by any departure from a coin basis for its bonds. However you may plan or scheme, the result will be at last that the public debt, interest and principal, except so much as may be paid while we are collecting revenue in depreciated currency, is to be met in gold or in the equivalent of gold. If you make your interest payable in paper you will be compelled to pay as much higher rates as paper is less valuable than gold.

We have reached a point in our financial affairs when no sort of scheming will answer the purpose; and the country ought to have notice that gold must be raised to pay the interest in coin. If we sell our securities wherever coin is, whether in England, France, or the German States, to pay interest in coin, so much less will be the public debt. Therefore I am for one prepared to say that we will pay all of our interest in coin as it becomes due, at a rate not exceeding six per cent., and to go into the markets of the world and borrow all that we need.

There are three things you can do. The first is to economize, and that, judging from the past, we are not disposed to do. The second is to tax, and from what has happened here during the last week, we are not disposed to tax. And I say, with all deference to my colleague of the Committee of Ways and Means, that I have in the last twenty-four hours ascertained at the Treasury Department exactly what the receipts of the Government have been from the two sources of customs and internal revenue, and I am of opinion that his statement that the revenue for the current year will amount to $344,000,000 is excessive to the extent of $40,000,000.

The last and most vital measure is the reduction of the circulating medium. I said that I was willing to agree to the issue of Treasury notes, with the understanding that they should go into the circulation of the country to the extent of $25,000,000 or $50,000,000; but, sir, on reflection, I am not prepared to stand by the proposition. The increase of the currency increases prices to a corresponding extent; and you will have to pay, in the increased expenses of the Government, a sum equal to the amount added to the circulation of the country. If you increase the circulation of the country $25,000,000, you will find that the expenses of the Government will be exactly in the same ratio, to say nothing of the hardships that will be inflicted on the great body of the people. In other words, you will have to pay $25,000,000 for the use of $25,000,000 for one year. If the House and country will come to the conclusion to pay all liabilities, and that they shall be redeemed, principal and interest, in coin, and then go into the markets of the world, we can carry the country through without difficulty.

Mr. STEVENS. At what rate would our bonds sell abroad?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If you will take the forty-years' bonds, principal and interest payable in gold, they can be negotiated to the extent of $100,000,000. I make that statement from some knowledge of what foreign bankers have expressed a desire to do.

Mr. PRUYN. I understand that our currency of all kinds amounts to $675,000,000.

The question recurred on Mr. Wilson's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to strike out the last section.

Mr. Chairman, the details of our financial affairs I leave to those more familiar with them than I am. I move to strike out to make a few remarks on a point on which little has been said, but which I know is largely in the minds of gentlemen. I can hardly say what I desire to say in five minutes, but I can say it in ten minutes. But if we are acting under the five-minute rule I suppose I cannot go over that time.

The member from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] last evening, in the lengthy remarks he made, spoke upon a point which is prominently in the minds of every member of this House; and in this legislation I have no doubt that the great mass of the members upon this floor have faith, sincere faith, that the great debt of the country can be paid directly from the mineral lands belonging to the country. In that, sir, their hopes and their faith are utterly false. The gentleman said last evening that he had urged that this Government should take possession of the mineral lands as belonging to the Government. And I have no doubt, if there were to be a direct expression of opinion, that two thirds or three fourths of the members upon this floor would say that that is their opinion upon this subject; and I have no doubt that this legislation is being based upon the idea I have presented. If I did not believe that the finances of the country would be perfectly safe as based upon the wholesome financial condition of the country in all the departments from which the country draws its resources, I would not for one moment give my support to this bill, because the very foundation upon which it is based would be entirely false.

The Government take possession of the mineral lands! Why, sir, the Government would be like the man who drew the elephant in the lottery; he got a very big thing, but when he got it he did not know what to do with it. The Government take possession of the mineral lands! The miners on the mineral lands, before they would pay over and above the past expenses they have incurred, I have no doubt would tell the Government to take the mineral lands and work them. Every miner, and every man who is acquainted experimentally with the business operations of mining, would say that the Government in running these mines would find itself after a few years with a far greater debt upon its hands than it had when it commenced. Go upon the idea that because such a vast amount of gold and silver is taken out of these lands, therefore the Government should take those lands! Why, sir, the leaving these lands free has encouraged the spirit of adventure and sent thousands and thousands of men to hard labor who otherwise would never have moved in that direction. That, and that alone, has given rise to the vast amount of exploring and prospecting which has opened up these store-houses of wealth. From one third to one half of the labor and expense of mining is bestowed in first finding where the hidden treasure lies. One half the expense is incurred by the miner before he receives any return for his labor. I would like every member of this House to go with me from mining locality to mining locality throughout the mineral district, that they might see the vast amount of labor which has been bestowed in this way, and every man would say that the miners deserve all they can get from those places which they have explored, and upon which they have made such vast expenditures.

Gentlemen may then say that the unexplored lands should be divided up and sold out. Then I would remind gentlemen that to develop these unexplored lands would cost the same amount of labor and capital before they would be placed in the same condition as the present developed territory.

I desired to say this much simply because this subject has been agitated, and in some future Congress will culminate in final action. I have thrown out these remarks for the consideration of members who will have seats upon this floor in the next Congress, that they may consider them in the mean time.

I withdraw my motion.

Mr. HOOPER. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of terminating debate.

Mr. COX. Before that is done I desire to say a word.

Mr. HOOPER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I desire to say one word in relation to the remark which fell from the lips of my friend [Mr. INGERSOLL] in reference to repudiation. I do not think he comprehended the remarks which fell from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. BROOKS.] If he had I do not think, as a western man, he would have answered it precisely in the way he did. I understood the argument of the gentleman from New York to be that if the interest upon our bonds are made payable in coin and the custom-house duties are made payable in coin, the operation of it, under our present infamous and outrageous tariff, would compel our western people to investigate this fiscal question; and on investigation, unless they found relief, they would have it in some other form, perhaps repudiation.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Does the gentleman from Ohio assert that under any circumstances the people of the western States will repudiate the lawful debt of the Government?

Mr. COX. I do not believe that they will.

Mr. INGERSOLL. All right.

Mr. COX. I believe that during the next five years there will be such floods of light poured in upon these fiscal questions that we will revolutionize and save this country from repudiation, and anarchy, and ruin to both rich and poor as a consequence. I never will lisp a word in favor of repudiation. I know that credit is cash and that cash is everything. It is greater than morals. The great questions in this country are economic questions; and those are the questions that are hereafter to agitate this country and topple from power the present Administration.

Mr. MOORHEAD. How will we get light on these subjects when the gentleman goes out of Congress? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. If my friend had only read a rather elaborate speech which I made on the tariff last session, and especially upon the iron interest of Pennsylvania, he would have had such a flood of light on his head that it would have struck him with an epileptic fit. [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORHEAD. I did not see it.

Mr. COX. That is because the gentleman did not look for it. It proved that the iron mongers of his State were receiving from one hundred and fifty to two hundred per cent. of the hard earnings of industry, because, as was well said yesterday by a Republican Senator, all these taxes at last will be paid in gold, and wrung from the sweat of industry. All your wealth, all your shoddy demands are, after all, nothing but the beaded sweat from the brow of labor, and in the end labor will seek its proper position in the country, and then capital must look out.

Mr. Chairman, I shall at the proper time, when the tariff bill comes up, offer my old amendment which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRIL] last year said was so so absurd, and which I have not yet learned was absurd, providing that all our customs duties shall be paid in currency and not in the specie of the country. That will strike off at one fell swoop nearly one hundred and fifty per cent. of the bounties paid by western industry to eastern capital, and which in the end goes into the hands of the bondholders, who live mostly in the eastern States. When the gentleman from Illinois says that the West will never repudiate, I join with him in that; but when he comes up and says that this oppression is still to continue and that the West is to be mortgaged more and more, and more drawn from them, and that the West will still come up and foot the whole bill for fear of repudiation, I do not go with him there. The West will not foot the bill exclusively. We want fair, just, and equal taxation, and that taxes shall fall like the dews of Heaven alike upon the rich and the poor. Inow, in accordance with my promise, move that the committee do now rise for the purpose of closing debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEJOHN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration bill of the House No. 772, to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. HOOPER. I move that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order close in one minute after the consideration shall be resumed by the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOOPER. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LITTLEJOHN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be upon the substitute for the bill offered by Mr. STEVENS.

Mr. STEVENS. As we have got through with the amendments offered with the exception of my substitute, I will withdraw the substitute and offer it again in the House when the committee rises; that course will save time, and the committee can now rise.

Mr. BROOKS. Before the committee rises, I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if it is necessary that we should appropriate this $60,000 for further printing of notes; and if two or three million have not already been appropriated for the purpose.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose that if it be deemed necessary we can continue this discussion in the House. I therefore withdraw my substitute, and move that the committee rise and report the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I have an amendment which I desire to offer as an additional section.

Mr. STEVENS. That can be offered in the House.

Mr. BROOMALL. I also have an amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Let it be the general understanding that these three amendments shall be offered in the House.

The motion of Mr. STEVENS was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEJOHN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 772) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, had directed him to report the same with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew the substitute which I offered and withdrew in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move the following as an amendment to the substitute and also to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That no note or obligation hereafter issued under any act of Congress shall be a legal tender; and no Treasury note for fifty dollars or under shall be reissued when paid in to, or received by the Treasurer, but all such notes shall be canceled, and no Treasury note hereafter to be issued, under any law, shall be for a less sum than $100.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend by adding the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That, in lieu of $100,000,000 of the amount of bonds authorized by this act, the Secretary of the Treasury may, at his discretion, issue Treasury notes of denominations not less than $100, bearing interest at a rate not less than six per cent. nor more than seven and three tenths per cent. per annum; and the said Treasury notes shall be made convertible into any bonds authorized by this act, and the interest and principal shall be made payable at such time within twenty years as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine.

Mr. STEVENS. I now call the previous question on the bill and the various amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. HAY, his Private Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 82) in relation to the distribution of books and documents;

An act (H. R. No. 688) making appropriations for the construction, preservation, and repairs of certain fortifications and other works of defense for the year ending June 30, 1866;

An act (H. R. No. 690) to revive certain provisions of the act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 3, 1815, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 738) relating to the enrollment and license of certain vessels;

An act (H. R. No. 781) granting to the Michigan City Harbor Company the use of Government piers in said harbor for the purpose of protecting said harbor;

An act (H. R. No. 783) concerning the collection district of Salem and Beverly, in Massachusetts; and

An act (H. R. No. 784) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the admeasurement of tonnage of ships and vessels of the United States," approved May 6, 1864.

LOAN BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped to be able to change our financial system and inaugurate a new one, which would reduce the price of gold and the price of every article of living and all the munitions of war. I had entertained that hope until this morning, when I saw operating here certain influences which I regretted to observe. I do not know how far there may have been a change in the opinions of the House; but I confess I was shocked to hear the extreme doctrines of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWWELL], in favor of continuing to pay in gold all our indebtedness till the end of this war. Now, I intend to make one more effort. Last year we were successful until the Secretary of the Treasury came here and sat behind us, when on the yeas and nays our action was reversed.

As I am about making another effort to resist and reverse the present financial policy of the Government, it may be well to give a brief review of its rise, progress, and present condition.

When Mr. Buchanan went out of power he left a debt, contracted in times of profound peace, of something like $100,000,000. When Mr. Lincoln came into power he found an empty Treasury and a civil war already begun. He found it necessary at once to call for seventy-five thousand soldiers. To meet the expenses it was necessary to assemble Congress. The extra session in 1861 authorized a loan of $250,000,000, $50,000,000 in Treasury notes and $200,000,000 in six per cent. twenty-year bonds. That loan was taken by the banks of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston; $150,000,000 of it was paid in coin; but before the last $50,000,000 were due all the banks in the United States suspended specie payments, and it was paid in currency at a loss to the Government of over $5,000,000. This gave such a shock to public credit that it was found impossible to negotiate a loan in coin at any price. The financiers of New York (bankers and brokers) were consulted and gave it as their opinion that a loan of $50,000,000 put on the market would not produce over eighty per cent., payable in the irredeemable currency of the banks; that a specie loan was impracticable. Under these circumstances certain members of the Committee of Ways and Means (a very small minority) suggested the idea of issuing United States legal-tender notes. They thought that if a currency not immediately redeemable in coin must be used by the Government it had better issue its own notes; it would be more secure than State banks, and would save the Government a large amount of interest. It is due to the late Secretary of the Treasury to say that he was decidedly hostile to the scheme. The bill was reported by an individual member and lay upon the files more than a month before his consent and that of a majority of the committee could be obtained. Then imperious necessity compelled them to yield, and $150,000,000 of legal tenders were authorized which have proved to be the most acceptable, as it is the safest, circulation ever existing in this country.

Such was the origin of legal tenders. It was followed by a bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, to borrow a sum not exceeding $500,000,000, known as five-twenties. An effort was made in this House by a distinguished gentleman from Illinois, now deceased, to make the interest payable in coin; it was lost by thirty-nine majority. The House saw the absurdity of declaring by law a circulation which they had just created and declared lawful money and made a legal tender to be of less value than gold, thus depreciating its value. The New York brokers and bankers sent their emissaries here, but failed with the Committee of Ways and Means in the House, but finally persuaded the Secretary of the Treasury and the Senate to adopt that fatal policy. It came back to the House thus amended, and though resisted by the original friends of the bill, passed. That induced the provision to have the duties on foreign importations paid in specie. To this unwise discrimination, creating two kinds of currency, and pronouncing one kind of lawful money inferior to the other kind of lawful money, I attribute most of the trouble which has arisen from the high price of everything, the enormous and unnecessary expense of the war, and the constant fluctuation in the market.

Time and experience, I had thought, had forced upon most people the conviction that longer perseverance in this system must lead to disastrous consequences. I had wondered that we had not seen this before we inaugurated a system so palpably unwise.

To show the necessity of this change, let us suppose that the increase of the public debt will stop at $4,000,000,000. The interest, at six per cent., would be $240,000,000. This would have to be paid in gold to be purchased by the Government. If, while we have required but $56,000,000, the holders of that commodity could put it at $270 to the $100, as they did, it is not extravagant to suppose that when $240,000,000 must be had they will be able to command $300 for $100. Three times $240,000,000 will make $720,000,000. Add say $130,000,000 for other expenses, and old loans falling due, and you have $850,000,000 to be raised annually to pay the interest and ordinary expenses alone. If you add $50,000,000 for a sinking fund, you have the round sum of $900,000,000 to be raised by taxation. I know of no young nation that ever bore such a tax.

Our present tax is not a light one, yet it is not expected to produce more than half that sum.

In my judgment the people could not, and would not, bear it. I would not be understood that this country would, under any circumstances, repudiate her debt; but she would, from necessity, be driven to suspend the payment of part of her interest for a while. That would be a disgrace which we must not for a moment contemplate. We must begin in time so to shape our course as to avoid it.

It may be said that we could not have sold our loan at par if we had made the interest payable in lawful money. I do not believe that. If we had maintained the equality of United States notes with gold, as we had declared by making them a legal tender, and received them for customs, I believe these long loans receivable in currency would have readily commanded par.

But suppose we had been obliged to sell them at ten per cent. discount, what have we now sold them at with gold-bearing interest? We have received in currency $100 for gold bonds for $100. That $100 in currency could be bought and no doubt was bought for forty dollars in gold, and we instantly commenced paying $100 in coin for it; for when we pay the interest in gold and the principal when due, it is all gold from the beginning. So under this wise system we have actually been selling our bonds at sixty per cent. discount. Nor have we the merit of using a currency which, it is said, would keep down prices. We have used nothing but the currency which we had ourselves decried and depreciated.

But that immense loss was not the worst feature of that fatal policy. When Congress made United States notes a legal tender which every citizen was bound to receive at par unless he held Government loans, it was unwise and unjust to make any discrimination between different classes of creditors. Gold coin, silver coin, and United States notes, were all equally lawful money of the United States. Why should Government declare that the one was better than the other, and thus by legislation depreciate its own money? If Congress had declared that gold should not be a legal tender, and should not be received for duties or paid for interest, but that United States notes and silver should be, gold would have depreciated below either of the others. While the sixty million Treasury notes were receivable for duties they were of equal value with coin, while Treasury notes not thus receivable were at a discount. But Congress created an absolute necessity for coin in proportion to the increasing amount of her debt, and made it alone receivable for duties, thus declaring that all other money was inferior to it. Our duties last year amounted to over $100,000,000. The holders of gold knew that at least $25,000,000 must be had each quarter by the merchants, no matter what it cost. Outside of the vaults of the New York banks, who by their charters must hold their coin, I suppose the average amount in New York was just about $25,000,000. Whoever possessed that could compel the merchants to pay whatever price their consciences would permit them to ask. It is no hard thing in such a city for a few men to monopolize the whole of it. The struggle for such monopoly would raise the price, and the purchasers would indemnify themselves by extorting from the merchants, who receive in their business only United States notes and currency, and were therefore at the mercy of speculators—of a class of men the most worthless in the community—men who consume the fruits of the earth but produce nothing.

If no gold had been needed to pay interest and duties, the demand for it in this country would have been too trifling to have attracted attention. If there had been no demand for it how could the price have risen above par? Who would have bet on the gold board when the winner could not profit by his luck?

The cost to the merchants and the Government in direct premiums is the smallest part of the evil. Congress made gold, when no longer money, no longer a circulating medium, the standard of value. Every article came to be measured by the price of bullion, the extorted unnatural price paid by the merchants. Of course when gold sold at two and a half times the mint value everything purchased by the rich and the poor, by private individuals and by Government, followed in the same direction. They might not always quite overtake it, as caution was necessary; but they approximated it. Wheat, which before the war was at $1, has been $2 50 when gold was 250, and is now over $2 per bushel when gold is at about 200. Beef was from $8 to $10, now at $10 to $20; and so of everything else. Certain theorists are in the habit of attributing this to an inflated currency. This, in my judgment, has had much less to do with it than is generally supposed. If that were so, prices would not fluctuate with the fluctuations in the gold market; for the volume of currency does not thus vary. The merchant holds his goods higher or lower as the price of gold rises or falls. He marks and re-marks them according to the thermometer of the Israelites in the gold-room, not according to the contraction or expansion of the currency.

I know that when the currency is unduly expanded it raises prices. When too much contracted, prices fall. It makes not a particle of difference whether that currency is in coin or in paper. California has never had any other but a gold currency, but prices have always been double those east of the mountains. The sole cause was that gold was abundant there. The circulating medium was larger than the business required. The effect would have been precisely the same had her currency been paper.

The currency is never inflated so long as there is no more than is necessary for the business of the country. The proper quantity depends not on a fixed amount, but on the quantum of business. I do not believe that our currency is swollen much beyond the necessary amount. Before the war our circulation in coin and bank notes was about $400,000,000. Our circulation now is about $600,000,000—I doubt if the actual circulation is so large. A large portion of the legal tenders are hoarded. When lately the banks took a loan of $50,000,000 they had great difficulty in procuring sufficient legal tenders to fill it. The compound-interest notes are nearly all placed as investments.

But suppose the circulation to be one third larger than before the war. Does not the business of the country require double the amount of currency that it did then? The Government contracts then were about $80,000,000, including all her expenses. They are now at least $900,000,000; and I believe that individuals—including new branches of contracts in the loyal States, tobacco, petroleum, &c.—are quite as large as then. Our merchants then required about $90,000,000 to pay their duties. They now require of our currency $300,000,000.

I believe, therefore, that we have no more circulation than is necessary to carry on the increased business of the nation. The exorbitant prices are not, to any great extent, at least, due to excessive circulation, but to the vicious standard of value erected by Congress when, having demonetized coin, they made the commodity of gold the measure of all other commodities; and which, being in so small a volume, enabled speculators to control the whole business of the country, and play havoc with the interest of the nation. In times of suspension the amount of circulation has very little influence on prices; the discount line of the banks has much more to do with it. Then banks discount on their capital and deposits, thus flooding the country with money easily obtained. Take, as a sample, the state of the Philadelphia banks on the 20th of this month. Their discount line was nearly $49,000,000, while their circulation was $4,856,771, and specie was $1,569,223; their capital $13,740,000, and deposits $37,141,910. Here was no inflation of the currency. It was not one fourth the amount of their capital. But there was a monstrous inflation of their loans. If gentlemen had directed their taxation to deposits instead of circulation they would have shown more statesmanship. Had all our loans been for lawful money there would have been no difficulty in having them taken at six per cent. at par. All "lawful money" being received for duties and interest. It was said they would never have been taken abroad. That to me would have been a merit. The annual net earnings of this country would have been sufficient to absorb all our loans and pay all the expenses of the war. Now what is sold abroad is sold at forty dollars on the hundred, and we immediately pay $100 in coin for it as interest, and must ultimately pay $100 principal for every $40 received when specie payments are resumed. What an immense sacrifice to a foolish theory!

But that evil is now upon us, and in order to sell our present loan, payable in lawful money, we must make it as desirable as the past loans. I think eight per cent. interest, irredeemable for ten years, will accomplish that object. In my judgment it will be the most advantageous loan for capitalists yet issued. We have three kinds of loans:

1. The five-twenties, interest payable in coin, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after five years, in lawful money, and payable absolutely in twenty years in money.

2. Ten-forties, redeemable in ten years at pleasure of Government, and payable in forty years, principal and interest, in coin, at five per cent.

3. Seven-thirties, interest in money and convertible in three years into five-twenties, or redeemable in money.

Let us take up these several loans and see if the present one, while it relieves the Government from the payment of coin, is not the best for holders. Suppose gold to remain at 200, the five-twenties will bear twelve per cent. for three years, which they have yet to run, and will then be paid in money. Of course, thereafter it is to be invested in a six per cent. loan. One hundred dollars, at twelve per cent. for three years, will be $36; and for seven years, at six per cent., $42; ten years, equal to $78. At eight per cent. for ten years it would be $80.

The seven-thirties are payable in money, and therefore less valuable than are eight per cent. stock, as they are not convertible until the five-twenties will be payable in currency, or near that time.

The ten-forties are the only ones about which there can be a doubt, as the interest and principal are both payable in coin after ten years at five per cent.

Now their comparative value depends entirely upon the time when we shall resume specie payments. If we should resume specie payments in three years, as most financiers believe, then the money in which the interest and principal of the ten-forties will be paid will be no better than that in which this loan of eight per cent. will be paid—both will be coin—while for three years the ten-forties will bear five per cent. gold, equal to ten per cent. at present price of gold, yet for the balance of the ten years, that is, for seven years, they will bear five per cent., and this loan will be eight per cent. The account will be thus: ten per cent. on $100 for three years will be $30; five per cent. for seven years, equal to $35, $65; eight per cent. for ten years $80—$15 in favor of the eight per cent. bonds.

This is supposing gold to remain at 200. But if these gold-bearing bonds can be stopped where they are, and those out be converted, and the duties paid in lawful money, gold would fall to par, and this loan for ten years would be three per cent. better than the ten-forties and two per cent. better than the five-twenties. It seems to me that all the outstanding gold-bearing bonds would soon be converted.

I suppose no capitalist would desire more for his money than eight per cent., especially if that could be secured for ten years. It would be much better than an interest whose rate depended upon the varying prices of the gold room.

Can we afford to pay eight per cent? I have supposed our debt would ultimately be $4,000,000,000, and $3,500,000,000 would bear interest. We should always have half a billion that would bear no interest. The interest would be $280,000,000, to which must be added $100,000,000 for ordinary expenses, making $380,000,000, to be provided for. I think that no one can doubt that our present internal tax law, when properly executed, will produce $320,000,000; and our duties, when payable in money, at least $150,000,000; making $470,000,000. This would leave a surplus of $90,000,000 for a sinking fund. If we stop where we are, with gold-bearing bonds we can manage our interest without any increase in the price of gold.

Our gold-bearing interest is now $63,000,000. It will be increased a little when the seven-thirties are converted. With our foreign demand we may need $70,000,000. I have no doubt that our average duties while payable in coin, will be $80,000,000.

With $2,000,000,000 of our debt at six per cent. or bearing no interest, of which $29,000,000 of the interest is payable in currency, suppose it be increased to $2,000,000,000 more at eight per cent., being $160,000,000, the amount would stand: gold bearing bonds, interest say $70,000,000; which would be paid by duties thus squaring it:

Present debt bearing currency interest.....$29,698,000
Interest on $2,000,000,000, at eight per cent.....160,000,000

Leaving to be provided by internal duties.....189,698,000
I believe our present internal tax will produce 320,000,000

Leaving a balance for a sinking fund of.....130,302,000
Deduct ordinary expenses.....100,000,000

$30,302,000

This supposes no conversions.

Some have suggested that the value of our currency would be affected by the amount of our taxation; that the price of greenbacks would rise and the price of gold fall just in proportion as we lay burdens on the people. I think my excellent colleague from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] fell into this notion.

I think there never was a balder fallacy. No doubt the value of our bonds depends on the confidence which the people have in our solvency. But so long as we raise sufficient revenue to pay the interest on the public debt, and the people confide in the ability and will of the Government to pay, taxation can have no influence on the relative value of legal tenders and coin. Now, there has never been a day since this war began that the people have not had perfect confidence in the ability and disposition of the Government to pay all its liabilities. There never has been an hour since our first tax law was passed that our revenue would not pay all our accruing interest and ordinary expenses. At this day, with our new tax law in full operation, our revenue will be quite sufficient to pay our ordinary expenses and the interest on the full amount of debt after two years more of war accumulations, unless we should continue to make that interest payable in coin. In that event it will pay just about half of it. Yet notwithstanding that ability and public confidence, the price of gold has not been affected by taxation.

Some of our tariff friends are almost reconciled to the high price of gold because they think it acts as a protection to domestic industry. In this I think they are mistaken. The price abroad of goods is not raised as ours is. It remains the same as before the war. The duty is paid on the foreign valuation. Hence the amount, though payable in coin, is small compared with the price when once imported. The enormous price here pays the importer a larger profit, notwithstanding the gold duties. Hence importations are not discouraged by the high price of coin.

Suppose before the war the price of an article abroad was $100, the duty twenty-five per cent. It would cost, exclusive of charges, $125 here; if it brought here $150, the net profit would be $25. Now, the price abroad is the same, $100; but the duty being (in currency) twice as much would make the cost here $150. We know that every article is more than twice the price it was. It would sell for $300; deduct the $150, and it would leave a profit of $150 instead of $25.

Let us sum up the result of the argument.

The interest, payable in coin, after our loans already authorized are taken, will be about $70,000,000. This will be paid by the coin received for duties, say $70,000,000, so that they balance each other.

Mr. HOOPER. In case the substitute be rejected I ask unanimous consent that I shall have leave to offer the amendments which have been adopted in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the original bill. I trust there will be no objection.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. WILSON. Will it not be in order to recommit to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It will not, as the previous question has been seconded. It will be in order after the third reading of the bill if the previous question be not demanded on its passage.

Mr. WILSON. I desire, if such an opportunity can be had, to propose to recommit the bill to the committee with instructions to report a bill providing for the continuance of seven-thirty bonds with the condition that when the Government shall resume specie payment the interest shall be at six per cent.

Mr. BROOMALL. I ask my colleague to allow me the six minutes left of his time to explain my amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BROOMALL. The time allowed me in which to explain my amendment is short. I will therefore do it in as few words as I can. I was opposed to the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means because I look upon it as allowing the amount of $600,000,000 to be issued at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury in such notes as might enter into the currency and so further inflate it. I was opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON], adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, because it required the whole $600,000,000 to be issued in bonds the interest on which would necessarily be payable in gold; because I believe that no money has yet been borrowed on bonds where the interest was not payable in gold. Being thus between the two extremes, I offer my amendment partly for the purpose of explaining what I am willing to vote for, and mainly with the hope that the two extremes would adopt my amendment as a mean between them.

The difference between my amendment and that of the Committee of Ways and Means is simply this: it restricts the amount of the Treasury notes to be issued under the act to $100,000,000 instead of allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue the whole $600,000,000. It also raises the minimum denomination. It provides that the lowest notes shall be of $100 instead of $50.

I think, if the provisions are fairly considered, it will be seen while on the one hand it will not require us to continue the gold-bearing bonds to so large an amount, on the other hand it will not allow the issue of such notes as will materially enter into the currency. Notes of $100 and upward play but a small part in inflating the currency. Notes of a smaller denomination perform almost the whole function. I do not believe with some gentlemen who have addressed the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Whether or not a note is a legal tender will not affect the question of its entering into the currency. If it will pass at par it will enter into the currency and inflate it. As long as a note is passed at par daily it will enter into the circulation, because by passing from hand to hand at par it is currency.

The only means of preventing Treasury notes from entering into the currency consists in two things which I have endeavored to hit in my amendment; that is, the keeping the denomination so high as to prevent their inflating the currency, and to make them interest-bearing. As long as notes are interest-bearing they will enter into the currency only until the amount of interest becomes a material matter. The moment the interest on the $100 notes becomes a material matter—and that is early—the people are induced to hold them.

This is all I have time to say. I hope both sides will agree to adopt my amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] to the first section reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized, any sums, not exceeding in the aggregate $300,000,000, and to issue therefor coupon or registered bonds of the United States in such form as he may prescribe; and so much thereof as may be issued in bonds shall be of denominations not less than fifty dollars, and may be made payable at any period not more than forty years from date of issue, or may be made redeemable, at the pleasure of the Government, at any period not less than five years nor more than forty years from date, or payable as aforesaid, as may be expressed upon their face; and the interest on such bonds shall be payable semi-annually: Provided, That the rate of interest on any such bonds or other obligations, when payable in coin, shall not exceed six per cent. per annum; and when not payable in coin shall not exceed seven and three tenths per cent. per annum; and the rate and character of interest shall be expressed on all such bonds.

Mr. HOOPER. As this is a test vote, and as the amendment prohibits the issue of the popular seven and three tenth notes, I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I would inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts what is the difference, if any, between the Treasury notes authorized by the bill of the Committee of Ways and Means and those Treasury notes now being sold daily, and from which the Government is realizing three or four millions a day.

Mr. HOOPER. None whatever.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have this question understood before the vote is taken. I understand that there is a great difference between the provisions of this bill and the existing law for issuing seven-thirty notes. Under the present law they can only be issued upon subscription, while under the operations of the present bill they may be paid out as other money by the Government.

Mr. HOOPER. That provision to which the gentleman refers applies only to cases where a party who has a claim against the Government desires to subscribe for the loan to the extent of the Government indebtedness to him. He has the option to take the money or to take bonds under this act.

Mr. WILSON. Then this bill differs from the present law in another important respect. Under the provisions of the bill as reported from the Committee of Ways and Means these notes may be issued redeemable or payable at such periods as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, may be deemed expedient. Now the present seven-thirty notes are convertible in three years. But the Secretary may make these notes, under the present bill as it comes from the committee, redeemable in thirty, sixty, or ninety days, or one, two, or three years. That is a very important difference.

Again, the bill which we now have under consideration does not prohibit the Secretary of the Treasury from issuing notes in the precise form of the original interest-bearing notes now legal tender for their face.

In these three respects the notes issued under the present bill may differ from the present seven and three tenth notes.

Now what I desired to have an opportunity to do was to move to recommit this bill to the committee with instructions to report a bill continuing the present system of seven and three tenth notes, and to provide that after the resumption of specie payment the interest shall be six per cent. instead of seven and three tenths.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 48, nays 97, not voting 37; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Graves, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Denison, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Ganson, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Kalfelisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, McKimney, James R. Morris, Morrison, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Stillis, Strouse, Sweat, Townsend, Webster, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Fernando Wood—48.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, English, Fink, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Lazear, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Loan, Long, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orin, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Sloan, Smith, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—97.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Anderson, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cobb, Coffroth, Creswell, Donnelly, Eden, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, King, Mallory, McDowell, McDouge, William H. Miller, Nelson, Noble, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Shannon, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Tracy, Voorhees, Chilton A. White, and Benjamin Wood—37.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. COFFROTH stated that he was paired with Mr. SHANNON upon all questions connected with this bill.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move that the House take a recess this afternoon from half past four until half past seven o'clock, p. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to; and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the session of this evening is set apart for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL. Will that business override the tariff bill?

The SPEAKER. It will. By the order of the House yesterday, Tuesday evening was assigned by unanimous consent for the consideration of reports from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I move to suspend the rules so as to enable me to move that the House dispose of the tariff bill before that business shall be taken up.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Vermont that no motion in regard to that matter will be in order, the order having been made by unanimous consent, until the time is reached when that order operates. The matter will be within the control of the majority of the House this evening, and the business of the Committee on Naval Affairs can then be postponed by a majority of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. Then I give notice that I shall make an effort to have the consideration of the tariff bill continued until it shall be disposed of.

LOAN BILL—AGAIN.

The House then resumed the consideration of the special order reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the original bill before the adoption of Mr. Wilson's substitute for the first section and for the offering of which in the House unanimous consent had been given to Mr. HOOPER, were severally read, and agreed to.

The question recurred on the following amendment, in the nature of an additional section, offered by Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland:

And be it further enacted, That no note or obligation hereafter issued under any act of Congress shall be a legal tender, and no Treasury notes bearing interest for fifty dollars or under shall be reissued when paid into or received by the Treasury, but all such notes shall be canceled; and no Treasury note hereafter to be issued under any law shall be for a less sum than $100.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 86, not voting 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, William G. Brown, Chanler, Clay, Cox, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Herrick, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Law, Le Blond, Marcy, McKinney, Middleton, Morrison, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Rogers, Scofield, Scott, Spalding, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Townsend, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Fernando Wood—55.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Holman, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knapp, Knox, Lazear, Littlejohn, Loan, Long, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Ross, Schenck, Sloan, Smith, Smithers, Stuart, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Yecman—86.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Coffroth, Creswell, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Donnelly, Eckley, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Hutchins, Julian, Kasson, King, Mallory, McDowell, McIndoe, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, Shannon, Starr, John B. Steele, Sweet, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Benjamin Wood, and Worthington—41.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. BROOMALL'S amendment, as follows:

Sec. 1. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of $100,000,000 of the amount of bonds authorized by this act, the Secretary of the Treasury may at his discretion issue Treasury notes of denominations not more than one hundred dollars, bearing interest at a rate not less than six nor more than seven and three tenths per cent. per annum, and the said Treasury notes shall be made convertible into any bonds authorized by this act, and the interest and principal shall be made payable at such time within twenty years as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine.

Mr. BROOMALL. As that amendment has been rendered unnecessary and inconsistent with the bill by the action of the House on the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I ask leave to withdraw it.

The amendment was withdrawn.

The question recurred on the substitute offered by Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, and it was rejected.

The question recurred on the substitute offered by Mr. STEVENS, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to borrow from time to time, on the credit of the United States, a sum not exceeding $600,000,000, and to issue therefor coupons or registered bonds, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government after ten years, and payable at any time not more than forty years from the passage of this act, at a rate of interest not exceeding eight per cent. per annum, and of such denominations, not less than fifty dollars, as he may deem expedient. And he may, in his discretion, dispose of such bonds at any time, upon such terms as he may deem most advisable. And said bonds shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be at liberty to exchange bonds similar to those provided for in the first section of this act with the holders of any bonds or obligations of the United States bearing interest: Provided, That such exchange shall be offered by the holders of obligations within two years after the passage of this act.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury may dispose of bonds similar to those provided for in the first section of this act in exchange for Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, certificates of deposit, or any representatives of value which have been or may be issued under any act of Congress; and whenever any person or persons owning a claim against the United States for materials or supplies furnished, which shall have been duly adjusted and approved by the proper officers, and for the payment of which requisitions shall have been duly made by the appropriate Department or officer upon the Treasury of the United States, shall have given notice in writing to the Department or officer making the requisition that the owner of such claim desires to subscribe for a loan authorized to the amount of said claim, or some part thereof, and to receive in payment of the claim the bonds or other obligations similar to those provided for by this act, the said officers or Department, when making such requisition, shall specify therein the name or names of the claimant or claimants who shall have given such notice, and also the amount of such claim or claims; and thereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue to the officer or Department making said requisition the bonds or other obligations aforesaid, to be delivered in payment to said claimant or claimants, at the same rates and under the same conditions that the Secretary disposes of similar bonds or obligations, not below par, to other parties; and such issuing of bonds or obligations shall, to that extent, be a valid compliance with such requisition.

The amendment was rejected; there being, on a division—yeas 33, nays 77.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOOPER moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, and for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE called for tellers on the passage of the bill.

Tellers were ordered.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 78, nays 35.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HOOPER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays on the latter motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 47, not voting 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, English, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Lazear, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Smithers, Spalding, Sweet, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Wilder, Windom, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yecman—91.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Brooks, Chanler, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Denison, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Holman, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Le Blond, Long, Marcy, McKinney, Middleton, Morrison, Noble, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Pruyn, Rogers, Ross, Scott, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Townsend, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—47.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Bliss, James S. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Coffroth, Cravens, Creswell, Donnelly, Farnsworth, Hall, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herrick, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Julian, King, Law, Mallory, McDowell, McIndoe, Nelson, John O'Neill, Pike, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, John H. Rice, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Shannon, Smith, Starr, John B. Steele, Stuart, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, and Benjamin Wood—44.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 621) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1866; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 164) authorizing a contract with William H. Powell for a picture for the Capitol.

TARIFF BILL.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a privileged question.

Mr. MORRILL. There are several privileged questions pending. I hope that the House will allow the tariff bill to be now taken up and acted upon. It cannot be considered in the Senate at all unless we pass it to-day.

Mr. GARFIELD. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the tariff bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have a privileged report to make.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont moves to suspend the rules which make the report privileged.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This is not under the rules, but under the order of the House.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman can make his report as soon as we complete the tariff bill. It will take but a short time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is very important that the proposition which I have to report shall pass immediately.

Mr. MORRILL. It is not so important as the passage of the tariff bill. Before the question is put on the motion to suspend the rules I move that all general debate on the tariff bill shall close in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to suspend the rules, and it was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LITTLEJOHN in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 795) amendatory of certain acts imposing duties upon foreign importations.

Mr. HOLMAN. As there seems to be such an extraordinary anxiety to press this bill upon this House, I will not call for the reading of the bill at length.

The first section was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section six of an act entitled "An act to increase the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, be amended in paragraph marked "second," by striking out after the words "on finer and lighter goods of like description" the words "exceeding one hundred threads and;" and that section eighteen of the said act be amended by inserting therein after the words "raw cotton," in parentheses, the words "and raw silk as reeled from the cocoon."

Mr. WARD. I move to add to this section the words, "or not further advanced than tram, thrown, or orgazine." I presume the Committee of Ways and Means will not object to that amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not object to that. There are, however, many amendments that may be proper; and the greatest objection I have to them is the swelling the size of the bill.

Mr. WARD. The reason for the amendment is this: these words, as is well understood by the Committee of Ways and Means, were incorporated in the bill of the last session, but were omitted in the enrolling of the bill. My object is merely to make this bill conform to the bill of last session as it actually passed both Houses of Congress.

Mr. MORRILL. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WARD] is correct. These words were in the bill last session as it passed; but were omitted in the enrolling of the bill.

The amendment was adopted.

The second section was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the day when this act takes effect, in addition to the duties heretofore imposed by law on the importation of the articles mentioned in this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say:

On brandy, rum, gin, and whisky, and on cordials, liquors, arrack, absinthe, and all other spirituous liquors and spirituous beverages, fifty cents per gallon of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof.

On spun silk for filling in skins or cops, ten per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. WARD. I move to amend this section in the second paragraph by inserting after the words "fifty cents per gallon of first proof" the words "and less strength." We would thus get an increased revenue, because much of these articles imported is of less strength than first proof.

The amendment was adopted.

The first portion of the third section was read, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That from and after this act takes effect, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the importation of the articles mentioned in this section, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties and rates of duty; that is to say:

On cotton, five cents per pound.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to strike out the line reading "on cotton, five cents per pound."

Mr. MORRILL. I hope the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] will not be adopted.

Mr. BROOKS. The reason I make this motion to amend is that there is an excise duty of five cents per pound laid upon home cotton. In point of fact, this is a bounty to the present holders of cotton, and will increase the value of what is in their hands five cents per pound in addition to the present value. Or to make myself clearer: the moment this becomes the law, cotton will rise five cents per pound in the hands of manufacturers or commission merchants or those who have permits to purchase cotton. The prices of all cotton articles are now as high as this country will bear. The amount of manufactures has decreased, and will decrease much more, just in proportion as prices are raised. Manufactures are not only decreasing, but at the present time we are importing Egyptian, Surat, and East India cotton in general. Now, when we are to receive five cents per pound excise duty on our home production of cotton, it seems to me that in the present condition of affairs, considering the present high price of cotton goods, in which the poor are interested more than the other classes, we ought to be content with the excise duty. The reasons which apply to duties on other articles imported do not apply to this. This is one of the products of our own country. The revenue from the excise will be large, and the only effect of this duty will be to increase the price of all cotton manufactures five, ten, or fifteen cents, proportionably as the duty is raised here.

Mr. MORRILL. We have sometimes on this side of the House dealt in hard words toward our "erring southern brethren." But I venture to say that no man in this House has ever proposed a measure so harsh and sweeping in its nature upon them as this proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks.] We have already levied a tax upon the production of cotton in our own country, and the gentleman from New York after this proposes to allow our own manufacturers to import cotton from abroad free of duty, or in other words, to create a bounty upon the production of foreign cotton. What the Committee of Ways and Means propose is to be perfectly fair in this matter of duties upon cotton. If we levy a duty upon the American article, then levy an equivalent duty upon the foreign article.

Now, as it regards the amount of stock on hand, perhaps there never was a time in the history of our country when there was a smaller stock of cotton in the hands of speculators than at present. I know that some favored pets have received permits to get cotton from the South. But unless they get it within our lines within a very short time it will become subject to our internal duty, if the bill providing for that duty shall become a law. There is also a very small stock of cotton goods on hand. There has recently taken place a great depreciation in their value. Cotton goods that lately sold for fifty and sixty cents a yard are now to be had at less than forty cents.

Mr. GRINNELL. At less than thirty cents.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir; and I believe I have seen them quoted at less than thirty cents. With this heavy decline in the price of the raw material, and in the price of the manufactured article, what will be the result? The result will reach foreign manufactures far more oppressively than it will our own. In England, and to some extent on the Continent, manufacturers are in the habit of having on hand at least a year's stock of the raw material, or of the manufactured goods. They cannot supply distant markets with less. But our manufacturers have no such stock. The demand for our goods is now almost exclusively at home. If this great decline should take place, as I am led to anticipate, and if our manufacturers, or those holding stocks of goods, had an amount equal to that held by British manufacturers and merchants, we might look perhaps for a greater disaster to our trade in the coming year than has ever taken place. But the imposition of this duty, instead of being a hardship, will tend to break the fall, and the article itself can at the present time well bear the burden. I hope that it will not be stricken out.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to ask whether it is intended to allow a drawback on this cotton, if it be exported in the form of cotton goods.

Mr. MORRILL. It is provided in the internal revenue bill that a drawback shall be allowed.

Mr. BROOKS. I think it is most unjust to do so.

The Clerk read the following clause:

On illuminating oil and naphtha, benzine, and benzole, refined or produced from the distillation of coal, asphaltum, shale, peat, petroleum, or rock-oil, or other bituminous substances used for like purposes, forty cents per gallon.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. I move to amend by adding at the close of the clause just read the words "on petroleum or rock-oil twenty cents per gallon; and on crude coal oil fifteen cents." After a careful examination of this clause of the bill I have come to the conclusion that it does not cover the crude oil, but only the refined. If it is not included the rock-oil from the Canadas will be brought over into this country, underselling us everywhere in the market, defeating altogether the collection of revenue from this source. Coal tar in a cheap state will also be brought into the country from New Brunswick and Nova Scotia; it will be afterward refined, and thus will evade taxation.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. COLE, of California. I move to insert "on quicksilver twenty per cent. ad valorem." The tax is ten per cent. now. A considerable quantity is imported into this country from France and Spain, where it is produced by convict labor.

Mr. MORRILL. We have not raised the excise duty on quicksilver in the recent internal revenue bill, and I trust that the amendment will not be adopted. If we had this amendment might be proper.

Mr. COLE, of California. I will modify it so as to make it fifteen instead of twenty per cent.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the words "made to patterns and fitted to be laid down on such roads or planes without further manufacture," so that it will read, "on iron bars for railroads or inclined planes, fifteen cents per one hundred pounds."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to strike out the last word. The duties imposed by existing law on the importation of railroad iron constitute a sufficient protection to the American manufacturer. These duties are now twenty cents per pound—$13 40 in gold per ton. The freights from England or Europe to this country are payable in gold, and they are on the average $7 50 per ton. Insurance is equivalent to $1 50 per ton, and the commissions on purchases are equal generally to $1 per ton. Then we have the aggregate of $23 40 as a protection to the American manufacturer upon the importation of this production of railroad iron. Now, sir, we must double that, for everything is double in gold, and you have $46 80 as the protection of the American manufacturer against the foreign producer.

Mr. Chairman, we should look at the present capacity of the mills and manufacturing establishments of this country for railroad iron, and we should further examine the amount of the demand which is made upon them by the completed and uncompleted railroads of this country. We require upon the whole system of our American roads for reconstruction and repairs, independently of the construction of a single mile of new road, three hundred thousand tons a year. The rolling-mills of this country are incapable of producing that amount. This country in its legislation has provided already, as far as it could provide, for the construction of new avenues of communication, new lines for the purpose of developing the interests and productiveness of this country; and I ask, where are we to obtain material for that construction if we by our legislation here shall impose such duties upon the foreign production as to exclude it?

It has been stated, and is undoubtedly true, that the demand for the Government has been so great during the last four years that establishments constructed for the purpose of rolling railroad iron have been compelled to devote their power to other manufactures for the use of the Government. This may cease in the future, and I hope that it will; but, in my judgment, from the information I have obtained, we will be unable in this country to produce the iron that is required for the purpose of repair and reconstruction alone, to say nothing of that demanded by new enterprises on this continent. I therefore believe such legislation at the present time is unwise.

We are looking in this bill for revenue. I desire that the coffers of this Government shall be filled as far as may be, and while I would not lay my hand severely upon the American producer and manufacturer, I would not put a duty on a foreign importation so high as to preclude them, and preventing the Government from having those revenues which should flow into it when the tariff of internal duties shall be adjusted according to reason and judgment. I hope that we shall not add to the duties already imposed on this article.

Mr. COX. Did I understand the gentleman to say that this was an increase of the present duty upon railroad iron?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Yes, sir; the present duty is $13 40 a ton, and this adds $3, making $16 40.

Mr. MORRILL. I am sorry to differ with my friend from New York, for whose judgment I certainly entertain the greatest respect, with reference to this article of railroad iron. If there is anything in the history of the last three or four years that has given us strength, it has been the ability of our country to produce iron in the largest quantities. Without an enlargement of the capacity of the country to its present extent we should not have been equal to the contest in which we are now engaged. The vast amount of iron consumed by the present war is perhaps unknown to most of the members of this House, and the gentleman from New York has underrated the capacity of our country to produce railroad iron. If I am not greatly misinformed, that capacity at the present time is more than double that stated by the gentleman from New York; and yet, Mr. Chairman, from the unfavorable action of this House last year, both upon the subject of internal taxes and the tariff, the amount which has been imported has more than quadrupled in less than two years, and is still increasing at a rapidly advancing rate.

I have taken pains to ascertain from the Treasury Department the facts in reference to this matter; but before I give that information let me remind the committee that last year we raised the internal revenue tax upon railroad iron from $1 50 to $6 for two thousand pounds, and we made no increase whatever in the tariff except to reduce the ton from gross weight to net weight. This has been thought to be a very great hardship upon that interest, and the price of pig iron produced in Ohio and Pennsylvania has gone down more than one half. The price of that article but recently was something like seventy to seventy-five dollars per ton, and it is now less than forty dollars, I am told, for the same quality.

The amount of railroad iron imported into the country from abroad for year 1864 was 118,714 tons, amounting to $3,904,417, which was paid for, of course, in coin. The amount that was imported for the quarter succeeding that, (ending September 30, 1864,) was 39,664 tons, which is at the rate of 160,000 tons per annum, provided the same rate of importation continued during the year, (as it is not probable it will,) amounting to $1,500,000 in gold, exclusive of tariff duties.

Under these circumstances the Committee of Ways and Means have not proposed any extravagant measure; but after consulting with many members who last year voted against giving any consideration for the internal tax levied upon railroad iron they have agreed to report fifteen cents per hundred pounds, or three dollars per ton. I do not think the judgment of the House will be that that much is wrong. I hope this provision will be agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move to amend by striking out the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth lines, as follows:

On iron bars for railroads or inclined planes, made to patterns and fitted to be laid down on such roads or planes without further manufacture, fifteen cents per one hundred pounds.

I move this amendment in all earnestness. It is not a mere formal motion. This article of railroad iron ought not to be raised three dollars a ton more as this bill provides. It is nothing more nor less than giving the iron men three dollars a ton as a bounty more than they got before. It is heaping gratuity on gratuity. And gentlemen say this is all right; gentlemen from Pennsylvania all say it is right.

Mr. STROUSE. I have failed to hear any gentleman from Pennsylvania rise in his seat here and say "it is all right," or advocate any increase of the tariff on iron.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I had no idea of striking Pennsylvania so near by when I made my remark; but I cannot understand from the argument of the intelligent gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] why the people who represent other elements and interests of industry should be laid under perpetual burdens for the purpose of aiding one peculiar interest of any one State, or any class interest of any kind, and especially when such interests are already surfeited with protection. This is a tax upon the railroads of the country, and it is at last extorted from their passengers; in other words, it comes from the people, as all other taxes do.

There is no class of industry so much protected by the present tariff as the iron interests. They know it, and if there is any reason why iron has fallen from eighty dollars a ton to forty dollars a ton since the last session of Congress it is simply because the protection has been so enormous as to increase the manufacture in an unhealthy and ruinous degree, thereby inducing rivalry in this country, which tends to break down the whole business, unless we fix the rates of duty at a proper and moderate rate.

The gentleman from Vermont objects that there should be foreign iron imported into this country. He says that owing to the war and other reasons iron has come rather too abundantly from abroad, and that we have imported three or four times the amount this year that we did two years ago. Perhaps I may be wrong in this statement. But if that be so, I say let it come. Let any article come if it cheapens its price to the people. Reduce the price of railroad iron in these times of war when railroads play such a conspicuous part in the war, both in strategy and transportation, and invite the largest competition from all the world to supply us with this indispensable article.

I undertook to show to this House last year from statistics, precisely what the extent of protection was in favor of this particular class of interests, and on railroad iron. I thought I had proved (at least it was never answered, and I derived my statistics from the census and from reliable returns made) that railroad iron had, under the then tariff before it was increased, one hundred and ninety per cent. of bounty on a paper basis. They call it protection. It is nothing less than robbery from one and the large class of people to help another and a smaller class. I proved also that the bounty on bar iron was one hundred and seventy per cent.; I mean on a paper basis, supposing the customs all to be paid in gold, as they are. And yet these iron men come here, and with unblushing audacity, clamor for more, and more, and more. If they were wise in their day and generation they would stop this clamor, because the longer and larger the protection is given, in the end the worse their ruin.

I am therefore in earnest in moving to strike out this section. There is no reason why the duty should be enlarged. It will not give any more revenue. It is simply for the purpose of fostering one class of interests to the detriment of another.

Mr. GRINNELL. I am opposed to striking out this section. I believe that the gentleman from Ohio stated the fact as it is when he said that rivalry had reduced the price of iron. I think I so understood the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I did not say that. I said that that was the inference to be drawn from the remarks of the gentleman upon the other side of the House, [Mr. DAVIS, of New York.]

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman did state distinctly that iron manufacturers had increased, and that the price of iron had been reduced during the last year.

Mr. COX. I went further, the gentleman will apprehend, and said that it would go on, if this protection should be increased, so as to break down the whole interest, and that it would be better to keep the tariff at a moderate rate. My idea is this, I beg the gentleman to understand, that where you give any protection you have got to give a little more and a little more. It is like one of those machines you find in Pennsylvania or New England, where if you put a finger in the hand goes, and then the arm, and then the whole body, and it is better to cut it off at the finger at once. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Chairman, the God of nature, as I have understood, in endowing this country has settled the question that we can make our own iron and should make it. We have iron mountains, we have coal, and we have that with which to feed the men engaged in the mining of those articles.

Now, I am called upon to vote on this question as a western man. Shall I say to my constituents, it is better for you to seek a market for your grain across the ocean rather than down by the iron mountain in Missouri, or the iron mountains on Lake Superior, or the iron mountains in Pennsylvania or New York or Vermont?

I sir, have settled this question in my mind a long time ago, that if we can bring about a rivalry we shall have cheap iron and get a good price for our products. The price of grain is determined by the market. If you must have a foreign market you must calculate what it costs to take wheat there. If the market is at Pittsburg you get much more for it there than you get at Liverpool. If the market is at St. Louis you get the more for it. This must settle the question. Bring the manufacturer of iron here to us and the grain producer is benefited by it. Take away the tariff and let the cheap labor of Europe come in competition with our labor, and the consequence will be that our farmers must send their grain abroad. I am opposed to all this. It looks to me like superlative nonsense.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman from Iowa allow me one question?

Mr. GRINNELL. Certainly.

Mr. COX. If the gentleman were president of a railroad company, and if iron were offered in the markets of Europe at forty dollars per ton, while he would have to pay eighty dollars for it here; or if he were in the sheep business and could get some excellent foreign breeds, would he not prefer to make his purchases abroad rather than in this country? I know he would. And that is the whole argument.

Mr. GRINNELL. So far as these incidental arguments are concerned, I say that I do not need to go abroad to buy either sheep or iron. As one interested in the extension of western railroads, I believe that the stockholders would advance their interests by stimulating the grain production by means of supplying near and home markets, which are those at once reliable and beneficial to those distant from the sea-board.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his amendment, that I may renew it.

Mr. COX. I am pressing this amendment in earnest. I will withdraw it if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. KASSON. I will do so.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I renew it. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that, however reluctantly, I have been obliged to differ with the Committee of Ways and Means in this proposition to increase the duty on the species of bar iron adapted to railroads; and I wish to give my reasons. While my colleague [Mr. GRINNELL] has a railroad to the town where he lives, I unfortunately have not yet a railroad to my town—and I want one. I also recognize a difference between us beyond that. He regards this theory of protection as much more effective than I do; and I give him credit for acting in sincerity on his belief. I believe that the agricultural products of the West have their prices affected here essentially by their prices in Europe, and that whenever the prices are enhanced at Liverpool they are also enhanced at Pittsburg. Why? Because we produce a surplus of agricultural products which must be exported. If we do not have a sufficient market abroad, that surplus settles down on the quantity retained at home and lowers the price. If the price abroad goes up, it naturally carries up the price at home. The laws of supply and demand regulate the price.

Mr. GRINNELL. Let me ask my colleague whether, if we have to seek a foreign market for our grain, it does not reduce the price to the farmers in proportion to the cost of transportation.

Mr. KASSON. Not at all. If the foreign market demands our grain, it goes at a price better than can be got for it at home. If we have no surplus, then our home demand regulates the price here. If we have a surplus, the price at Liverpool regulates the price in this country.

Now, in order to get the western products to any market, either at home or abroad, we must have railroads, unless we run steamboats on dry land, as some of them do run almost on dew. But the boats are unable to carry the great products of the western country. So we have no necessity of striking at any interest of the country. The question is whether it is of more importance to the whole country to increase the profits of the manufacturers of railroad iron at the expense of the extension of your railroad system through the West, or to increase that railroad system, thus creating a large addition to the revenue of the country in the ten thousand channels that are affected by the great surplus of western products. As for myself, I believe it is our duty to leave the way open so far as it is now open—and it is by no means very widely open—for the introduction of railroad iron from abroad, with a view to hold a check upon the price that is imposed by the railroad iron manufacturers in this country. I cannot yield the great interests of the West, which are now utterly dependent upon the extension of the railroad system. We cannot settle our lands without it; we cannot get immigration without it; or if we do get immigration to a partial degree we cannot without railroads realize the value of the products that they raise upon our lands. Every prosperity of the West hangs upon this very railroad system, and I cannot consent to see it destroyed by this increased duty on railroad iron.

Mr. MORRILL. I now move that the committee rise, and I would say that the public business is so pressing that I hope every member of the House will be promptly present this evening at the hour of meeting.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEJOHN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, according to order, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 795) amendatory of certain acts imposing duties upon foreign importations, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the following title:

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 116) for the relief of Mrs. Lucy A. Rice, late of Richmond, Virginia; when the Speaker signed the same.

GENERAL THOMAS AND ADMIRAL LEE.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (H. R. No. 139) of thanks to General Thomas, together with the Senate amendment to include the name of Admiral Lee, for the purpose of having the same referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

No objection being made, the joint resolution and amendment were referred accordingly.

PAUL S. FORBES.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, asked unanimous consent to have taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs joint resolution of the Senate authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance to Paul S. Forbes $250,000 additional out of the sum to be paid him under his contract for building a steam screw sloop-of-war.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, submitted a report from the committee, with accompanying testimony, together with a bill to prevent the enlistment of persons charged with crime in the District of Columbia as substitutes in the Army and Navy, and to prevent frauds at the District jail in the city of Washington; and moved that the report and bill be printed, and that the bill be recommitted to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

The hour of half past four p. m. having arrived, the House took a recess till half past seven p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock, p. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution of the House inquiring if any order has been issued prohibiting colored persons from leaving Washington without a pass.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that the communication be printed and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution of the House inquiring the number of troops furnished by California, and concerning the enforcement of the draft in that State.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that the communication be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to; and the communication was accordingly referred and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War in answer to a resolution of the House inquiring the amount of money paid for the use of the steamer Vanderbilt.

Laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to postpone the special order for this evening, until after the tariff bill shall have been concluded. If the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts] desires it, I will move that his committee have to-morrow evening.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I must object to that. This evening has been specially assigned by the House for the consideration of the business of the Committee on Naval Affairs; and it was upon my own motion that this evening session was held. I think it is but due to the committee, and necessary to the welfare of the Government, that the business with which the committee has been charged by the House shall be considered this evening. There has been no opportunity since the recess of Congress for this committee to report. We have some measures which we are very anxious to present. I think that the time having been specially assigned to the committee by the House we are entitled to it.

Mr. MORRILL. How long will it take?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I do not know how long. But I think the Committee of Ways and Means should not seek to deprive us of the opportunity of using the time which has been assigned to us by the House. I hope, therefore, the motion of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Morrill] will not prevail.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no disposition to deprive the Naval Committee of proper opportunity to get their bill before the House. I am willing to leave it to the House to say whether it is not best that the tariff bill which has been before the House should be concluded and sent to the Senate, in order that it may be acted on there, or whether it is best to devote the evening to other business.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The gentleman will have his time to-morrow morning. I hope the motion will not prevail.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Vermont move to postpone till to-morrow evening?

Mr. DAWES. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to assign this business to to-morrow evening. I have been waiting for an opportunity to bring before the House some privileged questions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say that I have in my charge a privileged report, which I have postponed until the gentleman from Vermont could get through the tariff bill, so that it might go to the Senate. I shall insist on my right to bring in that report as soon as the tariff bill is disposed of.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We cannot object to any privileged report which the gentleman from Illinois has the right under the rules to bring in. But our committee, charged with business connected with the organization and administration of the Navy of our country, has not had for three months an opportunity to report to this House; and there are before the committee matters that seriously concern the efficiency of our Navy. The chairman of the committee, with great persistency, only justified by the importance of the case, has insisted for a week past in having a day assigned for the business of this committee; but the Committee of Ways and Means have occupied almost the entire time of the House for the last week.

Mr. STEVENS. Why, sir, the enrollment bill has occupied four days to one that has been occupied by our business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the motion of the gentleman from Vermont is to postpone the special assignment for this evening till to-morrow evening.

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir. It must be obvious to every member that if we expect this bill to be acted on in the Senate it must be put through to-day. I therefore demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

On the motion to postpone the special order, there were, on a division—ayes 47, noes 49.

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL, and Rice of Massachusetts, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 47, noes 57.

So the special order was not postponed.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill to further supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for to-morrow and from day to day until disposed of.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to make a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. When a time is assigned for a committee, they have the exclusive right to that time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does a special order shut out any report?

The SPEAKER. A special order does not, but an assignment of a day or an evening gives exclusive right, for otherwise the Committee of Elections might come in and consume the whole time. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I cannot, for if I yield to the gentleman I must yield to others.

NAVAL JUDGE ADVOCATE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report a bill to establish the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate.

The bill was read a first and second time.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, that bill has been recommended by the Secretary of the Navy. He has reported that numerous law cases occur in his Department from time to time which demand the attention of a solicitor to be attached to that Department. There are questions in relation to the formation and interpretation of contracts, and in relation to proceedings in courts-martial which have to be decided. The Secretary has informed us that the Department will be greatly facilitated in its action by the appointment of such an officer, and that it will result in a great saving to the Government. The committee were unanimous in reporting the bill. I understand that the Senate committee have also approved a similar bill.

The salary fixed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury was $4,000, and the Committee on Naval Affairs cut down the amount $500, making it $3,500. We also provide that the office shall continue only during the rebellion and one year thereafter.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want to know what the provision means in reference to limiting the fees for recording the proceedings of naval courts-martial to $200. I want to know why we should allow fees to a salaried officer.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The existing law allows beyond that sum, and we have thought it proper to limit it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Are these fees to be paid to this solicitor in addition to his salary?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. They are not, and I think that if the gentleman will read the paragraph he will be satisfied. It provides that the fees for record of naval courts-martial shall not in any case exceed $200.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am sorry that the Naval Affairs Committee have brought in a bill to create this new office with a new salary. I think that we can get along without it.

Mr. DAWES. Are these fees to go to the Solicitor of the Navy Department?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. They go to whoever makes the record of the court, wherever that may be. The office of the Judge Advocate General is to be at the Navy Department.

I demand the previous question.

Mr. BLISS. I would like to have this bill more definite. It provides that this office shall continue during the rebellion and one year afterward. I would like to have it more specific.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It will require a year to finish the business which will have accrued in the Department. We desire that he shall continue no longer than his services are necessary.

Mr. SPALDING. When this subject first came before the Committee on Naval Affairs I was opposed to it in toto. On consultation with the Secretary of the Navy I found that he was compelled to pay out four times the amount to attorneys, and I was willing to agree to it if the office were made temporary. It is only to continue during the rebellion and one year afterward, and to pay the officer $3,500 instead of attorneys four times that amount.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not engrossed, and it goes to the Speaker's table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was not agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF ADMIRALS AND OTHERS.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 535) to further regulate the appointment of admirals, and for the appointment of certain volunteer officers in the Navy, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF MIDSHIPMEN.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back a bill (H.

R. No. 605) to increase the pay of midshipmen, and for other purposes; with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The substitute was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL SERVICE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to amend certain acts relative to the naval service, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I think it is proper that I should make some explanation of this bill; but I will detain the House only a few minutes.

The first section amends the seventh section of the act of February 24, 1864, which provided that in case of the transfer of seamen and ordinary seamen who had enlisted in the Army, to the Navy, the amount of the bounties which they had received from the State or from the national Government when enlisting should be deducted from any prize money to which such seamen might become entitled during the term of their enlistment.

The Comptroller of the Treasury has stated that it is impossible for him to carry out that provision, inasmuch as he has no means whatever of ascertaining what amount of bounty any such seamen had received from the State or national Government at the time of his enlistment into the Army. The act has in fact become inoperative. This first section repeals that provision.

The second section provides that any person who shall desert from the naval service of the United States shall, after his apprehension or return to the service, be required to serve an additional time equal to that during which he was absent from the service; and that he shall serve that additional time in addition to any penalties which may be inflicted upon him as a punishment for his desertion.

The third section reduces the pay of the officer now charged with experiments in gunnery at the Washington navy-yard, and saves some twelve or fifteen hundred dollars a year.

Mr. KASSON. I call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the fact that that law has been already repealed in an appropriation bill passed at this session.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. That only shows that another committee of the House had their attention called to the same subject.

The bill further provides for the amendment of the tenth section of the prize law, so as that fleet surgeons, fleet paymasters, and fleet engineers shall participate in the distribution of prize money with the other officers attached to the vessels of the fleet. They were accidentally omitted at the time when the prize law was passed; and the bill still further provides that the act of July 4, 1864, which provides for the payment of not exceeding sixty dollars to the crews of vessels sunk or destroyed in action during the present rebellion, shall be applied to such officers. This bill limits the application of that provision to such ships as have been so lost or destroyed since the commencement of the present rebellion. The provision is rendered necessary by the fact that a large number of old claims for such losses antedating the present rebellion have been brought in.

The bill further provides that the provisions of the pension law of July 4, 1864, which says that persons in the military service of the United States shall be entitled to a pension of twenty dollars a month for the loss of both feet, and twenty-five dollars a month for the loss of both arms or both eyes, shall also apply to persons who have suffered in like manner during their service in the Navy. There seems to be no good reason at all why a man who loses his legs, or his arms, or his eyes in battle in the naval service should not be entitled to the same pension that is provided for those in the military service. I believe that there can be no objection to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in regard to the first section of this bill. It occurs to me that those men who enlisted in the Army and received bounties in the Army and afterward were transferred to the Navy ought not to keep the bounties which they received in the Army and then have all the pay, emoluments, and prizes that they receive in the Navy. It offers a premium for men to go into the Army first and then get transferred into the Navy. I think that first section ought not to pass.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. My friend from Ohio was quite right in his first impression, and the provision of law is as suggested by him. I recollect that my attention was called to it at that time. But, as I said when I commenced my explanation, the law is practically inoperative.

Now, inasmuch as transfers from the Army to the Navy have almost entirely ceased, and the number of seamen transferred who have become entitled to any prize money is very limited, the Comptroller of the Treasury says, in a letter which I have here, that it is impossible for him to carry out the provisions of that law, and it is upon his request that this modification is made.

Mr. GARFIELD. Could not the bounty be taken out of their pay?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. If my friend will understand the point, it is this, that there are no means by which the Comptroller can become informed of the amount of bounties which these persons have received. The committee have looked into this subject very carefully, and they find that the law is practically inoperative.

Mr. GARFIELD. They can find out, certainly, what bounties have been received from the General Government.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; but not what bounties have been received from States, counties, and individuals.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why not have it so that the State and local bounties shall not be returned, but that the Federal bounties shall be? We ought to deduct the bounties that we know of.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. As I said before, the cases amount to nothing of any account, and the officer of the Government charged with the execution of this duty says that it is impossible for him to carry it out. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DESTRUCTION OF THE ALABAMA.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to compensate the officers and crew of the United States steamer Kearsarge for the destruction of the rebel piratical vessel Alabama; which was read a first and second time.

The bill instructs the Secretary of the Navy to pay to Commodore John A. Winslow and the officers and crew belonging to the United States steamer Kearsarge while engaged in the capture and destruction of the rebel piratical vessel Alabama, on 19th June, 1864, the sum of $190,000, the same being the estimated value thereof; the said amount to be distributed to the officers and crew in the same manner as prize money, and to be in lieu of the bounty authorized by the eleventh section of the act of June 30, 1864, to regulate prize proceedings, &c.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not desire to make any point of order on this bill, but I wish to inquire whether there is any general law authorizing the payment of bounty money in such cases.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will be happy to explain to the gentleman from Indiana if he will give me his attention for a moment. The eleventh section of the prize law passed the 30th of June last authorizes bounty to be paid for each man on board of an enemy's vessel which is destroyed by any vessel of the United States of $100 per man, provided that the enemy's vessel so destroyed is of inferior force to the vessel by which she is destroyed, and of $200 per man on board the enemy's vessel if it be of equal or superior force to her captor or destroyer.

The tenth section of the same bill also provides that where a vessel of the United States Navy captures an enemy's vessel and brings her into port, if the captured vessel be of equal or superior force to her captor, then the whole value of the vessel goes to the captor. Everybody in the House is sufficiently familiar with the ravages of that piratical vessel, the Alabama, upon American commerce, and with the great anxiety that prevailed not only among the members of the Government but also among commercial men everywhere, that that vessel should be captured or destroyed. She was so captured and destroyed on the 19th of June last; and the service thus rendered to the country and to its commercial business by her destruction has seemed to be of so great importance as to demand on behalf of the captors something more than the paltry sum that they would get by the payment of $200 a man for every man on board of the Kearsarge. The Secretary of the Navy has consequently recommended that substantially the provisions of the tenth section of the prize law shall be carried into effect in this case—that is, to give to the captors of the Alabama substantially the advantages which they would have derived had they succeeded in bringing the Alabama into port.

I believe that the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose of ascertaining what would be a fair sum to award to the captors under the tenth section of the prize law, ordered a board of naval officers to make an estimate of the value of the ship and her equipments; and that board reported the value to be, according to their estimate, $190,000. That sum is very much less than the cost of the vessel or her estimate abroad. I think she cost originally £58,000, which would be some $240,000 in gold. And this is a proposition to give to her captors $190,000, which is only the sum to which they would be entitled had they succeeded in bringing the vessel into port.

It seems to me, sir, that the service performed by Commodore Winslow and his associates was of that brilliant and useful character both to the reputation of the country and to the protection and safety of our commerce that it is eminently worthy of the recognition of Congress, as it has been recognized by the people throughout all portions of the loyal section of the country. I trust the House will concur in the object of the bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts as to whether it has been the habit of the Government heretofore, where a vessel has been destroyed by one of our cruisers, to allow compensation in lieu of the prize money to which they would be entitled if they had taken her into port.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Of course the instances in which such compensation would be paid would be very rare, because the circumstances under which such compensation would be recommended or made would be of the most extraordinary character—in one word, would be of as extraordinary a character as that which is now under consideration.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I wish to know whether the Government has ever heretofore allowed as prize money the value of the vessel sunk by one of our cruisers.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I have endeavored in what I have already said to explain that the conditions of this bill seem to be entirely in accord with the principle that is involved in the tenth section of the prize law, which is that in a case where an enemy's vessel is of equal or of superior force to the captor, the whole value of that vessel shall go to the captors and no portion of it accrue to the United States. In this case the Kearsarge destroyed the Alabama, sending her to the bottom, and therefore did not bring her into port; and the officers and crew of the Kearsarge are thus deprived of the prize money which would have fallen to them by the sale of the vessel.

But the service they have rendered is of so distinguished a character that it has been deemed proper and just to recognize it by giving them a sum equivalent to the estimated value of the vessel when she was destroyed.

I am unable to answer categorically the question propounded to me by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, any more perhaps than it would be possible for him to answer me if I were to ask him for an instance where a similar service had been performed by any naval vessel of the United States.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I merely supposed that when a bill of this character was proposed for this House to pass, the committee would be prepared to satisfy this House of its propriety both in the way of principle and precedent. It may be right; I merely wanted some information in this respect.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I think that the principle involved is correct. I did not suppose that I should be able to point to precedents in this case, inasmuch as the act itself is of so brilliant and useful a character as to have no precedent. I will say further in relation to this bill, that in a letter from Captain Winslow, received by me a few days ago, he stated to me that he was repeatedly called upon by his subordinate officers, and especially by the men constituting the crew of the Kearsarge, whether the Government intended in some way, some proper and suitable manner, to recognize the valuable services they have performed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this bill on principle. [Laughter.] Gentlemen laugh at that; they either do not understand it, or it shows that those who laugh are unprincipled themselves. I am opposed to granting prize money except where the law requires it to be paid, and I would be in favor of abolishing the prize system altogether. It is paying money to sailors and others without consideration. When we enlist sailors, and pay them for services, we expect them to perform all that is contemplated in that service. They are paid a quantum meruit for that service. They are paid for doing their duty; and that is enough. I know we have a prize law; I know the source from which that law is derived. But I am opposed to taxing the Treasury of the United States any more than we can help in order to enlarge this system of prize money beyond the law. Officers of the Navy have made immense fortunes since this war commenced by the receipt of prize money. I do not want to stretch the law any further than is necessary to carry out its intent. I oppose this bill because it seeks to do this. If it did not do this, what is the need of this law? It would be superfluous.

Why, sir, we undertake in this bill to give prize money to men, not for capturing, but for sinking a vessel. And the gentleman says, or his bill is predicated on the idea, that there is no difference between the two acts. What is the object and origin of this prize system? When the property is brought into port, when a consideration is rendered to the Government, then, and only then, there is a share given for the services by which property is taken for and used by the Government. But it is all wrong to undertake to tax us for every vessel that is sunk by the valor of our Navy. If we set such a precedent there will be no end to bills like these. We might as well give prize money to every sailor who has been engaged in sinking any little vessel on the sea since this war began. It is no argument in favor of this bill to say that this act was a brilliant one; that the Kearsarge had a magnificent combat in the face of France and all Europe. As I said before, I am opposed on principle to going beyond the letter of the law in this regard, and levying an additional tax upon the Treasury, when the sailors never had any right to expect and no right to receive it under the law as it exists.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] whether his principle would prevent his encouraging Commodore Winslow in sinking another pirate on the English coast?

Mr. COX. That is a very ridiculous question for a gentleman to ask who has been attending to this debate. It is one of that sort of questions which a man asks whose mind is floating about the House and never knows what is before the House. The gentleman knew when he asked his very peculiar question that I would be as prompt as he to recognize any services which would sink the Alabama, or any other pirate. I have no sympathy with pirates of any kind. I have always fought pirates. I have been fighting pirates ever since I have been in this House.

Mr. KELLEY. Is the gentleman willing to make any substantial recognition of the merits of sinking a pirate?

Mr. COX. I am willing to make any recognition that the law will give to Captain Winslow, such as giving him special promotion. We passed a resolution of thanks to him and his crew, and also a law in order to give him such promotion, and to show him special favor.

Mr. PIKE. That only applies to the master of the vessel. This bill applies to the sailors.

Mr. COX. We provided by law that Captain Winslow might have special promotion. If I am not right, then the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, [Mr. Rice, of Massachusetts,] can correct me. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] wishes to give Captain Winslow and crew a proper recognition, let him propose a vote of thanks, if it has not been already done. Let the Department give Captain Winslow his rank of Admiral, or any other rank which the favor of the Department, after a vote of thanks here, will give him. Why should we go out of our way now to tax the Treasury for this purpose when we are already paying our money by millions per day in order to put down, in the language of gentlemen on the other side, "this damnable rebellion?"

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will state that the services of Captain Winslow have been recognized by the vote of this House, and he has been promoted. The object of this bill is to provide for the crew, the men who fought the guns and managed the ship, and the committee think they should have an equivalent for what they would have received if they had brought the vessel into port.

Mr. COX. I will ask my friend from Massachusetts this question, whether he is willing hereafter to conform to this precedent which he proposes to set to-night, and in every case where a vessel is sunk by our sailors to give the seamen who sink it prize money?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Why, Mr. Speaker, by no means. I have said nothing at all in the remarks which I have made that justifies the honorable gentleman from Ohio in drawing any such conclusion. I have stated explicitly that the ground on which this appropriation is recommended is, that the act was one of a very extraordinary character, and I will say to my friend now that I for one would be willing to make a similar appropriation to the officers and men of any vessel in the United States Navy who will send a rebel corsair to the bottom of the ocean and stop her preying upon our commerce; and, sir, I think it would be a very economical expenditure of money on the part of this Government to do so.

Mr. COX. I will join with the gentleman in any measure that he may bring forward for the purpose of strengthening our Navy and strengthening the head of the Department by general laws—not by special legislation when a special case comes up. That is not wise or scientific legislation. Let the gentleman bring in his general laws. Let him resurrect this Navy Department; let him give it more vigor, and there will be fewer corsairs on the ocean.

I do not undertake to say that this exploit of the Kearsarge was not a brilliant achievement. It stands out almost alone, and therefore it is preëminent. But, Mr. Speaker, if this precedent be set, where can we stop? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] will some time or other come in, perhaps, with a bill to pay somebody else for sinking some other corsair; and so we may go on till we must pass these bills in regard to every little vessel.

Mr. KELLEY. I will pledge my honor that I will participate in bringing in, or having brought in, a bill of this kind whenever a British ship, manned by British sailors, and armed by British guns, shall be sunk gallantly as the Alabama was sunk.

Mr. COX. Well, now, you see the gentleman takes just the position I said he would. He will bring in a bill every time this thing is done. Why not, then, make general laws for this purpose? These special bills show that your system is defective somewhere, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. Davis] argued the other day. You come here to give special favors at special times for special purposes. Why not rise to a higher grade of legislation, and make general laws which will have the proper effect, and drive these corsairs from the ocean?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I am entirely willing to submit the question to the judgment of the House upon its merits. I therefore call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Will my friend from Massachusetts state how much was raised by subscription in Boston as an acknowledgment of this service?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I think that about twenty thousand dollars was raised; and I have no doubt that that liberal and enlightened community would be very happy indeed to raise money in the same way as often as such examples shall be repeated.

I withdraw the call for the previous question for the present, and yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SPALDING,] a member of the Naval Committee.

Mr. SPALDING. The Naval Committee understand very well that, according to the laws of the land, there is no legal claim on the part of the officers and crew of the American ship, the Kearsarge, for their gallant exploit in sinking the Alabama upon the coast of France. It therefore becomes a matter of discretion with the members of this House whether they will remunerate those gallant sailors for that grand achievement.

Now, I appeal to every patriotic member of this House to answer me and say whether he would erase from the history of our country and its gallant Navy that brilliant action upon the coast of France for a half a million dollars, nay, for millions triplicated and fourfolded. I venture to say that my colleague from Ohio would not have that glorious incident erased from our history for any sum of money which could be computed here to-night. I therefore ask that the House will act as patriotic Americans, and say to these gallant defenders, when they have acquitted themselves well, as our sailors did on the coast of France, upon the deck of the Kearsarge, "If you did not succeed in taking the prize into port you did what was better, and without which the victory would have been incomplete; you sent her to the bottom of the ocean in sight of England and France, and crowned your country with such a triumph as their navies have never had."

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I demand the previous question.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Does this bill make an appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Then it must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It is too late to make that point of order, as the bill has been discussed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope that the previous question will not be seconded, and that we will send the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it can be debated.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 47, noes 49.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WASHBURN, of Illinois, and PENDLETON were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 51.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 67, not voting 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ashley, Baily, Baxter, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Chapin, Dawes, Dixon, Edgerton, Eliot, English, Griswold, Hall, Hooper, Horchick, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knox, Law, Lazear, Loan, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McClurg, William H. Miller, Moorhead, James R. Morris, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Pendleton, Fernan, Perry, Pike, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Seaford, Spaulding, Stevens, Strouse, Sweet, Thayer, Townsend, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, and Yeaman—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Bliss, Boyd, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cox, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Deming, Driggs, Eden, Eldridge, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Grider, Grinnell, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Herlick, Higby, Holman, John H. Hubbard, Huburd, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, McBride, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Morrison, Norton, Pomeroy, Price, Radford, John H. Rice, Ross, Scott, Sloan, Stuart, Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Chilton A. White, Wilson, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Worthington—67.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Beaman, Blair, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cravens, Creswell, Denison, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Farnsworth, Goech, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Knapp, Mallory, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Noble, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Schenck, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Starr, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Tracy, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Joseph W. White, Windom, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—56.

So the main question was not ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to move an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move to add that there shall be paid to Lieutenant Cushing and the officers and men under his command the value of the rebel iron-clad Albemarle, destroyed by them, the value to be estimated by a commission appointed for that purpose. It was an infinitely more brilliant service than the destruction of the Alabama.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to refer the bill and the amendment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and on that demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I suggest that we should include the payment to the soldiers and sailors who captured Fort Fisher, Charleston, and Wilmington.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and amendment were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LAWRENCE PENNINGTON.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to revive, in part, the act approved March 3, 1857, making an appropriation for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1858; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is that bill?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. By the act of February 28, 1855, a Naval Retiring Board was appointed to examine into the efficiency of officers of certain grades for sea and shore duty, and if found unfit for such duty and blameworthy they were to be dropped from the service; if unfit, without any blame, they were to be placed on the reserve list. The act provided that such persons as were dropped and were blameless should receive one year's pay. By the act of 1857 $51,000 was appropriated to pay the year's salaries of such officers as were blameless and dropped from the service. On the 20th of June, 1862, there was unexpended balance of $9,700 of that sum remaining, and it being supposed that all the cases had been presented and settled, that sum of $9,700 was passed over into the general fund of the Treasury.

Since that time the case of Lawrence Pennington, who was entitled to a year's salary of about thirteen hundred dollars, was presented and paid by the Navy Agent in the City of Washington; but the accounting officer of the Treasury disallowed it because the fund had been passed over into the general fund of the Treasury.

The bill which has been reported provides simply for a revival of so much of the original bill as may allow this claim to be paid.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL SOLICITOR AND JUDGE ADVOCATE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill to establish the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The motion to reconsider prevailed.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I moved to reconsider, and the House refused to do it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. The House refused to lay this motion to reconsider on the table. There was no vote taken on the motion to reconsider.

The question being put and no quorum voting,

The SPEAKER ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. EDGERTON and HOLMAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 59, noes 33.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 65, nays 53, not voting 64; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Chanler, Cox, Driggs, Edgerton, Eliot, English, Farnsworth, Frank, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McClurg, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Perry, Pike, Price, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scott, Spalding, John B. Steele, Strouse, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Wilder, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—65.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Boyd, Brooks, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Deming, Dixon, Eden, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holtman, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Ingelsoll, Kalffleisch, Kernan, King, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Middleton, William H. Miller, Morrison, Pomeroy, Pruyn, John H. Rice, Ross, Scofield, Sloan, William G. Steele, Sweet, Thomas, Tracy, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Chilton A. White, Wilson, Windom, and Winfield—53.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Bliss, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cole, Cravens, Creswell, Dawes, Denison, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Garfield, Goech, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Law, Mallory, Marey, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, James R. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, Schenck, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Starr, Stevens, Stiles, Stuart, Townsend, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Joseph W. White, Williams, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—64.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ROBERT WATSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. MOORHEAD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of Robert, John & James Watson, of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time by its title.

The bill was read in extenso.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like some explanation of this bill.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The firm of Robert, John & James Watson, of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, were the owners of a steam tug originally named R. & J. Watson. They were engaged in the coal business at Pittsburg, and carrying coal to New Orleans. One of the brothers, a member of the firm, remained in New Orleans and sold the coal. Two other brothers, members of the firm, are engaged in mining the coal and transporting it to New Orleans. They built this boat at Pittsburg. It was the first iron propeller that was built there, and was first taken to New Orleans in 1859.

After this war broke out, namely, on the 28th of January, 1862, this boat was seized by the confederate forces by a peremptory order from the confederate general. It was afterward in the confederate service at Memphis when Memphis was captured, and there it was retaken by our forces and fell into our hands. Immediately after that one of the firm came on here and made an application to the Secretary of War for the restoration of the boat. The Secretary gave him assurances that the boat should be restored, but told him that it was useless for him to remain here longer; and accordingly he went home. About that time the act passed by Congress transferring the whole control of the boats on the Mississippi and on the western waters generally from the Army Department to the Navy went into operation. This boat was thus transferred and taken from under the control of the War Department. The case was afterward taken before a prize court in Springfield, Illinois, and without notice to the owners it was adjudicated and the boat was ordered to be sold. It was sold to the United States for the sum of $8,000, one half of that amount going to the captors. That boat has been in the service of the Government for more than two years. In a memorial that this firm presented they asked that the boat be restored, and they also asked compensation for the time during which the Government had the use of it.

The Committee on Naval Affairs have instructed me to report this bill providing for the restoration of the boat, and providing further, that the owners in accepting the boat shall be debarred from any further claim against the Government.

I hope, therefore, that there will be no dissenting voice, but that the boat will be restored to these men.

Mr. SPALDING. The gentleman says he was authorized by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report this bill. As a member of that Committee I do not assent to this bill; on the contrary I think it ought not to pass.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I will say that at the meeting of the committee at which I was authorized to report this bill the gentleman from Ohio for some reason or other did not happen to be present.

Mr. SPALDING. No, sir; I was present on sundry occasions when this bill was considered and I objected to it every time.

Mr. MOORHEAD. The committee authorized me to report the bill, and I have done so. I have endeavored to state the case to the House, and I think it is so plain and clear that although the gentleman from Ohio may not be able to see it, this House will see that this boat ought to be restored to these men.

Mr. KERNAN. As I understand this vessel went to New Orleans in 1859.

Mr. MOORHEAD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KERNAN. One of these men was engaged in business in that city; and as I understand it the vessel remained there until she passed into the hands of the rebels in 1862. We subsequently captured her from the rebels and she was regularly condemned by a prize court.

Now, it seems to me to be a pretty suspicious case that a vessel, being in the possession of the owner living at New Orleans, goes into the rebel service. We know that they used her against us as an armed vessel, and that we captured her. And now parties living at Pittsburg who are mining coal, claim some interest in the vessel and call on us to pay for it. I think their claim is against the rebel government, and not against us. I think that if we go behind the decision of prize courts, and compensate parties who claim that they owned vessels before the rebels took possession of them and used them against us, in two or three years we shall find such claims very large, and shall be likely to pay for a good deal of property we ought not to pay for.

I am glad that there is one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs who dissented from this report, and I do not think, unless some further explanation should be made, there will be a very unanimous vote in the House in favor of this measure.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I regret very much that I was not able to make the House, and especially the very acute gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] understand the statement I made. I thought I had shown that at the time this boat was at New Orleans this firm was engaged in mining coal in the county of Alleghany, Pennsylvania, in which I reside, and disposing of it at New Orleans. They sold the coal at their yard there, and had barges there all the time, and this tow-boat was built for the purpose of towing the barges out to the vessels to which they were to deliver the coal, and to different places and points about or near the city. It was the property of loyal men, residents of my district.

Now, with regard to the capture of the boat being a suspicious circumstance, I have testimony here to show how that was. I did not want to bore the House with it; but if gentlemen persist in objections it will be necessary for me to have it read. I have the testimony here as to the manner in which the boat was seized by the order of the confederate government. Knowing the loyalty of this man Robert Watson, the brother residing there, they preferred to take his property rather than that of a disloyal man. Therefore his boat was taken and put into the confederate service, and changed from a harmless coal-boat tug into a gunboat, and its cannon turned on its own friends. It was then called the Little Rebel. Now, I ask that this boat be restored to its proper owners and that its name be changed from the Little Rebel to what it was before. Shall I have all this testimony read to the House? It is ample and satisfactory, and covers the whole case. I have no doubt of the loyalty of these gentlemen. They are just as loyal as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] or any man on that side of the House, or this side either. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I will hear it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are passing on a judicial decision. According to the gentleman's statement and according to his bill, this Little Rebel was captured and brought to Cairo and was there condemned as a prize by the district court of the United States for the southern district of Illinois, and now we are asked to declare that she was unjustly condemned. I do not think that this House is prepared to pass upon such a judicial decision.

Mr. WILSON. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the suggestion which the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes in regard to the loyalty of the owners of the vessel has nothing whatever to do with this case. It is not on the status of the person owning this species of property that the court passes, but upon the fact whether the property itself is criminal. If the property is criminal, it matters not how loyal the owner of the property may be.

Mr. MOORHEAD. How can the property be criminal?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. We are passing here upon a decision of the court without knowing the reasons upon which the decision was founded or anything about the facts.

Mr. KERNAN. On ex parte evidence.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, on ex parte evidence.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I yield to my friend from Alleghany, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who is a little more of a lawyer than I am, and who will explain these proceedings in rem that my legal friends speak of. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. I desire to say one word on this question. My colleague from Pittsburg [Mr. MOORHEAD] has overlooked, it seems to me, one very material point in his otherwise very clear and perspicuous and satisfactory statement of the facts of the case, and that is that the condemnation in question took place on the false suggestion that the boat was used for the purposes of the rebel government with the privy and consent of the owners. I think my colleague did not state that fact. How the boat is to be considered criminal is a question which my learned friend from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] will be perhaps prepared to answer. I should like to ask him, as well as the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN,] whether by virtue of the law of postliminy, if this property was taken from a loyal owner and recaptured by our own Government, the original possessors are entitled to have it restored to them.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire to ask my friend, who is a good lawyer and who stands by the law, whether he thinks that this is the proper forum to review and try questions as to property where it has been condemned by a regular court at Cairo where everybody could be heard who chose to intervene.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do undertake to say that this is the only court of appeal in a case of this sort. It is not regularly a court, but it can and does exercise an equitable jurisdiction in cases of this sort, and ought to exercise it.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. SLOAN. I understand the gentleman to say that it was a controlling suggestion with the court that condemned this vessel that she was used by the rebels with the privy of the owners. What evidence has the gentleman that this was a controlling circumstance or suggestion that induced the district court to condemn this vessel?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nothing less than the record. That was a material averment, and will be found there.

Mr. SLOAN. Has the gentleman read the opinion of the court?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have read the record of the case. The opinion of the court, whatever it may be, is not at all a part of the record. I have never seen it so.

Mr. GANSON. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I must resume the floor, and insist on the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will my colleague yield further?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I cannot, as the case is clear, and the House is anxious to have a vote upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will my colleague allow me to answer a question put to me by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. KERNAN?]

Mr. MOORHEAD. I cannot now. I have called the previous question. We have had the rem of this thing, and the postliminy of the case. [Laughter.] I now desire to explain the common sense and equity of the case.

Mr. KERNAN. Was the value of this vessel paid to the captors?

Mr. MOORHEAD. The vessel was sold for $8,000, and the half was paid to the captors.

Mr. KERNAN. Then we are called upon to pay twice for this vessel.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I will explain that if gentlemen will give me a little time. This boat was sold for $8,000, and the half of that was paid to the captors. The boat was in the rebel service but for a few months; since July, 1862, it has been in the service of this Government. The owners of the boat claim about three thousand dollars per month, which would be a proper charter for that boat, but which would amount to more than the whole value of the boat.

Mr. GANSON. How did the boat get into the possession of the Government when it was sold?

Mr. MOORHEAD. It was seized at Memphis and put into the Government service, and used a long time before the proceedings in Illinois.

Mr. GANSON. When was the proceeding had?

Mr. MOORHEAD. My legal friend from the Alleghany district can explain that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. About the month of September, 1862.

Mr. GANSON. How could the boat have been in the service of the United States for three years if she was seized in 1862?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I said two years. It is still in the service of the Government. The boat was bought by the Government and has been in the Government service ever since it was taken in Memphis in July, 1862.

Mr. WILSON. How could the boat have been two years in the service of the Government before the condemnation and sale, when it was captured at the time we took Memphis?

Mr. MOORHEAD. I did not say that at all. I say that the boat legally and justly and equitably belongs to this firm of R. & J. Watson, ever since it was taken from the rebels, and that this proceeding was, as the bill states, unjust—illegal, perhaps; I do not say about that. It was unjust, at any rate, and therefore I call the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I see that this bill is clogging the business of the Naval Committee. I therefore move to lay this bill on the table.

Upon the motion to lay on the table the House divided, and there were—ayes 49, noes 49.

The SPEAKER voted in the negative.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, called for the yeas and nays upon the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 55, nays 55, not voting 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Allison, Ames, John D. Baldwin, Boyd, Brandegee, Chandler, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Denning, Dixon, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ganson, Herrick, Holman, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Knox, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Marcy, McClurg, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Rice, Robinson, Rogers, Schenck, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Starr, Stiles, Stuart, Thomas, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—72.

The SPEAKER voted in the negative.

So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were, on a division—ayes 51, noes 31; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER ordered tellers, and appointed Mr. MOORHEAD, and Mr. STEELE of New Jersey.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 55, noes 41.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 45, nays 59, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bailly, Blow, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Dawson, Driggs, Dumont, Eden, Edgerton, Frank, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hotchkiss, Ingersoll, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, King, Law, Loan, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, Moorhead, James R. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Smith, Starr, Stiles, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Worthington—78.

So the bill was rejected.

During the roll-roll, Mr. WINDOM stated that his colleague, Mr. DONNELLY, was confined to his room by sickness.

The result was announced as above stated. Mr. KERNAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY DEPARTMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. KELLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back, with an amendment, bill S. No. 382, entitled "An act to provide for the better organization of the pay department of the Navy."

The bill was read.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Naval Affairs was to add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to appoint acting past assistant paymasters and acting past assistant surgeons to serve during the present war, and to have the same pay as officers of like rank in the Navy.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that this power will not be given to the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. KELLEY. The Secretary of the Navy has usually made these subordinate appointments. They are mere acting appointments. The appointees lose their offices when the vessel goes out of commission, unless they be reappointed. They are not regular officers of the Navy. I call the previous question.

Mr. PIKE. I hope that the gentleman will permit me to move an amendment to the first section of the bill. The bill provides for one hundred paymasters, fifty passed assistant paymasters, and fifty assistant paymasters. I move to reduce the number of paymasters to eighty, and the others to forty.

Mr. KELLEY. I yield to the amendment, but I hope that it will not pass.

Mr. PIKE. The present number of paymasters in the Navy is sixty-four, assistant paymasters thirty-six, making one hundred paymasters and assistant paymasters in the regular Navy. This doubles the number. They wish for an increase of force and additional rank between the assistant paymasters and regular paymasters, to which I have no objection. But I think that the increase is too large, and that it should be fifty instead of one hundred.

It is proposed by the Navy Department, and I have no doubt will meet with the concurrence of the House, that hereafter the payments now made on shore by Navy agents and other disbursing agents of that character shall be made by the regular officer attached to the naval station or the navy-yard; and in consequence they will need this increased force.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Why this addition if the present officers can do it? Why is it necessary to make this new batch of officers?

Mr. PIKE. It has been found latterly that the Navy agents in the large ports, for some reason or other, have fallen into difficulties, and that the bonds which they are required to give to restrict them within the bounds of propriety are not sufficient. It has been found that officers who have a life position and interest which depends upon the proper discharge of their duties are more likely to honestly and properly disburse moneys than mere temporary officers. It has been found in the Army that life offices are better than a bond for the protection of the interests of the Government.

For that reason the increase of force is very well; but, as I have said, I do not concur in the Senate bill, which doubles the force. I propose to add fifty per cent. to the present force, and I think that is enough.

The whole number of paymasters in the Navy is five hundred, about equal to the number of surgeons. This will provide one hundred for the regular Navy and three hundred for the volunteer force, and I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman's amendment is an unwise one. The pay department of the Navy was regulated to meet the wants of the Department before the breaking out of the rebellion, when it consisted at one time of only sixty-five vessels. We have now over six hundred vessels in commission, and probably it will be a long time before we will have less than one hundred and fifty. The number of paymasters, as stated by my colleague, is sixty-four, and the number of assistant paymasters thirty-six. There are something like two hundred acting paymasters in the service, less than two hundred, and on the reduction of our service a large number of acting paymasters will have to be retained. We have sixteen paymasters now on shore at different depots of supply. Paymasters in the Navy perform other duties than paymasters in the Army. They not only pay the officers and men, but they take charge of the clothing and small-stores. One is required, therefore, for each vessel.

The Navy Department is carrying the proposition into effect to substitute a paymaster at each of the stations at which a Navy agent has heretofore existed. If that be done I am quite sure that enough will be saved at each station to pay the increase of expenditure called for by this bill. With sixteen stationed at depots of supplies, with others detailed for the purpose I have indicated, with "relays," as it was called in the Senate, on home duty to relieve members of the corps, one year out of four on home duty being the practice, with all that, you will find that two hundred will be inadequate to the service. I think that the reduction to eighty proposed by the gentleman from Maine would be an unwise one.

Now there are four hundred gentlemen engaged as acting assistant paymasters; and it is proposed to give the Government the opportunity of selecting from among those two hundred who have shown themselves most competent and faithful. They have a well-trained and experienced corps from which to select. The number two hundred will not be too large. The amendment suggested proposes to give to those gentlemen who have served as acting assistants a chance for a slight promotion, so that men who have served faithfully a series of years in an acting position, may pass to the position of acting assistant paymasters. It is to encourage fidelity in that branch of the service. I hope that the bill will pass, and that the gentleman from Maine will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. From the statement of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] I infer that the paymasters contemplated by this bill are intended to perform the duty, or a portion of the duty, of Navy agents. Does the bill propose to abolish the office of Navy agent?

Mr. PIKE. No.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. If not we are doubling officers for the same duty.

Mr. KELLEY. In reply to the gentleman from Maryland, I will say that where paymasters have been detailed to perform the duty of Navy agent, there the Navy agent has been removed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It rests with the Government to appoint both by law.

Mr. KELLEY. The Government cannot abolish the office of Navy agent. That is for Congress to do. I understand that the head of the Navy Department would approve of a law abolishing the office of Navy agent.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then as the bill stands I cannot support it, as it seems merely to be doubling officers. I have not had time to study the merits of the bill, but it seems to me that an essential part of it should be that the Navy agent should be abolished if the duties are to be performed by the new paymasters.

Mr. PIKE. My motion was to diminish the number of officers that were authorized by the Senate. I said for one that I was willing to consent to an increase, and among other reasons was this, that three or four probably may be necessary at the navy-yards. The gentleman is aware that at present paymasters are discharging the duties of Navy agents at these yards.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. That would seem to show that there are enough to discharge the duties.

Mr. PIKE. In furtherance of my idea that there should be a reduction, I will call the attention of the House to the fact that these officers are officers in the regular Navy, and that this increase of numbers is an increase of light officers.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. In addition to the permanent officers of the Navy.

Mr. KELLEY. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KELLEY and HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 15.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the amendment reported from the committee was adopted.

The amendment offered by Mr. PIKE was then agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the passage of the bill,

Mr. PIKE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put, and there were—yeas 52, nays 52, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Blow, Boyd, Broomall, Chandler, Freeman Clarke, Cox, Dixon, Edgerton, Eliot, English, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Asahel W. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Law, Littlejohn, Loan, Marcy, Marvin, McAllister, McClurg, Leonard Myers, Charles O'Neill, Perham, Perry, Pike, Radford, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Smithers, Spalding, John B. Steele, Sweat, Thayer, Van Valkenburgh, Ward, Whaley, Wilder, Windom, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—52.

NAYS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ames, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Brandegee, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Driggs, Eden, Farnsworth, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Hall, Herrick, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kalbfleisch, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Knox, Long, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Norton, Odell, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Ross, Scott, William G. Steele, Stuart, Townsend, Tracy, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Wilson, and Winfield—52.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Ancona, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Coffroth, Cravens, Creswell, Dawson, Denison, Donnelly, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Garfield, Gooch, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Higley, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, William Johnson, Julian, Francis W. Kellogg, Lazear, LeBlond, Longyear, Mallory, McBride, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Moorhead, Morrill, Morrison, Amos Myers, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Price, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, Smith, Starr, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Thomas, Upson, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Joseph W. White, Williams, and Benjamin Wood—78.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative, and the bill is passed.

During the call,

Mr. HOLMAN stated that Mr. ASHLEY and Mr. ANCONA had paired off.

Mr. RANDALL, of Kentucky, stated that Mr. CLAY had left the Hall on account of sickness.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill has been passed. I voted through a misconception.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

PAUL S. FORBES.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance Paul S. Forbes $250,000 additional out of the sum to be paid him under his contract for building a steam screw sloop-of-war; which was read a first and second time.

The question being on its engrossment and third reading,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 33, noes 60.

Mr. PIKE. I will make a brief statement in reference to this resolution. Paul S. Forbes, of New York, some eighteen months ago, with an honest desire to produce a vessel superior to any vessel in any navy of the world, and, as I believe, for no other purpose, having no expectation of making a dollar out of the contract, entered into a contract with the Navy Department to produce a vessel to be called the Idaho, of two thousand five hundred tons burden, for the sum of $600,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order.

This bill, if I am rightly informed, was not referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. PIKE. This is a joint resolution introduced by the Committee on Naval Affairs. It was referred to that committee by the House, and is now reported.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that settles the question.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is not the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. If a petition on this subject was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, that gives the committee jurisdiction.

Mr. HOLMAN. Has this bill been reported to the House?

The SPEAKER. It is an original bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. It has not been read to the House.

The SPEAKER. It has been read the first and second time, and the question is now on its third reading.

Mr. PIKE. I am almost through with my statement. This gentleman, for the sum of $600,000, proposed to produce a vessel of some two thousand five hundred tons burden, to be called the Idaho, guarantying that, loaded with her armor, she would for twenty-four consecutive hours make sixteen knots an hour in sea-way, something never done before, and which, in my judgment, cannot be done now. This vessel now lies at the wharf in New York having her engines on board. She is now progressing to completion. Improvements of the most valuable character have already been made in her, and whether she actually fulfills the conditions of her contract or not, I have no doubt she will be a very superior and valuable vessel. This gentleman has received on his contract some $300,000. He is now in advance of that sum $400,000, having already expended $700,000 on his contract for $600,000. He will be obliged to expend $200,000 more before he gets the vessel ready for her trial trip. All that he now asks of Congress is to give him $250,000 on his contract out of the $600,000. Not one single dollar of extra allowance is asked for in the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. If the gentleman from Maine will provide in this resolution that this contractor shall not come to Congress for additional pay I will vote for it.

Mr. PIKE. I am not authorized to do it, nor will I prejudge his case. I move the previous question on the engrossing and third reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist on the joint resolution being reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. It will be now read.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to pay to Paul S. Forbes, of the city of New York, the sum of $250,000 in addition to the sums heretofore paid, to apply on his contract of the date of May 22, 1863, for building a steam screw sloop-of-war, the same being an advance payment on the contract to aid in the completion of the said sloop-of-war; provided that no part of said sum shall be paid without the assent in writing of the sureties of said Paul S. Forbes; and provided further that nothing in the resolution contained shall be so construed as in any manner to affect or vary said contract, except as to the time of making said payment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe that this joint resolution appropriates $250,000. It should therefore be first considered in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to a point of order?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do.

The SPEAKER. This joint resolution is not an appropriation bill. It would be entirely insufficient of itself to take any money out of the Treasury. It authorizes $250,000 to be paid out of money which must be appropriated by some other bill. It is not, therefore, an appropriation bill. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. PIKE. I now insist on the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered; which was on ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers on the engrossment and third reading.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN and PIKE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 20.

So the joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being on its passage, there were, on a division—ayes 71, noes 22.

So the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at eleven p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the yeas and nays, and for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

GUNBOAT CONTRACTORS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The House is in so amiable a disposition that I would like to introduce a joint resolution, which I am instructed to report by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and which I know will commend itself to the favorable consideration of the House.

The joint resolution for the relief of Woodruff & Beach and others was read. It refers to the Secretary of the Navy the petitions and memorials of Woodruff & Beach and others, and of the contractors for the seven iron vessels, and their machinery, known as double-enders, and the contractors for the seventeen vessels known as wooden double-enders, and the contractors for engines, machinery, &c., claiming relief for additional cost and expense beyond the contract price for the construction of naval vessels and machinery, with authority to grant such relief, if any, as shall appear to be just and equitable on examination of their respective claims. The Secretary of the Navy, if he shall deem it necessary for the purposes of such examination, may appoint a board to make the same under his direction; and on the report in writing of such board, if he is of the opinion that the report is just and proper, he shall have authority to pay the said several claimants or either of them the amount awarded in such report to such claimants, out of any money in the Treasury appropriated for the construction, purchase, completion, or repair of vessels for the Navy, or steam machinery, provided that no person whose contract shall not be fulfilled to the satisfaction of the Navy Department shall be entitled to relief under this resolution; and provided further that the allowance shall in no case exceed twenty per cent. on the contract price, except in the case of the Camanche, in which case the allowance shall not exceed thirty per cent., and except also in the case of the Dunderberg, in which case the contractor shall be allowed, as the work progresses, for the cost of the additional size of the vessel and engines, in addition to the per cent. that may be allowed him for losses, not exceeding twenty per cent.; and provided further that the allowance shall not in any case exceed the actual and necessary cost to the contractor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that this joint resolution is now read for the first time, and, by the rules of the House, if objection be made, it cannot be read a second time on this day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have a right to make the motion that the joint resolution be rejected.

The SPEAKER. That motion is never made in the House. The rule states that if any member objects to the second reading of a bill, the question shall be put by the Chair, "Shall it be rejected?"

Mr. HOLMAN. I raise the point that the joint resolution cannot be read the second time this day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules that point.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I make my objection to the second reading.

The SPEAKER. The rule is this: the first reading of the bill is for information; and if opposition is made to it, the question then is, "Shall this bill be rejected?" And this question is debatable; but if no opposition is made, or if the question to reject be negatived, the bill shall go to its second reading without objection.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I made my objection.

The SPEAKER. Then the question is, "Shall the bill be rejected?" which is debatable, and the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to make a proposition to the House, as it is evident that this bill will involve discussion, and it may be, some considerable amount of feeling, judging from what has been exhibited already, and from the unusual course taken in proposing to reject the bill at its first reading. I propose to gentlemen that if an adjournment now will leave this matter pending as unfinished business, and will leave me entitled to the floor to explain the bill, I will vacate the floor for the purpose of having any gentleman move an adjournment. If not, I propose to take my hour now.

Several MEMBERS. Go on now.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I wish to know whether the Mr. Paul S. Forbes named in this joint resolution is the same party to be benefited by the resolution which we have just passed, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance $250,000 to him?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He is the identical individual.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. For the same vessel?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. For the same identical vessel; and I think I can show to the satisfaction of the House that if this joint resolution is passed there is no danger that Mr. Forbes will be paid twice.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Is not this an appropriation bill?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is not. The money, if any is to be paid, is to be paid out of moneys already appropriated for these vessels. This joint resolution provides for the creation of a board.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, I would ask for what purpose this is appropriated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state that the rule is uniform, that an appropriation bill must be a bill which of itself takes the money out of the Treasury by its own operation. It must read "out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated." For instance, pension bills virtually appropriate money out of the Treasury, but they are not appropriation bills; the money is appropriated by a general bill.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It proposes to divert money appropriated for one purpose to another.

The SPEAKER. That can be done without its being an appropriation bill.

Mr. PIKE. More than that: it provides for the payment of $4,000,000 without any further action of either branch of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. PIKE,] point out the part of the bill which makes it an appropriation bill, according to the rules of this House?

Mr. PIKE. I would call attention to these words:

If he is of opinion that the report is just and proper, the Secretary of the Navy shall be authorized to pay the money to said claimants.

The SPEAKER. To be paid out of what money?

Mr. PIKE continued to read:

Out of any moneys in the Treasury appropriated to the construction, completion, or repair of vessels for the Navy, or for steam machinery.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, and decides that this is not an appropriation bill according to the usage and rules of this House.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, if these parliamentary gentlemen have exhausted the resources of the Manual in the attempt to get me off the floor, I will now attempt to explain the merits of the measure which I have reported under the instructions of my committee.

This is a bill for the relief of certain contractors.

Mr. MORRIS, of New York. I would ask the gentleman how long he proposes to speak.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As the opponents of the bill evidently intend to interrupt me with frivolous questions until my time runs out, I will decline to yield except it be for a point of order. I have the floor, and having had some practice elsewhere, I am not to be driven from it, unless the House will consent to adjourn, so as to leave this question to come up in the morning, in which case I will cheerfully give way for a motion for adjournment, it being now near midnight.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no!

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, this joint resolution provides for the relief of certain contractors, and it may—though it does not necessarily—involve a pretty large appropriation from the Treasury. I think I know how odious the very name of a contractor is in the ears of this House and of the country; scarcely less so, I imagine, than the name publican was to the ears of the descendants of Moses.

These two things—the amount involved and the parties to be relieved—have drawn down upon the bill the hot wrath of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN:] for he has already indicated, with more than his usual vehemence, and less than his usual judgment, that he will pour out the vials of his indignant eloquence upon the bill, the parties to be relieved by it, the committee who have reported it, and, by a sort of prophetic damnation, all who are about to vote for it.

I propose, since the House has now settled into so excellent a good temper, after the storm of the earlier part of the evening, to speak to the merits of the measure; and leaving vehemence and vituperation to those who have a taste for that style of argument, I will appeal to the calm judgment of the House, and that sober sense of equity that is never appealed to in vain, to sustain the action of the committee.

And in the first place, Mr. Speaker, who are the parties to be relieved here? Who are these odious contractors, these money-changers whom the gentleman from Illinois seeks to lash from this temple of the Capitol with his whip of scorpions? They are the steam-engine and ship-builders of the United States—a class of men whom I undertake to say, for public services and for private worth, are an honor to the American name wherever the English language is spoken.

I confess myself, Mr. Speaker, to a considerable astonishment at the impression made on my mind by the appearance of these men before the committee of which I am a member. I knew them to be, of course, men of intelligence in the branch of mechanic art to which their time and attention had been devoted. But I was not prepared to find, as I did find, that these engine and ship-builders, in general intelligence and education, in probity of character and uncalculating patriotism, were the equals of any gentleman on this floor, not to make a more invidious comparison. Among them—and I instance their names as types of their class and not as select exceptions—were such men as George Quintard, and Secor & Co., of the great engine-building firms of New York city, names known and honored as representatives of American skill wherever steam has driven keel over the navigable waters of the globe. Paul S. Forbes, whose princely patriotism offered to build for your Government the fastest steamer in the world at cost, without a dollar for his time and services, was another. William H. Webb is one of them, the great American ship-builder, whose public services would have been honored with knighthood under any other form of government than ours. And with them is James B. Eades of St. Louis, a name that will yet come to be written on the same page in future history as that of Watt or Fulton, who, amid the very din and hurly-burly of war, with rebel raids at the very doors of his foundry, while he was overwhelmed, or rather while any other man than he would have been overwhelmed with the giant task of constructing your Mississippi squadron, still found time to give to his country two inventions which will make his name immortal—one an application of steam to the handling of heavy ordnance, by which a fifteen-inch gun that weighs twenty tons—larger and heavier than those huge granite shafts which stand in solemn grandeur before the portals of your Treasury—can be manipulated in action by one man with the ease with which a boy fires his pocket pistol; the other, an invention which in the judgment of our wisest military engineers is soon to revolutionize the whole art of fortification defense throughout the world. These are some of the men—types merely—of the class of American mechanics which this bill proposes to relieve from irredeemable bankruptcy and ruin.

Mr. Speaker, it was to these, and such as these, that your Secretary of the Navy went in person, in that dark hour of our country's faith; when an iron navy was to be improvised out of nothing; when a navy, the ordinary work of years, was to be launched upon the instant to meet the exacting demands of a blockade of more than three thousand miles of coast line; and more than all, to draw off the lurid lightning of that portentous war-cloud which threatened to burst from abroad. The fabled miracle of mythology was to be repeated here, that at the instantaneous touch of American genius Pallas was once more to spring full armed from the brain of Jove. And it was done, sir. The appeal was not made to American mechanics in vain. They were not here, these ship and engine-builders, prowling around the Departments to snap at the first bone thrown from the windows of patronage. They did not belong to this hungry lobby, the nuisance of legislation, that vermin swarm who buzz, and hum, and crawl along the tessellated pavements amid these marble corridors. They were at their ship-yards and in their machine-shops, and at the appeal of your Secretary they placed shop and yard at his disposal. Contracts were entered into to construct a Navy which is yet to make you the masters of the ocean. The price was restricted to the lowest possible estimate of cost, based upon the then existing state of the market. It was pinched down to the last farthing of the value of labor and material then. And then a greenback was worth a gold dollar. Thus, and upon such a basis, were these contracts entered into. And it may give the House some idea of the prudent precaution of the Secretary of the Navy when I state that many of these contracts were for the delivery of a first-class ship-of-war, of novel plan, never before constructed, fully equipped, with her engines on board, at a price less than the actual cost of the engines alone to the contractors, as it has resulted. And the House can easily see that they were not in the nature of ordinary contracts, and ought not to be measured by ordinary formulas. They were for building ships. They were not for furnishing horses, or clothing, or any of those articles which have a standard price in the market, fluctuating, to be sure, but fluctuating between certain ranges easily calculated, and where the contractor can go into the market and fill his entire contract in thirty days at the furthest. They were for building ships, the work of months, ordinarily of years, and involving that vast problem of the prices of labor, provisions, insurance, freights, interest, iron, wood, coal, exchanges, and the thousand and one elements of naval architecture.

But I am anticipating. These contracts were made upon the terms and under the circumstances which I have already referred to. Then came the dark days. Then came a state of facts for which the file furnished no precedent; for which the wit of no man could have estimated. The wisdom of prophecy alone could have foreseen and provided against it. You were defeated upon land and sea. The gulf of dissolution yawned beneath us. It seemed as though our cause was to go down. The nation's head was sick and the nation's heart was faint. You had already been chased in panic from the stricken field of Bull Run. You had changed your leader only to leave thousands of nameless graves in the oozy swamps of the Chickahominy. Another leader had dashed in vain your gallant columns against the bristling heights of Fredericksburg. Under a fourth you were checked at Chancellorsville. Meanwhile, upon the sea as well as upon the land, you were discomfited. Your flag was hunted over every ocean by rebel corsairs. And when you had tracked the pirate by the light of your burning commerce the convenient neutrality of your British ally afforded him protection and impunity. The result was that both your exports and your imports were driven to foreign bottoms, and the great carrying trade of the second naval Power in the world was ended.

"Tante molis erat Romanam condere gentem."

Of course your credit went down under such a series of disasters. And as it went down day by day, gold, that standard of values and exchanges, rose in proportion. You had to expand your currency to fill up the mighty void. And the more you expanded the more you had to expand, for the law is inexorable which aggravates such a disease by the application of such a remedy. When the great balloon arose freighted with panic and expansion it took up with it all values. Food and clothing, labor and material, the luxuries and the necessities of life, all ascended with it. No man could have foreseen the extent or rapidity of this ascent when these contracts were made, and if he had estimated for it in these contracts he would have been considered either an idiot or an extortioner.

This is one argument for relief.

Added to this was the tariff. You found yourselves without finances. The Army must be fed and clothed. Steam must be kept up in the boilers of your war ships. But where were the ways and means to come from? You must resort to import duties, and you were compelled to lay them up to the very verge of prohibition. You doubled, in some cases quadrupled, your duties, and thus added to the cost of iron, copper, and all metals, duck, hemp, naval stores, and all that large class of imported articles which are the essentials in naval construction. Then came the draft. Volunteer enlistments flagged. That grand, wild uprising of the nation at the echoes of the first gun upon Sumter—comparable to nothing in all history save the first crusade, when all Europe rushed to arms for the recovery of the Holy Sepulcher—had settled into the calm conviction that the war was to be long and bloody instead of "short, sharp, and decisive." You were forced to a conscription; and the first revolutions of the fated wheel drew forth—not that scurvy scum which, under the stimulus of enormous bounties and swindling substitute brokers is now gathered from the stew of your cities and the almshouses of Europe—but the bone and sinew of the land; the men of the forge and the anvil; the men of the ax and the hammer. Skilled labor became almost unattainable, and then only at the most enormous prices. Right there, just at the time when this scarcity existed, and when these men were compelled through the shortness of hands to run their establishments night and day, and upon Sundays, at double the wages for this extra work, you aggravated the difficulty by calling a large portion of this class of labor for your own employment in your own yards. I do not complain of it; they do not complain of it. You needed them, and you took them. But it raised the price of this class of labor one hundred per cent., and this added the last straw to the load which even then had become too heavy to be borne without ruin and bankruptcy.

The reasons I have thus hurriedly alluded to would seem sufficient to lay an equitable foundation for relief.

But another exists more controlling than either, indeed than all of them put together, which seems to my mind to put their claim beyond all question; and that is, that from time to time the Department ordered to be made repeated, substantial, almost fundamental alterations in the work contracted for.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman from Connecticut yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have already indicated my willingness to have the question taken without debate. I am willing also to yield the floor for any motion to adjourn, provided this question, which now has priority, shall go over to be disposed of to-morrow. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Twenty millions cannot be voted in this House without discussion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am ready for discussion, then, to the end of the chapter. Mr. Speaker, a magnificent talisman that of the gentleman from Illinois, that can convert four millions into twenty. Aladdin's lamp grows dim in the comparison.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow us to adjourn?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, if I yield for the motion to adjourn will I thereby lose my right to the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will not; he will be entitled to the floor whenever this business comes up again.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. When will that be?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot state, as it is liable to be put aside by privileged questions, motions to suspend the rules, privileged motions, &c.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. As the Committee on Naval Affairs have intrusted the charge of this bill to me, and as, if it now loses its priority, it is obvious it cannot come up again this session, I must go on to the end of the chapter.

Mr. Speaker, I had at the moment of interruption arrived at the very pith and marrow of this case; that is, the changes ordered by the Department. It will be remembered by the House that these contracts were for iron vessels of a class and type hitherto unknown in naval architecture. That "queer looking cheese-box on a raft" which steamed into Hampton Roads in the gray dawn of that memorable morning after an entire fleet of wooden ships had been sunk or driven ashore by a single rebel iron-clad, heralded the advent of a new epoch in naval warfare. Her advent marked a new era in ship-building, as distinctive from its predecessor as in the pre-Adamic history the era of the mammalia is different from the era of the trilobite. When the sun went down on that day's conflict, the age of wooden vessels for war purposes had passed into history. The London Times, at the news of that day's work, said that the "boasted fleet of England now consists of just four ships." The germs of the trilobites, henceforth are laid up in ordinary, beneath the "Old Red Sandstone." But the "little Monitor," though an original creation of the genius of John Ericsson, was still not a perfect one. The first creations of genius are rarely perfect. It is the law of great ideas that they come forth rough hewn; and the Monitor was a great idea. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] said the other day in debate (quoting Carlyle) that "a ship-of-war was a great fact." The Monitor was more. She was a great idea. But she had many imperfections, and the test of battle showed them. Her voyage around to the Roads, what time she was led by the hand of Providence to our deliverance, had also developed many inconveniences and oversights in her construction.

The earlier class of vessels of that type, under the test of ocean steaming and of battle, all developed objections. These were to be remedied; and after these contracts were given out, and when the work was partially completed, the alterations called for by time and experience were ordered; and they were very substantial alterations, involving very great expense, and, what was worse, delay to these contractors. I have not time now to specify these alterations in detail. They are all set forth with particularity in the report of the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs, which report the House committee has adopted. There is no dispute about these facts, for the very order of the Department itself detailing the alterations is printed with the report. They were very many; they were ordered at different times, and they involved a very great delay in the completion of these contracts. And, Mr. Speaker, delay then was loss; time was money then, if ever.

Owing to the peculiar causes I have before alluded to, and within the recent recollection of all of us, gold was going up day by day, almost hour by hour, as the mercury mounts the tube when exposed to the blaze of a fire. Of course the market for materials hung trembling upon the gold room, and the bulls in coin at their parlor in the Fifth avenue affected by their operations the price of ship materials as well as the price of bullion. Two or three months' delay—in a contract for a $700,000 steamer—occasioned by the Government, at a time when gold rose one per cent. a day, and sometimes more, was the last straw which broke down these contractors. The result is to some of them relief or bankruptcy. That is the whole question, just as it stands now before you. They have worked calmly on until now, patiently fulfilling their contracts, both in spirit and letter, until the earnings of a lifetime have been swamped in the operation.

And now, sir, here they are, and what do they ask? Not to plunder your Treasury, not for a dollar of profit on their work, not, as some gentlemen seem to think, to obtain additional compensation for services rendered; but they simply ask you to pay what these vessels have actually cost them, and you yourselves are to be the judges of what they cost. These American mechanics stand here and ask you to pay the actual cost of the ships which carry your flag upon the ocean, and not one dime in addition. Sir, can you refuse them? Did ever a Government since the dawn of history obtain a navy upon such cheap terms as these? Will you refuse so reasonable a request, and in one moment sponge out of them the earnings of a lifetime? Mr. Speaker, I know not how other gentlemen may feel, but for myself I declare I could not read the history of the splendid achievements of our gallant Navy in the ears of my little children without a blush of shame, if it is to be coupled with the recollection that its keels were laid on the wreck of the private fortunes of the men who constructed it—a Navy which has already saved you from foreign war, and done so much and so well toward putting down domestic insurrection.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I should like to inquire how much is involved in this bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will state that in a moment; and when I do come to that, and the reasons urged for refusing to pay because of the magnitude of the amount, I shall claim the attention of my very excellent and vehement friend who sits in front of me, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois:] upon which occasion I trust I shall, as now, have the honor of his attention while I refer to some small matters of appropriation in which his record is not quite consistent with his present economical opposition.

But to proceed. Ruin and bankruptcy stare in the face the men who have built the American Navy, while you higgie about paying them its cost. You say it is by no fault of yours that the cost has exceeded the contract price. I reply with more truth, it is no fault of theirs. And if it be not, and no one pretends that it is, is it fair that they should carry the whole loss?

Mr. SCOFIELD. The bill does not propose to pay them, but it proposes to raise a board and to job out our legislation to the Navy Department.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thank the gentleman for reminding me of an argument for the bill which I should otherwise have forgotten. The objection he raises is to my mind one of the main merits of the measure, and this I will undertake to show in a moment. My argument now leads me to reply to the objection on the score of the amount involved. But I will not forget the gentleman; and if I do, I beg him to remind me of his point before I take my seat.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard but one objection deserving the name to the payment of these men, and that is that the country cannot afford it, at least not now. And it is with that view that insinuations and innuendoes have been injected into this debate as to the amount involved in its passage. That amount, like the three black crows, has not diminished in its passage from mouth to mouth. The committee find the amount involved, if all were paid, to be about four millions. The gentleman from Maine immediately applies arithmetical progression to the statement and announces it to be $6,000,000; while the gentleman from Illinois, not to be outdone on this floor by a Maine mathematician, resorts to geometric calculations, and insists upon it it is $20,000,000. Whatever be the amount, it is said, it is too large to pay now.

Mr. Speaker, if it be too large a sum for thirty million people to pay, I suggest it is too large for these fifteen gentlemen to lose. If it will bankrupt your Treasury, in the name of Heaven what is to become of theirs? Too large a sum to pay to the men who have built your Navy! Why, sir, I have sat in this Hall this session a silent and awe-struck spectator at the facility with which you voted appropriations to every mendicant enterprise that knocked at the door of your Treasury. I thought as I gazed upon this bewildering prodigality that your resources were inexhaustible, or, at any rate, that your generosity was. You cannot vote $4,000,000 to pay for the hulls which in the coming day of ocean conflict are to dictate the law to the nations, but you can vote millions upon millions of your imperial domain—the surest foundation of your credit—to a great scheme of western railroads. You can engage in an unseemly quarrel with the Senate upon a vital appropriation bill, to give to your clerks and messengers twenty per cent. of additional compensation, but you cannot afford the twenty per cent. provided by this bill to save American mechanics from bankruptcy. You can—without the opposition of my most excellent friend, who was as dumb as an oyster—vote an enormous subsidy for an oceanic communication with the Emperor of China, and his cousin-pagan, the great Khan of Tartary.

"Where, where was Roderick then?
One blast upon his bugle-horn
Were worth a thousand men."

And you can and did, under the lead of the gentleman from Illinois, vote thrice, yes, four times, as many millions as this bill proposes, to forcing an unnatural wedlock between the waters of the Hudson and the waters of the Mississippi. Yes, sir, $40,000,000 will have gone down into that cavern of folly before the youngest child of this generation will come to see an armed vessel of depth sufficient to navigate the ocean carried from New York bay by way of the lakes to the Father of Waters. And to show that you are consistent alike in things small and great, I expect to see the House, before this week closes, vote $1,000 mileage to the western gentlemen who spend from thirty to forty dollars in getting from their homes to the capital.

And now, sir, not to forget the promise to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. SCOFIELD] across the way, I come to the provisions of the bill itself. What is it? What does it propose? It does not propose an appropriation. But as I am a frank man and am not apt to disguise what I mean, I have no doubt that it will involve an appropriation when its provisions come to be put in execution. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Navy shall have authority to appoint a board, if he shall deem necessary, to examine into the claims of these parties, and to report to him what relief, if any, is just and equitable. And upon their report, if approved by him, he shall have authority to pay the sum awarded to each out of the fund provided for the construction of vessels; but in no case to pay more than twenty per cent. in addition to the contract price, nor in any case more than the actual and necessary cost. That is the long and the short of it.

Mr. YEAMAN. I ask the gentleman now to yield to an adjournment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The House is listening to me in such good temper now after its storm that I decline to yield. Besides, I am about through. I shall only explain a provision or two of the bill and then find a good point to wind up on.

Mr. Speaker, if I understand the objection of my friend over the way [Mr. SCOFIELD] it is that the respective merits of these various claimants is not, upon the theory of the bill, to be determined here, but by a board to be appointed by the head of the Navy Department. Well, sir, I have already stated that I think that feature of the bill will commend itself to the judgment of the House. It is "jobbing out legislation" to the Navy Department, and abdicating our privilege to it. For one I am quite content to "let out this job," Mr. Speaker, to the Navy Department for the simple reason that it can be intelligently decided there and cannot here. That is all. The very nature of the questions to be decided makes a board of experts the best tribunal and this House the poorest tribunal to adjudicate them. What are they? The cost of vessels, of vessels built in different parts of the Union by different contractors, of different types and sizes, and at different times and prices. Such questions involve an investigation of the cost of every material of which they are constructed, of the prices of labor at the different periods and different points, a very careful examination of books and figures, a personal inspection of the work and the manner of its completion. Will any one pretend that such an investigation can be had here? Why, sir, I know of no forum under heaven worse calculated for the consideration of such questions than this Hall, and I know of no way in which they can be so intelligently decided and so well as by a board of officers to be appointed by that Department within whose purview such questions belong.

If it be objected, as has been hinted rather than stated, that the appointment ought not to be lodged with the present head of that Department, I have this to say, that there is where it legitimately belongs. I have no reason, as the House knows full well, to be either the admirer or the eulogist of the Secretary. He has persistently, not to say willfully, opposed himself to a great measure of public importance, regarded by himself as vital to the welfare of the Navy, against the judgment

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 77.

of the very board selected by himself to advise him—against the judgment of the Naval Committee of this House, and of four fifths of the naval officers of the country—against the interests of the State in which I was born and the district I have the honor to represent. And so far as our private relations are concerned, I have asked him for but few favors and have received—none.

But I will do the Secretary justice. He is an honest man. I have known him for fifteen or twenty years, and I know his heart is as far from corruption as heaven is from earth. I am willing to trust the composition of this board, which is to control the disbursement of $4,000,000, to him—knowing that no dollar of it will cleave to either his palms or theirs.

This very tribunal is limited to the measure of relief; so that you, not these claimants, select your own court, and then you prescribe the mode by which you limit the relief to but twenty per cent., and to not only the actual but the necessary cost. So that even by this bill they get scanty as well as tardy justice, if they get relief at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to say one word in closing which might be called a peroration to a less desultory speech. I believe my record on this floor will show that I am not in the habit of voting unnecessary appropriations. I have as persistently opposed them, large and small, as any other gentleman on this floor, always excepting my friend from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] and I have kept pretty close to his heels, except when he has flown out of his orbit. My record is clear and indisputable upon that point. And it is so from education and instinct, for I represent a constituency who are a thrifty and a frugal folk, and while they are content to pay of their substance to all needed wants and for all honest claims upon the Government, they have no tolerance for the harpy crew who are feeding and feasting upon her bleeding heart in this hour of her trial. But I should be false to myself, to my own sense of justice, false to my constituents who believe in a fair day's wages for a fair day's labor, false to the good name of the country, if I did not ask you to deal fairly by the American mechanics who laid the keels of the American Navy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I call for the reading of the 140th rule.

The Clerk read the rule, as follows:

"140. No extra compensation shall be allowed to any officer or messenger, page, laborer, or other person in the service of the House, or engaged in or about the public grounds or buildings; and no person shall be an officer of the House, or continue in its employment, who shall be an agent for the prosecution of any claim against the Government, or be interested in such claim otherwise than an original claimant; and it shall be the duty of the Committee of Accounts to inquire into and report to the House any violation of this rule."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I charge that there is an employé of the House upon the floor who is acting as an agent for these claimants. His conduct has been observed by me and by other members of the House to-night. I have seen him introduce persons on the floor who are not privileged to the floor, and who are interested in the passage of this joint resolution. I have seen him prompting members and doing various other indecent and improper things, and I ask that that rule be enforced. [Cries of "Name him."] His name is Wilson, and he occupies the position of lobbyist under cover of employment under the Doorkeeper.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois raises a point of order, and makes a charge upon his own responsibility. In 1842 the House adopted a rule that no employé of theirs should be interested in any claim pending before the House except as an original claimant himself. If there is any employé—the person suggested by the gentleman from Illinois or any other person—who has violated that rule, he will be excluded from the Hall, and it is the duty of the Committee of Accounts, under this rule, to examine into the case and report upon it. The Doorkeeper will enforce the rule.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask further that the rule be enforced that excludes from the floor all persons except those who are privileged. I think it high time that we adopted some rule here that shall be administered—either throw open the doors and let everybody in or exclude everybody who is not entitled to be here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois requires the enforcement of the rule in regard to privileged admissions to the floor. All persons who are not entitled by the rules to remain upon the floor will now retire.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I still hold the floor, and in accordance with a promise I made, I will now yield ten minutes of the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. L. MYERS.]

Mr. PIKE. I object to the gentleman yielding unless he yields absolutely.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has a right to yield to any gentleman for explanation of the pending measure.

Mr. KALBFLEISCH. I would remind the gentleman from Connecticut, before he yields the floor, that he has not yet answered my question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will answer the gentleman's question. I understand from the statements of parties who appeared before the committee that the joint resolution will involve about four million dollars if the entire amount shall be awarded; the joint resolution proposes that the award of the board shall appropriate any sum, within certain limits, that they may find each particular party entitled to, and the total may not amount to that sum; but I am a frank man, and I do not disguise the fact that I believe, if this bill is passed, $4,000,000 will be taken from the Treasury to redeem from bankruptcy the men who have made this Navy.

I now yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. L. MYERS. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped this resolution would pass without dissent, because it proposes a just relief to a worthy class of citizens—men who have contributed in no small degree to sustain the honor of the country. Yet I scarcely expected it, and from the opposition made to-night, as on several occasions of late, the proper demands of the Navy seem to me to find very little favor with some gentlemen of this House. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has so ably explained the measure under consideration that it is unnecessary to enter into details. I shall content myself at this late hour with taking a general and national view of the matter. As I understand the question—and I have done what probably a great many here have not: I have carefully read the Senate report upon it—a number of well-known, some of them eminent citizens, builders of armored and other vessels, and steam machinery, owing to the war itself, the rise in gold, the increased cost of all the materials and labor entering into their contracts, above all to the alterations in plans suggested by a constantly-growing experience, and ordered by the Navy Department, would now be greatly the losers if we kept them rigidly to their original contract prices. They are before the Congress of the nation for relief, and I hope it will be cheerfully accorded to them.

Mr. GANSON. Will the gentleman specify wherein the change in the contracts was made?

Mr. L. MYERS. Certainly I will specify. I find by looking over the Senate report that during the progress of the work many and material modifications of plan were adopted. In some cases the contractors were required to suspend work until new plans and specifications could be prepared.

Mr. GANSON. Will the gentleman please explain?

Mr. L. MYERS. I decline to yield further. I am about to explain, and am now answering the gentleman's question. As one instance, I find in a letter addressed by General Inspector Stimers to Messrs. Secor & Co., one of these firms, under orders from the chief of the Bureau of Construction, the following:

"In consequence of defects developed in the monitor vessels now afloat in actual service at sea and in battles, it has been deemed to make the following changes in the iron-clad steamers Mahopac, Tecumseh, and Manhattan, now building by you"— with a minute description of the alterations required and a request for the calculation of the difference in cost between the original and amended plans, all of which the gentleman can read if he sees fit.

I find also in this report that—

"The delays occasioned in the work by the changes of the plans caused large losses to the contractors; first, by leaving their labor unemployed for the time upon their hands; second, by requiring them to carry insurance and interest; third, by the constant and rapid increase of the cost of labor and materials, and the depreciation of the currency, for which the Department could not give adequate and complete relief."

The committee state very fully that when these various contracts were made the art of building iron-clad ships-of-war was yet but an experiment, constant modifications in plans becoming necessary. To satisfy the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] I will read their conclusions and the convincing reasons they give:

"The committee are satisfied that the petitioners have sustained, and are sustaining, heavy losses, which it was not in their power to avoid after making their contracts. Their contracts were generally for large amounts, and required a long time for their completion. It was impossible for them to make provision for all the material required, or to foresee and provide against the great advance in the price of labor. The demand for iron of peculiar and large sizes and fine quality was great, the supply small, and the means of producing it in the country limited. New machinery for preparing and rolling it was necessary; under such circumstances, builders of iron ships and heavy machinery could not contract in advance for such quantities as would be required, even could they advance the money, so that they were compelled to abide the fortunes of the market. During the progress of the work by many of the petitioners labor and materials have advanced, perhaps, one hundred per cent. This was not foreseen either by the reckless or the most prudent. The increased cost of labor and materials outran the calculations of every one. Ought the losses resulting from such a state of facts to fall entirely upon the petitioners? The committee think not."

And, Mr. Speaker, I think not.

I am one of those, sir, who believe in the power and efficiency of our steam, and especially of our armored vessels. I think the Government should facilitate in every honorable way, not only the completion of those now building, but the construction and perfection of enough more to make us beyond question the most formidable Power in the world; and I am willing to leave the question of additional compensation for these ship-builders to the Navy Department or a board of its selection, limited, however, in the amount to be paid as proposed by the resolution.

What especially commends this resolution to me is that, instead of hastily passing upon the merits of these applications here, the whole subject is committed to those who best understand it, and can calmly, upon an examination of dates, figures, and facts, do even-handed justice, allowing, reducing, or totally rejecting a claim, as the evidence shall warrant. But it appears to me this very reference of the matter to the Navy Department creates much of the opposition manifested so warmly to-night.

I know, sir, there are a few here who decry the management of that branch of our service, who speak lightly of the results attained by the iron-clad and other vessels built by its direction, and omit no opportunity for attack upon it.

The Navy Department needs no defense from me. We are passing through the greatest struggle known to history. A peaceful people, we have shown that patriotism and a just cause know no obstacles. An army of a million brave men this day triumphantly carries forward the banners of the Union.

But, Mr. Speaker, proudest among the creations of this war is the American Navy. In March, 1861, four wooden vessels within reach of orders and twenty sent away by traitors; now a fleet of six hundred and seventy-one vessels, seventy-one of them iron-clad; one hundred patrolling the waters of the redeemed Mississippi, the Cumberland, and Tennessee; and three thousand five hundred and sixty miles of coast blockaded, ay, and blockaded so effectually that the share of the Government in prize money counts by many millions—the last port closed to all but the avenging legions now repossessing Wilmington, Charleston, and Mobile.

The deeds of our gallant seamen sufficiently attest the power and endurance of the vessels which bore them. Those deeds illustrate the regeneration of the Republic, and will live in song and story only rivaled by the brilliant exploits of our armies. They place the names of Morris and Craven beside that of Lawrence; and in Worden, Foote, Cushing, Winslow, Porter, and Farragut, recall the glories of Barney, Preble, Truxton, Bainbridge, Decatur, and Perry.

Mr. Speaker, in the Rotunda of this Capitol there is a noble picture representing Perry's great victory on Lake Erie—the hero himself, as he passed amid the fire of the fleet from the shattered Lawrence to the Niagara. I would it belonged to the nation. We have within a few weeks passed a resolution which my colleague [Mr. O'NEILL] informs me has been to-day adopted by the Senate authorizing its artist to execute a painting commemorative of some striking incident of this war. The subjects are not wanting, but I could wish that I might have the selection from them.

Proud though it might be, I would not take the iron-clad contest in Hampton Roads, which saved the nation, astonished the world, and marked a new era in naval warfare; nor prouder still, the battle off Cherbourg, when in the sight almost of two false nations, the Kearsarge—whose victorious seamen we have this evening voted to compensate—sent to the ocean's depths the pirate Alabama, fit type of the cause and the fate of the rebellion; nor yet the great armored combat in Charleston harbor, of which the Russian Admiral Lesaffsky, differing from the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] reports that the monitors came out of a terrible, concentrated, and unprecedented fire from the forts almost scatheless; nor even the brilliant attack upon Fort Fisher, when the Ironsides, Monadnock, with other iron-plated as well as wooden vessels, played so conspicuous a part. No, sir; I would select the fight in Mobile bay; the rebel ram Tennessee, with her armor broken, her steering gear disabled by the monitors, grappled firmly by them, and about to surrender, while the great captain, Farragut—instead of being seated quietly in the Admiralty Board pictured by the gentleman from Maryland—is lashed to the mast of the good ship Hartford, where the shot and shell whistled past him, who by common accord has been deemed worthy of the mantle of Perry.

We need not blush for our Navy—it has been worthy of its ancient renown, and no critic can now with justice call our iron-clad armaments an experiment. At least the experiment has succeeded so well that all maritime Powers are profiting by it. The lesson from the Merrimac, in the language of the London Times, reduced the whole English navy to two ships, the Warrior and the Black Prince; and although on January 1, 1863, the number was only increased to four, she has now twenty-seven iron and wooden armored vessels, twenty of them sea-going. France has already eight iron-clads afloat, twenty-five building, and nine in reserve. Russia is not far behind. Italy had fifteen armored vessels in 1863; and Brazil, and Turkey, and Prussia, are having iron-clads built in France and England. These are principally the offspring of the American conflict, toward which Europe still looks with absorbed and increasing interest.

As early in that conflict as 1861 the Secretary of the Navy offered a chance of competition for the best mode of constructing these armored vessels, and the result is before the world. With but little opportunity, as I shall show, of building such vessels at national yards, the work was necessarily given to contractors, and to them is due much of the success which we have attained. I know there have been errors, and short-comings, and defects, but, Mr. Speaker, these were the incidents of a new creation; and wherever these builders have in good faith done their best, they should not be deprived of a just profit while doing the work of the Government and the people.

Not is this all. We may soon have to deal with naval Powers more formidable than the rebellion. No action or inaction of ours should cripple these builders or delay for a day the completion of armaments which may bring peace to the country or keep it when brought. As the commerce of a nation is its wealth, so its navy constitutes its strength. England, once the boasted mistress of the seas, never doubted the proposition; and France, which till of late years paid too little attention to her navy, was never feared by England so much as now. Only last year an English writer tremblingly pictures the result should the navies of France and Italy!—poor little despised, recreated Italy, which England helped about as much as she did Poland or her cousin of Denmark, and not quite as much as she helps the confederates—should the navies of France and Italy “ever pull the horse together.” And as England and France and our Russian friends recognize this truth, so must we. If peace comes and stays with us, our Navy must still be completed and preserved, must be kept from corrosion and adhesion and decay. Our vessels will constantly need docking, refitting, and repairs. That flag which hangs above you, Mr. Speaker, must still be borne proudly into every port.

But we must be prepared too for foreign war. England only provoked us in 1812 because of our supposed naval weakness. Although her entire war navy nearly doubles ours, that argument would not hold good now—our iron-clads making up for the difference. But she who bullied Brazil at Rio within two years and made no compliments with China and Japan, still furnishes ships and outfit and harbor to pirates—one day sympathizes with the Florida, the next her Canadian children plot incendiarism and incursions over the border, not so bold as the English reserve who were taught a lesson in gunnery on the Alabama. Throughout this war, against the advice of her great commoners, false to her teachings and traditions of liberty, she has sided against us, playing the enemy rather than the neutral; and although the queen, under the inspiration of Union victories, now talks of reconstruction, there is no telling at what moment a collision might take place.

Still further. The President's message says nothing about Maximilian, it is true. The Monroe doctrine may be in abeyance, but it is still the settled policy of the country, and this House has but responded to the wishes of the people in reiterating it. The Power that could spare fifty thousand troops for Mexico, and steam them across the Atlantic, is not to be despised; and even though France be not the aggressor it may soon be our province to assert our time-honored policy and aid the neighbor who is showing her tyrant that she is not only a belligerent, but a very formidable one.

The rebellion, plotted for a third of a century by a pampered aristocracy, is in its death-struggle. Thousands are seeking the proffered amnesty; conquered cities returning to their allegiance; States even talking of a shelter beneath the old flag. The bitterness of our strife may rankle for a time, but with language, blood, memories and hopes in common, when the leaders of the conspiracy are punished the armies that have clashed against each other may yet vie in prowess to drive the invader from the shores of Mexico.

I say all this, Mr. Speaker, in no spirit of bravado. The wish for war is not “father to the thought,” but a wise statesmanship is not blinded by the glitter of present success. On more than one occasion since the rebellion commenced we were on the eve of a war with Great Britain. The very proper repeal of a treaty which gave “reciprocity” only in name is already being misconstrued. To protect our commerce and frontier we must have armaments as well as fortifications on the great lakes. The Monroe doctrine will be enforced by the people, perhaps even against the sanction of the Government. Protection to our Navy and those who have built it up, increase of its strength, will, amid the complications which may arise, not bring war, but ward it off, and produce an amicable adjustment of the question. We shall then have a lasting peace, lasting because other nations will fear to attack us; lasting because the Union will be one of power as well as beauty; lasting, for soon slavery, the cause of discord between North and South, will have perished from the land.

The Declaration of Independence asserts that all men are created equal. Here in time of war, but in the mild mode pointed out by the Constitution, we have declared what that declaration implied, that they of right ought to be free.

The Constitution was framed to form “a more perfect Union,” more perfect than the Confederation that preceded it, which, amid all its defects, at least declared that “the Union shall be perpetual.” Shaking off the heresy of State sovereignty, wiping from our escutcheon the only stain that marred its purity, we can at last stand erect before the nations, and soon shall proudly point to the more perfect Union which our fathers fondly hoped for, won by the very crime that sought to destroy it. Peace beams upon us from the near future. Lack of the appliances of war, even amid the richest means for those appliances, alone tempted the folly of secession. Let us profit by the lesson. Europe respects power; by power alone will the peace be preserved against her.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is a reason more cogent than any yet mentioned why we should relieve the meritorious of the ship-builders now applying to Congress. These contractors for iron ships and steam machinery have nowhere the facilities which will enable them to fill an agreement made, as is generally asked, for the shortest possible time. The Government is their only purchaser. It is never certain that they will obtain another contract, and it is not reasonable to demand of them—in view of these facts it is scarcely within their legitimate means—to build the heaviest forges and machinery for the most powerful steam engines, nor can they lay up timber, iron, and other materials in sufficient quantities to prevent great loss from the fluctuations in prices at a time like this. It is the fault of Congress that these contractors are now here; at least there would not have been so many but for the indifference and inaction of Congress upon this very subject. Time and again has the Secretary of the Navy called attention to the question. First in March, then in June, then in December, 1862, and again in his reports of December, 1863, and December, 1864, pressing the want of a great national navy-yard where alone the proper facilities could be obtained, urging the great loss and delay to the service arising from the insufficiency of our present yards, public and private, and absolutely begging Congress to take immediate action.

Let me read a brief extract from his last report:

“To relieve the navy-yards from work which they have but limited means to execute, and to secure necessary repairs, the Department has been compelled to establish stations for machinery and means of refitment at Mound City, Memphis, New Orleans, Ship Island, Pensacola, Key West, Port Royal, Beaufort, Norfolk, and Baltimore. But these and all the private establishments of the country, besides other calls upon them, have been insufficient to keep the present Navy in necessary order.”

Again he says:

“Were there outside of our navy-yards establishments to perform promptly the requisite work in time of war, I should not at this time again press the subject of a navy-yard for iron work for the construction of vessels upon the consideration of our authorities. But although the Department has generally been ably and zealously seconded in its efforts by private contractors, yet the fact that there is no customer but the Government for much of this heavy class of iron work forbids us to expect that individual enterprise will be prepared to execute it without full remuneration for all the outlay for shops, tools, and machinery which may be required in preparation.”

How truthful these statements are, how sad the lesson they should have taught, may be learned in the fact that but for delays in completing the armored vessels ordered by the Department for the shallow waters and sounds of North Carolina, we should not now have to sorrow over the terrible massacre at Plymouth.

What has been the case in England? The Warrior, ordered May 11, 1859, to have been delivered in July, 1860, was not finished until October, 1861. Her contract price was £210,000, and the Government had to pay for her £254,000. The Black Prince, ordered October 6, 1859, to have been delivered October 10, 1860, was not finished until after January, 1862, and her cost was increased from £230,000 to £250,000. The Defense was not delivered until four months after contract; the Hector and Valiant seven months, and the Resistance ten months after. Yet these English contractors have great iron-ship-yards on the Thames, Clyde, Mersey, Tyne, Wear, Tees, Avon, &c.—the combined capacity of all our private yards, in the language of Chief Engineer King, "not being equal to the first of the great iron-ship-building yards on the river Thames," many of the largest iron vessels having been built for the Government by the Mill-wall Company, the Thames Company, Napier & Sons, and the Messrs. Laird Brothers whose names will not readily be forgotten by the American people; all of their works more extensive than any out of Great Britain. Chief Engineer King adds:

"Under existing circumstances, the best of our private yards could not construct one such vessel as the British frigate Achilles within three or four years. Several iron gunboats which were contracted for more than two years ago are not yet completed, and will not be for some months."

No wonder that when the dread of the Merri-mac was all over the land and the presence of the Roanoke sadly needed, it took many months to get her a new crank-shaft—and then in the rough only—in place of her broken one, our navy-yards not being able to make it. No wonder that in 1862 the gunboat contractors, who had run their works night and day, seven days in the week, came to Congress for relief from their forfeitures of $200 per day for being beyond their contract time. No wonder that the Niagara when most needed was detained fourteen months, and the Cuyler ten months, for repairs, or that a manufacturer of reputation and ability was two years beyond his stipulated time in setting up the turrets of the Tonawanda and Miantonomah. No wonder that so distinguished a citizen as Captain John Ericsson, last June, had to ask Congress for relief in his engagements to build the Puritan and Dictator, the last named of which has been erroneously called a failure because she too had her shaft broken. No wonder, sir, that when every year, almost every month, experience is quickening our knowledge in this great new art of iron-ship-building, and plans are changed of necessity by the Navy Department, when delays for the causes I have stated are unavoidable and prices are constantly enhancing, these contractors should now knock at our doors for a relief which ought not to be refused them. The British Admiral Robinson, speaking of these difficulties, says, "It is not, therefore, one contractor (for steam machinery) or one iron-ship-builder, but all who have failed in their agreements." Secretary Welles, in his report upon the Albemarle affair, uses almost precisely the same language.

Let us grant the prayer of these builders for a proper hearing and determination of their claims, and then go to work in sober earnest, at once, to provide a national yard which will prove a saving of millions in money and years in time instead of the expense which some gentlemen here dread so much.

In this view, if not in others, the Naval Committee of this House, to whom the matter was referred, were unanimous.

Nor would such action do injustice to these private ship-builders, who would still have much of the Government work to do, at perhaps a fairer chance of just remuneration than now.

In appointing Engineer King to visit the dock-yards of Europe the Secretary of the Navy declared that the want of such an establishment in the United States had become a national misfortune, and Mr. King after full investigation concurs in the opinion.

We have no proper wharfage or dockage room for our wooden vessels even; but above all we need a great constructive iron-ship-yard. The workshops of France and England, and the materials they hurried forward, conquered Russia. We want a place to make the largest anchors and armor-plates, the most powerful engines and ordnance and ordnance stores; a great foundry owned by the nation, with basins and water frontage more extended than all we now have combined—one, too, which will need little other protection than the ships which lie there.

It is perhaps not strictly within the scope of this argument to define what the requirements for a yard of this kind should be, and yet it is not entirely foreign to the question, for an unfortunate selection would extend indefinitely the evils I have mentioned, not to speak of the vast expenditures it would throw away or the disaster it might bring upon the country. Nor need I say to this House where I believe such yard should be located, although the gentleman from Connecticut,

[Mr. BRANDEGEE,] who has kindly surrendered to me a part of his time, expresses his regret that the locality urged by him was not the preference of the Secretary.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not object.

Mr. L. MYERS. Very well. Differing as we do on that question, I give all credit to my friend, who, waiving his personal feelings against the Secretary, advocates the resolution before us because he deems it right. He has awarded the highest praise to that officer in pronouncing him an honest man; the best reason, too, for our confiding to him the settlement of the claims of these ship and engine-builders. Next to that praise let me add that in urging a navy-yard where he believed the combined advantages were greatest, he has been national, not sectional.

Chief Engineer King, after a thorough examination of the great European dock-yards, declares, as the Secretary has, that we need a yard for iron ships "in an entirely secure position, far from the sea, in fresh water, and within easy reach of iron and coal." Such a place—League Island—was offered by Philadelphia to the Government, a free gift, combining all the requisites to a degree presented by no other locality; the skilled labor of the largest manufacturing city in the Union on the spot; iron, coal, timber, in unrivaled quantities; fresh water, and that distance from the sea which makes defense easy. Chat-ham even had no such advantages, nor perhaps any other place in the world. Yet the proffer is still unaccepted, the resources of the country in this respect rendered nugatory, and we continue to be thrown almost exclusively on the contract system because a rival locality brought shadows against us "to fright" the House "from its propriety."

I should rejoice if through the advantages lavished on my native State by a kind Providence the city of Philadelphia could be the chosen spot for such an establishment.

There is no time I fear for further action on the subject this session. But I trust the next Congress will determine upon a location wherever in their judgment is best, and proceed in this great work as a national necessity. Meantime, and at all times, let us be just. No stronger claim has been presented to us than the one under discussion, and I hope the joint resolution will pass.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, I cannot, of course, at this the hour of midnight, and after making a speech myself, urge the passage of so important a measure as this by any parliamentary tactics that would prevent discussion. I am willing therefore to consent to any arrangement that may be proposed that will let this subject go over and come up to-morrow as the unfinished business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. We cannot make any arrangement about the matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, I give way to the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROLLINS.]

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 46, noes 43.

So the House (at ten minutes after twelve o'clock, a. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. THOMAS BOWMAN, D. D., Chaplain to the Senate.

On motion of Mr. CONNESS, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 25th of February last, copies of all the orders, permits, licenses, and correspondence in the possession of that Department connected with the subject of trade in the southern superintendency; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the 3d of February, 1865, information in relation to the printing of the argument of the judges advocate on the trial of Franklin W. Smith, and in relation to the employment of agents or detectives by the Navy Department; which, on motion of Mr. GRIMES, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. HALE subsequently said: I move to reconsider the vote by which the answer to a resolution of the Senate making certain inquiries of the Secretary of the Navy was ordered to be printed. My reason for so doing is that the papers ordered to be printed, instead of being an answer to the inquiries of the resolution, consist mainly of an inflated autobiography of the Assistant Secretary of the Navy, and mainly intended as an argument for making him a rear admiral.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

REPORT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate the annual report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution, showing the operations, expenditures, and condition of that Institution for the year 1864; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I desire to offer a resolution in connection with that report. It is the usual annual resolution on the subject, and has received the assent of the Committee on Printing, and need not, therefore, be referred to that committee:

Resolved, That five thousand additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for 1864 be printed; three thousand for the use of the Senate and two thousand for the use of the Smithsonian Institution: Provided, That the aggregate number of pages contained in said report shall not exceed four hundred and fifty, without wood-cuts or plates, except those furnished by the Institution, and that the report be stereotyped.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRIMES presented a memorial of the American Medical Association, praying for an increase of the rank and pay of surgeons in the Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. FOOT, it was Ordered, That Captain John B. Montgomery, United States Navy, have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOWE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 110) creating a committee on damages, reported it without amendment.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 127) authorizing that the time for revision of the laws of the District of Columbia be extended for and during the Thirty-Ninth Congress, reported it without amendment.

Mr. POWELL, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 63) repealing the joint resolution of Congress providing for the distribution of certain public books and documents, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the Senate having already passed a resolution on the subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. R. No. 124) authorizing the Northern Pacific Railroad Company to invest its funds in Government securities, reported it without amendment, and that it be postponed until the first Monday in December next; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 691) to authorize and aid in the construction of a railroad connecting the Pacific railroad in California with the Columbia river in Oregon and Puget sound, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred a joint resolution (H. R. No. 165) to provide for mustering out of the military service certain non-commissioned officers and privates who enlisted to fill old regiments, reported it without amendment and adversely.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, who were authorized by a resolution of the Senate of the 2d of July, 1864, during the recess to inquire into the policy of providing by a general law for relieving the public domain of the United States of the possessory title thereto of the several Indian tribes, submitted a report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that five thousand additional copies of the report be printed for the use of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

SUBSTITUTES FOR COTTON.

Mr. ANTHONY presented a letter of the Commissioner of Agriculture addressed to him, transmitting the report of the commission appointed under an act of Congress approved February 25, 1863, "for investigations to test the practicability of cultivating and preparing flax or hemp as a substitute for cotton;" which was laid upon the table.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate five thousand copies of the report of the commissioners appointed under an act of Congress approved February 25, 1863, "for investigations to test the practicability of cultivating and preparing flax or hemp as a substitute for cotton;" and that ten thousand copies be printed for the Department of Agriculture.

ARMY REGISTER.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the action of the House upon the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register, to make a report upon the subject. The House of Representatives have concurred in four amendments made to the resolution by the Senate, and disagreed to the fifth. The Committee on Military Affairs recommend that the Senate recede from that amendment, and I ask action upon it at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question. It is moved that the Senate recede from its fifth amendment to this joint resolution.

The motion was agreed to.

STAFF OF LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 476) to provide for a chief of staff to the Lieutenant General commanding the armies of the United States, to report it back without amendment, and I will ask for its consideration at this time. I think it will lead to no debate. If it does, I will let it go over.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which provides that the President of the United States may, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a chief of staff to the Lieutenant General commanding the armies of the United States, who shall have the rank, pay, and emoluments of a brigadier general in the United States Army.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENCOURAGEMENT OF IMMIGRATION.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider Senate bill No. 403. It is important that it should be considered now. It is a bill amending the immigration act, reported from the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. GRIMES. Is that the bill which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] introduced?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLLAMER. I feel it my duty to ask for the consideration of the annual bill providing for the establishment of post roads. I endeavored to get it considered yesterday morning, but could not get it attended to, because the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] desired to put a railroad bill upon it. I desire to move the suspension of all prior orders in order to take up that bill, and if the Senate reject it I shall be enabled to show by the record that I have done my duty.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill indicated by him at the present time.

Mr. COLLAMER. I object to it.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Then I move, if it is in order, to postpone all prior orders with a view to take up the bill. This is an immigration bill of a general character which it is important to pass. I make a motion to postpone all prior orders and take up that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion is in order.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Finance that it is not likely to provoke discussion.

Mr. GRIMES. I can state, I think pretty certainly, that the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] will discuss it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state to the Senator that everything that my friend from Maine objected to in the bill was stricken out by the Committee on Finance. I understand the Committee on Agriculture have only taken the bill as reported from the Committee on Finance. Is that the case?

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Yes, sir, without amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas modifies his motion, and instead of asking unanimous consent, moves that all prior orders be postponed for the purpose of taking up the bill he has indicated.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. Let the title of the bill be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to encourage immigration," approved July 4, 1864, and the act entitled "An act to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," approved March 3, 1855.

Mr. COLLAMER. I understand this bill is to be debated. It is said that the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] desires to debate the bill. So I understand from the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill as originally introduced was objectionable and would have been opposed; but I think everything objectionable in it has been stricken out.

Mr. CONNESS. Before the vote is taken I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance whether this bill now contains the provision for legalizing contracts made out of our country in other countries for labor, or whether it has been amended in that respect.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is nothing of that kind in the bill. All the provisions relating to those disputed points were omitted by the Committee on Finance. The bill now called up by the Senator from Kansas I am told is a House bill, and is a copy of the bill reported from the Committee on Finance. If that is so, I do not think there is a single thing in it to which any Senator will object. [All the disputed items about contracts for labor are stricken out.]

Mr. CONNESS. Are you sure of that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot be sure of it without having the bill read.

Mr. CONNESS. It is a very long bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on postponing all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill named.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes five, noes not counted.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to postpone all prior orders and take up House bill No. 763, a bill reported from the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, which contains a few short amendments to the Pacific railroad act, to enable the companies to progress with their work. It is essential that it should be acted upon now.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope that bill will be taken up. It will take but a moment.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to offer some amendments to that bill before it is acted upon; but I am not prepared to do so now. I hope, therefore, it will not be taken up.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That being the case, I hope Senators will allow me to call up some bills to which there are no amendments to be offered.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator who threatens this bill with amendments was in the committee now nearly a week since, February 24, when it was reported. We are approaching the termination of the session rapidly. I think it was due to that bill, and those who have it in charge, and those whose interests are comprehended by it, that he should have had his amendments prepared; and I should like to know how long it will take him, or whether this bill is to be defeated by waiting for the Senator to prepare his amendments.

Mr. HARLAN. I shall, of course, occupy the first time I can appropriate which is not demanded for other business that I think equally important. I will prepare them as soon as I can.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask for a vote on the motion to take up the bill. It is true that there is not a single act that I have undertaken to press upon the attention of this body during this session connected with California affairs that has not been obstructed by the honorable Senator with all the power and influence he has in this body; and if our legislation is entirely barred by his action it will be rather a hard proceeding to us.

Mr. HARLAN. I think the reflection made by the Senator is unjustifiable, unless, in his opinion, the Pacific railroad lies entirely within the State of California. I had supposed that that great work was intended to commence near the States bordering on the Mississippi valley, and to proceed some thousand miles or more before it would reach his State; and as one line of the road, or a branch road, terminates opposite the State I have the honor in part to represent, I feel, I think, if I can be intrusted to hold my own opinions, as deep an interest in the success of the work as the Senator from California probably can.

As to my having unwarrantably obstructed the passage of any bill in which the State of California was particularly interested, I think the Senator will be unable to adduce the slightest proof. When bills have been referred to the committee of which I have been a member, I have given them the attention they deserved, and have attempted to consider them carefully and candidly, and have acted in pursuance of my own judgment as to their merits. It is true I have not always accorded in opinion with the Senator from California. That may be my misfortune, but it surely has not been my fault.

Mr. BROWN. The Congress of the United States has been very liberal in its dealings with these companies, and has shown a very great desire to enable them to progress with their work and complete it as speedily as possible. The desire at the present time is to take up a bill making a trifling amendment, which will enable the companies that are depending upon the use of the bonds which are authorized to be issued by them for raising money to negotiate those bonds abroad more favorably than they can now do. If this bill is taken up and acted upon it will facilitate them perhaps one year in the construction of the work, or in the realization of their mines. I do not think it will take more than one or two moments to pass it, unless the Senator from Iowa has amendments to offer of a more serious character than any I am aware of. I trust the Senator from California will be gratified in his desire to take up the measure. It not only affects the road in California, but it likewise affects the eastern branches of that road.

Mr. COWAN. I hope the Senate will take up this morning the regular order of business, the bills which interest the country everywhere.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that motion is not now in order. It will be in order when the motion of the Senator from California is disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave to make a report from the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a question before the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will then submit a motion. I do not wish to waste this precious hour. I move to postpone the pending business with a view to take up the bill to provide ways and means for the support of the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on postponing all prior orders and taking up the bill indicated by the Senator from California.

Mr. CONNESS. I think the honorable chairman ought not now to antagonize this particular measure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not antagonize any particular measure.

Mr. CONNESS. It is equivalent to that; because if gentlemen are forced to vote upon it, under the pressure that the Senator makes, of course the vote will be adverse to this bill. I notify Senators that the propositions contained in the bill that we desire to have taken up are very simple, and yet are of the most vital importance, perhaps not to the railroad interest represented by the honorable Senator from Iowa, but I know they are of the first consequence to us. Mr. President, we are endeavoring to make the Pacific railroad over the greatest natural barriers on our continent. Shall we not have a chance to do that? I hope we will take a vote on this proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 16, noes 11; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 763) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864.

The bill proposes to amend section ten of the act of July 2, 1864, so as to allow the Central Pacific Railroad Company and the Western Pacific Railroad Company of California to issue their six per cent. thirty-year bonds—interest payable in any lawful money of the United States—upon their separate roads; and the companies are authorized to issue, respectively, their bonds to the extent of one hundred miles in advance of a continuous completed line from Sacramento.

The second section proposes to ratify and confirm the assignment made by the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California to the Western Pacific Railroad Company of that State of the right to construct all that portion of the railroad and telegraph from the city of San José to the city of Sacramento, with all the privileges and benefits of the several acts of Congress relating thereto, and subject to all the conditions thereof; but the time within which the Western Pacific Railroad Company are to be required to construct the first twenty miles of their road is to be one year from the 1st of July, 1865, and the entire road is to be completed from San José to Sacramento, connecting at the latter point with the Central Pacific railroad, within four years thereafter.

The Committee on the Pacific Railroad reported the bill, with an amendment in section one, line six, after the word "California" to insert "the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and all other companies provided for in the said act of July 2, 1864;" so that it will read:

That section ten of said act of July 2, 1864, be so modified and amended as to allow the Central Pacific Railroad Company and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, of California, the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and all other companies provided for in the said act of July 2, 1864, to issue their six per cent. thirty-year bonds, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOWARD. There is another amendment which ought to be made, which is rather verbal in its nature. It is on page 2, line fourteen, at the end of the first section, to strike out the words "from Sacramento" and to insert the words "of construction," so that it will read:

And the said companies are hereby authorized to issue, respectively, their bonds to the extent of one hundred miles in advance of a continuous completed line of construction.

Mr. CONNESS. There is no objection to that. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARLAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out the second section.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not know what the object of the honorable Senator can be in making this motion. The section provides that Congress shall ratify an assignment legally made since the last session of Congress by the Central Pacific Railroad Company to the Western Pacific Railroad Company for the construction of a part of this road. The act of last year fully justifies the assignment made, and the parties are entitled to all the legal privileges and benefits that the law confers upon the original parties. The only object of seeking this confirmation of the assignment is this: the company are now engaged in constructing twenty-five miles of their road as required by law.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will ask my colleague to allow me one moment on a question pertinent to the matter upon which he is now speaking.

Mr. CONNESS. I prefer to go on with my explanation to the Senate, because I do not wish to consume time. I hope we shall come to a vote without discussion, and I am making an explanation to the Senate and not a discussion. It is clear we cannot get action on this kind of measures at this period of the session unless we do it by economizing time.

The object of seeking this confirmation of assignment while these parties are building their road is to enable them to negotiate better with capitalists to obtain the money necessary to go forward with the work. If application be made now, they will have to furnish, through an attorney, a legal exposition of their rights. If Congress ratifies it, there is no such legal exposition necessary prima facie. It improves their credit in the market. There is no responsibility added to the Government, not the weight of a hair.

Mr. HARLAN. This provision was considered maturely at the last session of Congress and deliberately rejected by the committee of conference, and I think by the Pacific Railroad Committee of the Senate. It was in one or the other bill—however I think in the bill passed by the House—and was fully considered in a committee of conference of the two bodies, and stricken out.

Mr. CONNESS. I know the Senator does not intend to make any misstatement, but he is not stating the fact correctly, if he will pardon me. Has he any objection to my stating to the Senate what the facts were in that regard?

Mr. HARLAN. None whatever.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, the facts are not as the Senator states them. The fact was that there was an old assignment made by the Central Pacific Railroad Company to the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and the bill which passed the House last year, if adopted by the Senate, would have confirmed that assignment and extended the benefits of the Pacific railroad act to the railroad known as the San Francisco and San José railroad, fifty miles of road, I wish Senators to understand, finished and constructed and running, and profitably so. I believed, with others, that the policy of Congress was not to make a gift to roads already constructed, but to make grants to induce the construction of roads; and therefore, among others, I objected to that confirmation; but this bill does not contain it at all. The assignment that we propose to confirm here is a totally different one. It is in all respects legal, and authorized by the Pacific railroad act. It does not extend the bonuses of the Pacific Railroad Company to one foot of the road lying between San Francisco and San José, as the assignment spoken of last year did; and therefore it is not obnoxious to the objection of the Senator.

Mr. HARLAN. I shall not occupy time. I think I did not misstate the facts that I was attempting to state. The committee of conference of the two bodies took this view of the subject: that in the charter, in the original act and in the amendatory act, the Government held the company that acquired the franchise of the Government to construct the road in pursuance of its provisions in order to receive the subsidy in bonds and in lands; that it was a matter totally unimportant to this Government what agency the company acquiring the franchise should employ in the construction of the work; that if they chose to employ some other corporate body to construct the line of road, or any portion of it, and if it was completed in accordance with the provisions of the law, it was a matter totally immaterial to this Government. They might employ a corporation; they might employ an individual, a corporate aggregate or sole; and if the work was done in pursuance of the charter they would be entitled to the bonds and lands as provided in the law; and hence it was not a question that properly should be submitted to Congress whether they had legally under the laws of California made an assignment of a franchise to another company or not. If they have the right under the law, and have made the assignment in pursuance of law, and the assignee shall construct the work in accordance with the provisions of the law, then no parties will be damaged; but this Senate and Congress cannot know what the character of that contract is.

This question was examined when I was present, by the Pacific Railroad Committee of the Senate. I think it has been examined by no member of that committee. They took the statements of the Senator from California as true; and I would not call in question his veracity. He doubtless believes they are true; and if true, the passage of this part of the bill is totally unimportant to him; it will not facilitate the work in the least. But if this assignment is not in conformity to law, and has not been made to responsible persons, a ratification of that assignment by Congress will shift the responsibility from the company that has acquired the franchise from the Government, will release them from all responsibility, and thus endanger, as I believe, the final success of the work.

The Senator himself says that it will effect no good unless it may be to increase the credit of the assignees in the market. Their credit must be good enough if the people of whom they borrow know them to be valid. This Government gave the franchise to a company, the character of which they are supposed to examine, and with which they are supposed to be satisfied; and there I am disposed to let the matter rest. If they have the right under the law, as I am disposed to believe they have, to make the assignment, it will stand; it will be binding on the parties; the contract between the Government and the original company will still be valid; and they can offer the bonds and the land under the law if this part of the bill should not be passed. The organ of the Senate and of the House heretofore, after having carefully examined the whole subject, reported against it, and that report having been ratified by the Senate and House, it seems to me it is not right to spring the question on the Senate at this period; and when a Senator rises in his seat and says he wants to examine the bill with a view to present amendments, to cut off the opportunity of doing so and compel a vote on the question that Congress has deliberately decided against, I think is unprecedented in legislation, and improper.

Mr. McDUGALL. I think the Senator from Iowa is somewhat wrong. My colleague and myself differed during the last Congress on this subject, and the Senator from Iowa and myself agreed. We agreed in this, that the original bill contemplated building a road to the city of San Francisco as the terminus in the West. He thought, as I thought, that the original bill, passed in the first instance—he having taken a large interest in it, and being a member of the committee—covered the whole line of road from here to San Francisco. The fifty miles of road to which my colleague refers was built upon the faith of that legislation as much as any one line of road in Kansas or California; but the right of the parties building that fifty miles and completing it and running it, which was first done as part of the Pacific railroad, to the privileges of our legislation was denied, and is ignored now. It was ignored at the last session. My colleague opposed the proposition. I insisted that the benefits of the law should be extended to San Francisco. I suppose that now they have no chance of the benefit of this law, although they built the first fifty miles of the Pacific railroad. But the road involved here has not been constructed, and it has to go through mountain passes. If there is a doubt about the right of these persons to enjoy the benefits of the law, as a doubt has been made about the right of the persons who built the first fifty miles to obtain money from the Government or to obtain its support, it will be almost impossible to build the road. The support of the Government in building the line from San José to Sacramento is as essential as it is in going across the Rocky mountains; for we have to cross the Coast range, a heavy mountain barrier. I think the Senator from Iowa is mistaken about this matter. It charges the Government with nothing, and he admits it charges the Government with nothing, but is only giving character to an operation that is sanctioned, and which he admits is no damage to the Government.

Mr. CONNESS. I wish simply to say that in all essential particulars the statements made by my friend from Iowa are not correct. The assignment of which he speaks, which was not approved, is not before the Senate. An assignment made under the recent act is before the Senate. It is not correct that no member of the committee has examined this assignment. I have examined every paper connected with the assignment, and there is nobody released by the adoption of this ratification. The Central Pacific Railroad Company are held bound by it. The Western Pacific Railroad Company are held bound by the terms of the assignment, and to all the responsibilities of the Pacific railroad act.

The Senator speaks, or hints, at irresponsible parties engaged in constructing this work. Mr. President, if there are responsible parties engaged anywhere in the construction of the great Pacific railroad it is those who are engaged in it in California. Many miles of that road are now in successful operation. Many more miles, passing through a country presenting the greatest natural difficulties in the world, are in process of construction. These men have put their own capital in it. They have not up to this time drawn a cent of money from the United States in the shape of bonds; and yet they have been operating for nearly nine months past a line of thirty-one miles of that road, finished and completed. There are twenty additional miles in process of completion. They desire now to put men on it over the entire Sierra Nevada mountains. In the mean time they provide that the Western Pacific Company shall engage in constructing the lower link of the road; and in order that the parties that they borrow money of, or seek to negotiate with, may be precluded the necessity of a legal investigation to ascertain whether this assignment is good or not we ask this ratification. I ask for a vote of the Senate on the subject. I am perfectly willing to trust the Senate with it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. HARLAN and Mr. CONNESS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to have the section proposed to be stricken out read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

SEC. 2. And he it further enacted, That the assignment made by the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California to the Western Pacific Railroad Company of said State, of the right to construct all that portion of said railroad and telegraph from the city of San Jose to the city of Sacramento is hereby ratified and confirmed to the said Western Pacific Railroad Company, with all the privileges and benefits of the several acts of Congress relating thereto, and subject to all the conditions thereof: Provided, That the time within which the said Western Pacific Railroad Company shall be required to construct the first twenty miles of their said road shall be one year from the 1st day of July, 1855, and that the entire road shall be completed from San Jose to Sacramento, connecting at the latter point with the said Central Pacific railroad, within four years thereafter.

Mr. HOWARD. This bill was pretty carefully considered by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad only a few days since. They gave their attention to this particular section which it is now moved to strike out. The committee thought it proper to retain the section, and I hope it will not be stricken out. It imposes no additional burden upon the United States. The sole effect of it, as the committee understood it, and which is undoubtedly the case, is a recognition on the part of the United States of the validity of the assignment made by the Central Pacific Railroad Company to the Western Pacific Railroad Company of that State within the last year, and since the close of the last session of Congress. The assignment spoken of in the bill is not the assignment to which the honorable Senator from Iowa alludes, as I understand it, and as I believe to be the fact. The sole object of this clause is to preclude the United States henceforth from making any objection to that assignment, which was made during the last summer, and consequently to increase somewhat the credit of the company, for the very reason that the United States waives all objection for the future to an assignment made by one railroad corporation to another. It forecloses all dispute and litigation as to the validity and legality of that assignment; and that is all there is about it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 5, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cowan, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, and Ten Eyck—5.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Hays, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougal, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Harding, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Richardson, Riddle, Saulsbury, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wilkinson—16.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. With the consent of the chairman of the committee I move to insert, in line seven, after the word "company" the words "the Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division," simply for greater certainty in stating the different companies.

Mr. HOWARD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HARLAN. How will it read then?

Mr. BROWN. "Union Pacific Railroad Company and Union Pacific Railroad Company, eastern division."

Mr. CONNESS. It is simply giving the full name of the company.

Mr. POMEROY. That is the name now, but it is not the name known in the old bill. It is known in that bill as the Leavenworth, Pawnee, and Western Railroad Company.

Mr. BROWN. This will simply give the full name of the company.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. HARLAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to another important feature of this bill, changing the character of the law as it now exists. Under existing laws any one of these companies, after building twenty miles of their road or roads, may draw the number of bonds indicated in the law, varying from sixteen to forty-eight thousand dollars per mile, and may obtain title to all the land opposite to and continuous with the completed sections, and no more. This bill provides that any one of these companies may issue and sell its bonds for the construction of one hundred miles of road in advance of any completed section. On the more difficult part of this work such a sale would amount to more than four million dollars. All the bonds that are issued under the law as it now exists become a prior lien on the work to the Government bonds; that is, the law subordinates the lien that it has on the road on account of the bonds that it proposes to issue to an equal number of bonds to be issued by any one of these companies on a completed section. This bill authorizes the issuing in some cases of more than four million dollars in advance of the completion of any section of the road. I do not deem it wise, and therefore shall vote against the bill.

The principle that controlled the committee of the Senate at the last session of this body, and also the joint committee of conference of the two Houses, was to grant this subsidy in land and money only as the road progressed, believing that if any one of these companies had not sufficient pecuniary responsibility to construct twenty miles of its road the Government ought not to be complicated with its credit; that it should indorse the credit of the Government only so far forth as it showed its capacity to build twenty miles of road from time to time. This bill throws that matter all open, and will enable any company to whom any one of these companies may transfer their franchise, whether they had any pecuniary responsibility or not, to go kiting in the market. I do not think that ought to be passed. I think it will endanger the rapid construction of the work.

I know that the chairman of the committee and the other members of the committee believe that it will facilitate the construction of the work; and that probably would be true if these companies were all valid companies in a pecuniary point of view, and earnestly engaged in the construction of the work; but I suppose everybody knows that these railroad companies engage in these works for the purpose of making money; and whenever they believe they can sell their franchise and make more money than they can by retaining it they do transfer their rights; and every one of these companies, if this bill should pass, is authorized to do so by the bill now pending. It does not seem to me to be wise. I suppose that something in legislation ought to be considered as having been settled. The railroad committee of this Senate and of the other House, and the joint committee, labored for weary days and weeks in maturing the bill that became a law at the last session. They did it with the idea of affording aid to valid companies that have the capacity to raise means to build at least twenty miles of the line of the road for which they asked aid. This bill proposes to unsettle that and allow them to go kiting in the market with their bonds, in advance of having constructed any part of their work.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will listen to my explanation in reply to the objection of the honorable Senator. For the purpose of casting reflection upon these companies, for it must be for that purpose, or it has no purpose, he says that we are to enable them to go "kiting in the market." That is the flippant language of the honorable Senator applied to men engaged, ay, as earnestly engaged, in the performance and carrying out of the greatest work of this age as the Senator can be in the great work of legislation.

Now, let me make a simple explanation to the Senate, and I ask the attention of Senators, for I will not occupy it long. The law as it stands provides that when each company engaged in constructing the Pacific railroad shall have built and completed and put in running order twenty miles of their road, they may then issue a proportionate amount of their bonds for those twenty miles of road, and they may, in addition, draw from the Government its bonds for that twenty miles of road. Let me show you the operation of it in crossing the great Sierra Nevada mountains. Thirty-one miles of the road from Sacramento eastward toward those mountains and among their lower ranges of hills, are already constructed. They are now engaged in constructing an additional section of twenty miles. Although they have invested a vast amount of capital, more than four million dollars, in the construction of this section of the road, they cannot obtain any further means to go forward beyond that point. Is it wise to refuse them the privilege of issuing their bonds so that they may at once let out contracts for the grading of the entire distance to the line of the State of Nevada? Under the law they are restricted to the construction of twenty miles before they can issue a dollar of their own bonds. What is the condition of the State of Nevada? They are paying $12,000,000 annually for the produce and machinery hauled upon wheels over the Sierra Nevada mountains. The amount of freight that is paid upon that would yield a profit to the railroad company, if completed, that would make it one of the most profitable railroads in the world. Now, shall these companies be debarred from the issuance of their bonds so that they may let out contracts for the whole line of the road, and thus complete the road over that great natural barrier at the earliest possible moment of time; nay, before they are required to do it by this act, for it is their determination to construct it at the earliest moment? Nor does it, as the honorable Senator says, increase the obligations of the Government one cent. I hope that we shall get a vote on the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I wish to inquire of the Senator if this bill applies to any other than that portion of the country between California and Nevada.

Mr. CONNESS. It does; and the Senator who objects to it aided in obtaining an amendment so as to make it apply to the other roads.

Mr. GRIMES. It applies to the whole length of the road?

Mr. CONNESS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to ask the Senator one question: whether we are to understand that this is an authority to issue bonds of the company in addition to those to be issued by the law, or whether it calls for the issue of Government bonds.

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir; their own bonds. The Government does not issue any until the road is completed.

Mr. MORRILL. Does it give any right to any additional issue of Government bonds in addition to the law of last session?

Mr. CONNESS. Not a cent. It only authorizes them to issue their own bonds in advance of the time fixed in the law of last year.

Mr. MORRILL. I understood the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] to say as much as that.

Mr. HOWARD. I beg to assure my friend from Maine that the rights of the Government are left precisely the same as under the former act.

Mr. MORRILL. Allow me to ask what is the difference between the present and the former act.

Mr. HOWARD and Mr. CONNESS. Nothing in that respect.

Mr. COWAN. In what respect is it?

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to have the chairman explain precisely the alteration which is contemplated by the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to make the explanation?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. CONNESS. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio to allow us to dispose of this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would not give way under any consideration for any business. This bill has consumed the morning hour.

Mr. CONNESS. I ask the Senator from Maine to take my word in the premises that the Government bonds are not required to be issued one hour in advance of what they were required under the other act, and not one dollar extra. I ask for a vote.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope the Senator will give us a vote.

Mr. HOWARD. We have nothing further to say, and I hope the vote will be taken.

Mr. BROWN. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio to allow us to take a vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Chair will put the question. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the resolution of the Senate to suspend the 16th and 17th joint rules of the two Houses for the residue of the session.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 535) to further regulate the appointment of admirals and for the appointment of certain volunteer officers to the regular Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 605) to increase the pay of midshipmen and others;

A bill (H. R. No. 800) to establish the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate;

A bill (H. R. No. 801) to amend certain acts relating to the naval service, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 803) to revive in part the act approved March 3, 1857, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending 30th of June, 1858; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 176) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance to Paul S. Forbes $250,000 additional out of the sum to be paid him under his contract for building a steam screw sloop-of-war.

LOAN BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill now before the Senate, which is the tax bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Pending that bill, and without intending to displace it, I ask leave to report from the Committee on Finance the bill (H. R. No. 772) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, without amendment; and I ask the consent of the Senate to put it on its passage.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to borrow, from time to time, on the credit of the United States, in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized, any sums, not exceeding in the aggregate $600,000,000, and to issue therefor bonds or Treasury notes of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe; and so much as may be issued in bonds are to be of denominations not less than fifty dollars, and may be made payable at any period not more than forty years from date of issue, or may be made redeemable, at the pleasure of the Government, at or after any period not less than five years nor more than forty years from date, or may be made redeemable and payable as may be expressed upon their face; and so much as may be issued in Treasury notes may be made convertible into any bonds authorized by this act, and may be of such denomination, not less than fifty dollars, and bear such dates, and be made redeemable or payable at such periods as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury may be deemed expedient. The interest on such bonds is to be payable semi-annually; and on Treasury notes authorized by this act the interest may be made payable semi-annually, or annually, or at maturity; and the principal or interest, or both, may be made payable in coin or in other lawful money; but the rate of interest on any such bonds or Treasury notes, when payable in coin, is not to exceed six per cent. per annum; and when not payable in coin is not to exceed seven and three tenths per cent. per annum; and the rate and character of interest are to be expressed on all such bonds or Treasury notes; and the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, is to be so construed as to authorize the issue of bonds of any description authorized by this act. Any Treasury notes or other obligations, bearing interest, issued under any act of Congress, may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, and with the consent of the holder, be converted into any description of bonds authorized by this act; and the bonds so authorized are to be considered a part of the amount of $600,000,000 authorized by this bill.

The second section authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of any of the bonds or other obligations issued under this act, either in the United States or elsewhere, in such manner, and at such rates, and under such conditions as he may think advisable, for coin, or for other lawful money of the United States, or for any Treasury notes, certificates of indebtedness, or certificates of deposit, or other representatives of value, which have been or may be issued under any act of Congress, and at his discretion to issue bonds or Treasury notes authorized by this act for any requisitions for materials or supplies which shall have been made by the appropriate Department or offices upon the Treasury of the United States, on receiving notice in writing through the Department or office making the requisition that the owner of the claim for which the requisition is issued desires to subscribe for an amount of loan that will cover the requisition or any part of it; and all bonds or other obligations issued under this act are to be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority.

The third section applies to all the bonds and other obligations issued under this act, all the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide ways and means for the support of the Government, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, in relation to forms, inscriptions, devices, and the printing, attestation, sealing, signing, and counterfeiting, with such others as are applicable; but nothing contained in this act is to be construed as authorizing the issue of legal-tender notes in any form; and a sum not exceeding one per cent. of the amount of bonds and other obligations issued under this act is appropriated to pay the expense of preparing, issuing, and disposing of them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. McDougall. I desire simply to remark that this bill is one of the same quality with the various bills that have been introduced for the purpose of carrying on the finances of the Government since the commencement of this war. It does not indicate any policy. It is a loose measure, evidently framed by one who did not know what he or what the act itself proposed to accomplish. It is one of an entire class belonging to the legislation of this war with regard to our finances. It is time that this should be corrected. I have not the opportunity of course to correct it; I am not in any position even to advise upon it; but I wish to remark that this is false legislation and false policy.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am of course not only willing but desirous to pass all bills necessary to support the Government; but I should like to be informed by the chairman what will be the effect of this bill upon the bonds or notes to be issued. It provides in the third section that the bonds or notes to be issued are not to be legal-tender notes; but then it gives an authority to issue notes and bonds to any amount exceeding fifty dollars. If they are issued in the form of bonds or in the form of notes, it seems to me it will swell the currency very considerably; and if it does so, and our national banks exert the whole authority with which they are invested, we shall have a much more inflated currency than we have now. The effect will be still more to depreciate the true legal standard of value. I do not know whether it will have that effect or not, or whether it was designed to have that effect or not; but it seems to me it will have that effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. I made the only statement here the other night that is necessary in regard to this bill. It is a bill very much like the last loan bill that we passed authorizing the loan of money. It authorizes a loan of $600,000,000, either in the form of Treasury notes or in the form of bonds. It contains the same provisions almost as the last loan, except that the currency interest under this bill will continue for five years instead of for three years. The proviso to the third section was inserted to prevent this money from bearing the legal-tender clause. It is issued as an ordinary loan. I do not know that any statement that I could make could make the language any clearer than the bill itself. It is a simple continuation of the present system of borrowing money upon bonds and Treasury notes, leaving the character of the securities almost entirely in the discretion of the Secretary from time to time. There are one or two other provisions in it, but they are provisions of obvious meaning and obvious import. One is to authorize creditors of the Government, in case they desire it, to receive these bonds at par in payment of their debts. That provision is intended to save the circumlocution of selling the bonds for money and paying the money. I do not know that there is any other provision in the bill that is new, or that is not already contained in our previous loan laws.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think there is very great importance in the suggestion which the Senator from Maryland has brought to the notice of the Senate. I do not know that it will do any good, and hardly expect that it will, to make any suggestion in regard to this issuing of more Treasury notes; but it is manifest that the effect of this bill, notwithstanding the clause in the last section which declares that the Treasury notes shall not be a legal tender, will be to swell the volume of the currency, if the Secretary thinks proper, $600,000,000 beyond what it now is, by issuing Treasury notes bearing interest at six per cent. I should be glad to see stricken out of this bill all about the issue of interest-bearing Treasury notes. I have in my pocket now a fifty-dollar Treasury note drawing compound interest at six per cent. It has run some eight or ten months. I received it in the ordinary transaction of business. It has some two years or more to run. These notes pass just the same as if they were not paying interest at all; and what is the effect of that? If you got out $600,000,000 of them, the Government of the United States would be paying $36,000,000 in interest for nothing. I would just as soon have that note without interest as with it.

Mr. COWAN. So would anybody else.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Who then does gain by issuing these interest-bearing Treasury notes? Does anybody gain, unless it may be some capitalists, brokers, and money-jobbers, who, as my friend from Maine [Mr. FARWELL] says, instead of retaining in their vaults the legal-tender Treasury notes with which to meet their obligations, pay them out, swell the volume of the currency by paying them out, and retain in their place these interest-bearing notes; so that the effect of it is to swell the currency to the same extent as if it were really so many more greenbacks issued. I am informed by my friend from Maine that these notes which draw five per cent. interest, after running six, eight, or ten months, are gathered up by the brokers, and the Government then takes them back, allowing the interest upon them; and I believe one of the reports from the Treasury Department shows that the Government of the United States has drawn in several millions—perhaps six millions at that time—of its legal-tender non-interest-bearing notes and paid out legal-tender interest-bearing notes.

Mr. COWAN. That is the intention.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is the intention, says the Senator from Pennsylvania. If that be the intention, to take up the greenbacks, as they are familiarly known, upon which no interest is paid, and to substitute for them, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says, another greenback that draws interest, I say it is just paying out of the Treasury of the United States the interest upon the amounts for nothing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not like to hear a statement of this kind made upon a declaration that was not overheard, and which is misunderstood. The legal tenders are sometimes withdrawn and non-interest-bearing legal tenders are issued in their place; but the Senator makes it just the reverse. I do not know what authority there can be for such a statement. The Government has in some cases received these five per cent. legal tenders, and then issued in their place seven and three tenths non-interest-bearing legal-tender notes.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is said that the proof of the pudding is in the eating of it. I have here a fifty-dollar Treasury note, marked on the back, "By act of Congress this note is a legal tender for fifty-dollars." The note is dated June 10, 1864, and it reads in this way: "The United States will pay to the bearer fifty dollars with interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum compounded semi-annually." Here is a legal tender drawing six per cent. per annum, compound interest, issued in the place, as I understand, of a legal tender that did not draw interest, and received in the ordinary course of business. Now, sir, I say that the Government of the United States throws away the interest upon this note. It is thrown away by me. I expect to have to use it to pay my bills before I get out of the city; and I only expect to get fifty dollars for it. The Senator from Ohio will not give me any more for it, nor will anybody else. It has been running since the 10th day of June, 1864; but I would just as soon have now the fifty dollars. It is that sort of legislation that I object to; and I would like to strike out of this bill all that is in it in regard to Treasury notes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him whether the indorsement upon that note makes it a legal tender?

Mr. TRUMBULL. This is a legal-tender note.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does it make it a legal tender for more than fifty dollars?

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; it is a legal tender for only fifty dollars.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I hope the Senator will frame an amendment such as he suggests, so that we can have the question before us distinctly.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will move to strike out, in the first section, line seven, the words "or Treasury notes," and if that carries I will make a subsequent motion to strike out what follows in regard to the issuing of Treasury notes, so as to make it conform.

Mr. COWAN. The honorable Senator from Illinois will allow me to explain why I understand the old legal-tender notes, the United States notes, are being taken up. They are taken up in exchange for Treasury notes not bearing interest. I do not know that the notes, such as were exhibited by him here, have been exchanged for the old legal-tender issue. The object of the Treasury, as I understand it, is to take in as fast as possible all those issues which were legal tenders.

Now, Mr. President, I do not think there is any danger of increasing the depreciation of the money by increasing its volume; but I think there is danger of the depreciation of the money by increasing the volume in circulation. I think the volume in circulation depends upon the depreciation, and the depreciation does not depend upon the amount in circulation. If the money was good there would be no more of it in circulation than would be needed; and the same law holds good when it is bad. If you go out to buy with gold you only take half the money in your pocket that you would take if you were going to buy with Federal paper; and therefore Federal paper alone being in circulation it is about twice as much as the gold that would otherwise be in circulation, and no more; because no man takes more out to make his purchase than is necessary.

We increase the debt by $600,000,000 by this bill, and in so far we depreciate the currency, just as any man in increasing his debts depreciates his credit. That is the whole effect of it; and I do not think it makes any difference in what shape you issue it, except as to the terms upon which you make your loan. If you can borrow without interest, of course that is far better than to pay interest. If you can get the loan for nothing, it is better that you should take it than pay interest on it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then why change the law? Why issue these instead of legal tenders?

Mr. COWAN. I have been opposed to all schemes for the purpose of substituting any other currency than the one. When your money is made to pass from hand to hand as money it ought not to bear interest. It ought not to bear interest for the very reason given by the Senator from Illinois; that, so far as the people are concerned, the interest amounts to nothing, and it only becomes valuable to those who hoard the notes in the end. These notes will all find their way to banks, brokers, and capitalists, and they will hoard them, and to them the interest becomes valuable; but as regards the people using this money, and with whom it circulates from day to day, this interest is of no account at all. It was upon that principle that I was opposed to the institution of national banks, for this simple reason, that if there was not money enough in circulation already, put out your legal tenders, which you get for nothing, or, if there is money enough in circulation, then you ought not to create any institutions for the purpose of putting out more. It seemed to me that the corollary was inevitable; you could not avoid it; but that thing is done now. I do not think it makes any difference as to the shape of your securities except in so far as the amount of interest you pay; it makes no difference whether you issue them in fives, or tens, or fifties, or hundreds, or thousands, they will not affect the volume of circulation in the least, except in so far as they are affected by depreciating the credit of the Government by increasing its debt.

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion of the honorable Senator from Illinois compels me to make a short statement in regard to this bill which I wished to avoid.

There are two classes of securities now authorized to be issued in the Treasury Department; one, bonds with interest payable in gold, which are generally in large sums; and the extent of which we dare not increase. We have already reached the reasonable maximum of gold interest-bearing bonds; and the general sentiment of Congress, of the people, and of all men familiar with our finances is that it would not now be safe to increase the amount of gold-bearing interest bonds, because the interest is already $56,000,000, and we dare not therefore increase it to any considerable extent. Then how must we borrow this money? We must borrow it on currency bonds, as they are called; that is, bonds the interest of which is payable in currency. The distinction between a bond and a Treasury note is rather nominal than otherwise. The word "bond" is usually applied to a long debt. The shortest bonds run from five to twenty years. We have some running from ten to forty years. The distinction between a bond and a Treasury note is rather nominal than otherwise, and in popular parlance the Treasury note applies to a short bond, or a bond running one, two, three, or four years.

Mr. TRUMBULL. And which circulates as money.

Mr. SHERMAN. Not necessarily. I will draw the distinction.

That is the real distinction between a Treasury note and bond. There is none in law; they are all bonds in law; that is, all obligations to pay in future a certain sum of money. There are two classes of Treasury notes. There are the legal-tender non-interest-bearing Treasury notes which the Senator speaks of, and they are discontinued in a measure. That is one class. Those are the United States notes, the common currency of the country. Then there is another class that is now being taken daily, and the people are absorbing from four to five millions every day, and they are the seven and three tenths Treasury notes. They are issued in small sums so as to enable the poorest people who have any earnings or savings whatever to invest them in Government securities. They are issued in the form of Treasury notes from fifty dollars up to $500 and $1,000. Under the law of last winter they only ran for three years, and for that three years the interest was payable in currency. Under this bill they are to run for five years with interest payable in currency.

I am as much opposed to issuing Treasury notes or bonds as anybody can be; but we must borrow money and upon the best terms and conditions we can. We do not find it to our interest to issue any more bonds with interest payable in gold. We must, therefore, issue Treasury notes which will mature in a short time; and I hope when they mature our financial condition will be very different from what it is at present, and that then all these Treasury notes may be funded into a long bond with a small rate of interest, payable in gold. That would probably be the result of it. In the mean time we must borrow very large sums, and we must borrow it in the form in which we can get it from the people without paying interest in gold. The result is that we have been compelled to resort to Treasury notes running for a short time.

Now in regard to the compound-interest Treasury notes, I agree with the Senator from Illinois that that is not a good form of security; that, issued in the form in which he presents it, it has a tendency to inflate the currency for a short time, and for a short time only. Let me tell him that after six months or a year he will not find a single dollar of the class of notes that he has exhibited here but what will be hoarded by those who wish to look to the interest. That is the theory upon which they were issued. For a short time they do inflate the currency; but every month retires more and more of them; and when the interest has accumulated to the amount of six per cent. they will be retired and held as an investment. Why? Because the interest is not payable until the end of three years. In the mean time they are only a legal tender for the amount of the principal; and therefore if a man pays out one of those notes he loses the interest. My impression is that no more of that class of securities will be issued, although the Secretary of the Treasury has power to do it. The class of securities upon which the Government must now mainly rely are the seven and three tenths Treasury notes. They are now absorbed at the rate of four or five millions a day, more than enough to carry on the operations of the Government. So rapid is their absorption that the Government will soon be enabled to pay off the unpaid requisitions and leave an ample fund to carry on the operations of the war.

The Senator says that the issuing of these Treasury notes will inflate the currency. Certainly it will. Any kind of bond or debt will inflate the currency to a certain extent; but we cannot avoid that. That is one of the inevitable effects of our condition. On the other hand, if we should issue any portion of this $600,000,000 without interest in the manner he proposes, the immediate effect would be largely to inflate the currency; and why? A legal-tender note without interest goes from hand to hand and it is of no value whatever except as a currency. No man will hold on to it for the purpose of saving the interest. It is a mere currency, a mere inflation of the currency; and therefore it is that I am in favor of the provision attached to the end of this bill that there shall be no more legal tenders, and if any notes are issued they shall not be a legal tender either for principal or interest. Under the operations of this bill no more of the notes similar to the one exhibited by the Senator can be issued, because those notes are legal-tender notes for the principal. Under this bill no legal-tender notes can be issued either for principal or interest.

Mr. COLLAMER. Is that in the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; that is the very point we are discussing.

This bill has been very maturely considered. We have had it pending in the Committee on Finance for a long time and have talked about it. We have not been able to produce it here because we had to await the action of the House. The bill as it now stands meets the approbation of the present Secretary of the Treasury, and I believe also the approbation of the gentleman supposed to be the future Secretary of the Treasury, and therefore I think it would be very unwise for us to change it. If the Senator's motion should prevail (which I do not think there is any danger of) as a matter of course the Government would have no resort except to issue bonds, and then we must either adopt a new form of bonds and pay interest of our bonds in currency, or we must issue them in the usual form, with interest payable in gold.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Have we no bonds bearing interest payable in currency?

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. The interest on all our bonds is paid in gold.

Mr. JOHNSON. This bill authorizes the Secretary to issue currency-interest bonds.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly it does; so that the motion of the honorable Senator would substantially leave the Secretary no resource except to issue bonds, which usually are an instrument running a long period of time, with interest payable either in gold or paper. I think therefore the Senate had better take the bill as it is, without any amendment, especially in a matter so vital as this.

Mr. McDougall. This measure is objectionable for the reason that it complicates our financial system. I undertake to say that the chairman of the Committee on Finance cannot enumerate the various kinds of securities that have been issued by this Government since the war. I undertake to say there are but few persons in Wall street that can furnish with any promptness the various different classes of securities that have been issued since this war. We were informed at the commencement of the war that if we would adopt a fixed financial policy we could have all the money we required when we had our business on a gold basis, and it could have been done. I was then on the Committee on Finance, and I informed the Secretary of the Treasury that that was so, and he admitted it to be so; but we were not ready for it. We have been trying expedient after expedient, and changing our expedients without a policy; and now this is another change, authorizing again, as the chairman remarks, a new form of Government bonds payable in currency; that is, using our credit to pay our debts, and then our credit to pay our interest—a thing false in all political economy. What are our long bonds worth payable in our currency? They do not command any credit whatever; and then we are to issue an interest-bearing currency, for this amounts to a currency. That interest has to be paid, and it has to be paid ultimately in money.

Now, although I once did say in the Senate that paper made by the Government was money, I made a vast mistake when I said it; and I want to take it back now. I undertook to prove it, and I did prove it by the books; but it was a mistake. I did not know it at the time, or I would not have said it. It can be technically and historically proved to be money, but it is not money in fact.

This complication of our financial system commenced by having in the Treasury Department a gentleman of eminent ability in his way, but altogether ignorant of organizing finances, who worked by expedients from day to day; and it is being continued without any organized system. The present Secretary of the Treasury, (for whom no member on this floor has more respect than I have,) when he went to New York, on entering his office, to borrow fifty or seventy-five millions, on being inquired of by the spokesman of the gentlemen of finance of New York, whom he had called together as to what was his policy, said he had no policy. Sir, shall we never have a policy, or are we unequal to a financial policy in this country?

Here is another complication of the matter. We now have a system of laws as difficult to tread as the labyrinth of Thebes. I undertake to say that there is not a person, unless he is a man of great skill and belongs to the money markets, that understands what our securities are, and what their respective values are, and how they can be respectively applied. We are wandering from obscurity into darkness. I protest against this kind of legislation. I think the Senator from Illinois is right, and the Senator from Pennsylvania was right in his argument; but his argument proves the unsoundness of this proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. POMEROY in the chair.) The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Illinois in section one, line seven, after the word "bonds" to strike out the words "or Treasury notes."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move to strike out all of the second section after the word "thereof" in the following words:

And all bonds or other obligations issued under this act shall be exempt from taxation by or under State or municipal authority.

I presume the Senate will not agree in the view I take of this matter, but I feel it to be my duty to present the proposition to the body. I understand that the Government securities issued up to this time are exempt from State and local taxation. I am not going to discuss the question of the policy at all; but I think it must be known to Senators that there is a growing discontent in the country at the fact that so large a portion of the wealth of the country is exempt from taxation. In my judgment there is no feature in our policy that contributes so much to excite a spirit in favor of repudiation as this very provision. It may be that we shall go through this whole financial controversy, that we must meet in the future, without any serious effort in the country at repudiation. I hope so; but if we do, I think we must contemplate it now. The men who buy these bonds are generally men of great wealth. I know that it is a favorite remark of the chairman of the Committee on Finance that these bonds are purchased by poor people all over the country. That is to some extent true; but it is but as a drop in the ocean. The great body of this capital will find its way into the hands of men of large capital and into the vaults of the banks. The people will constantly see these men going to the Treasury and receiving their interest in gold, now equal to twelve per cent. per annum, and paying nothing back; and while upon the ordinary labor and wealth of the State there is the burden of supporting the State and local governments and authorities, this large capital of the country is exempt from this burden. I think we ought not to go further in this direction. For these considerations I have proposed the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. This question has been settled since the foundation of the Government. The first loan bill that was framed after the organization of the Government contained this provision, and it has been continued in every loan bill from that day to this. It is manifest that if the Senator's amendment be adopted these bonds cannot be sold. All those heretofore issued have been free from tax. If those that are to be hereafter issued should be subject to tax they could not be sold, and it would defeat the purpose of the law. I do not wish to prolong the argument. We are already committed to this policy. Without going into the merits of it, I simply ask that the question may be taken.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HENDERSON. I desire to state that I shall give my support to this bill simply because at this stage of the session I do not see that I can get anything better. We have not time to enter into the necessary discussion to get up a bill that would suit my views; nor do I suppose, if we had the time, that I could get one to suit me. I shall have to give up my own opinions and views on this subject and do something in order to provide the ways and means necessary to sustain the Government; and I desire to state that it is only that that induces me to support the bill in its present shape.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLARK. I submit the following report from the committee of conference on the legislative appropriation bill:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill of the House (No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

DANIEL CLARK,
IRA HARRIS,

J. W. NESMITH,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN A. KASSON,
H. WINTER DAVIS,
ROBERT MALLORY,
Managers on the part of the House.

I desire to explain to the Senate the difficulty we have in coming to an agreement, and then to take some action in the Senate upon the point. This bill, it will be seen, is the legislative appropriation bill from the House. When it came to the Senate from the House, the Senate attached to it the deficiency bill and returned it to the House. When it went back to the House, the House amended the deficiency bill by putting upon it this provision:

And the sum of $40,000 is hereby appropriated, to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of paying for stationery, papers, and such other expenses as the House may have directed or shall direct: Provided, That no part of said sum shall be applied to a permanent addition to the salaries of their clerks or other employees.

They also put upon the bill a large number of amendments, making an appropriation of over a million dollars as additional legislation. This provision to which I have called the attention of the Senate is a provision making an appropriation of $40,000 to the contingent fund of the House for the purpose of paying the additional compensation to the employees of the House voted at the last session.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What is the number of that amendment?

Mr. CLARK. It does not appear to be numbered. It is perhaps the second amendment in the bill. The committee of conference did not feel themselves at liberty to depart from the action of the Senate, and to agree to an amendment making an appropriation for that purpose. I may state to the Senate that upon all other matters contained in the bill the committee could arrive at a conclusion. They went so far as to see that they could arrive at a conclusion satisfactory to themselves, and one which they think would be satisfactory to the Senate, so that the bill could pass; but we disagreed upon this point, and did not come to a definite conclusion upon any other, but only acted informally upon them. I desire now the instruction of the Senate, at this late day in the session, as to what the committee shall do in this matter. If it be the pleasure of the Senate to recede from its former action, and to instruct or direct or intimate to the committee that the Senate will agree to an appropriation of this kind, or advise it, then we can come to a satisfactory adjustment. If they do not advise or consent to a proposition of that kind, I can only say that the committee of conference will disagree. The Senator from Oregon, [Mr. NESMITH,] who was upon the committee, I think has a motion prepared to submit to the Senate on the subject.

Mr. NESMITH. If the Senator will allow me, I will move that the bill with the amendments in disagreement between the two Houses be re-committed to the committee of conference with instructions to agree upon an amendment in the following words:

And the sum of $43,000 is hereby appropriated, to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of paying such contingent expenses as may be directed by resolution of the House.

It will be observed by the terms of this proposition that it is left entirely to the discretion of the House in disbursing its contingent fund without reference to previously existing laws. I myself would be willing to vote for the repeal of the law of 1853. I think the contingent fund ought to be under the control of the two Houses respectively. The House committee manifested a disposition to yield any controverted point except this; and at this late hour of the session there is great danger of losing the bill. I think it is as small a concession as the Senate can probably make, and I think it should be made. I was for it on the committee of conference. I submit the question to the Senate. If they concur in this proposition, there will be no trouble about a concurrence in all the other amendments.

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator should state, or I will state, that that proposition would allow the money to be paid as the House desire to pay it.

Mr. NESMITH. That is my understanding, and it is drawn for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK. This resolution will pro tanto repeal the law of 1853, and permit the House to make such disbursements of the contingent fund as they may see proper by resolution. I will say further, while I am up, that there is no difficulty about the additional $5,000 that is appropriated by this proposition. The old appropriation was $38,000, and this is $43,000; but the additional $5,000 is needed to pay for stenographers and other purposes on which no question arises.

Mr. SUMNER. Is the motion of the Senator from Oregon the proper motion to be made in order to accomplish his purpose? As I understand, he moves an amendment to the bill.

Mr. NESMITH. No; this is an instruction to the committee. If the Senate concur in this instruction, the question will all be settled. That is the point for the Senate to determine, whether we will instruct the committee. With this instruction adopted by the Senate, all grounds of difficulty will be removed and the committee of conference can make a report to the two Houses.

Mr. CLARK. The difficulty is that after the very emphatic expression of the Senate three several times, the committee did not feel at liberty to depart from that action without instruction from the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Then I understand the committee do not make a final report now.

Mr. CLARK. No, sir; the motion is recommended with instructions.

Mr. SUMNER. It seems to me that is very proper, and I hope it will prevail.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the instruction.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the effect of that instruction to authorize the House to disregard, except under the particular circumstances of this case, the act of Congress of 1858?

Mr. SHERMAN. It will repeal the act of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. I want to know whether it repeals the act of Congress altogether, or whether it repeals it so far as this particular appropriation is concerned.

Mr. COLLAMER. It does not do either.

Mr. JOHNSON. No; it does not do either as I see. There are circumstances connected with this matter—as I collect from what I have seen in the debates in the other House, and to which, I suppose, it is proper to advert—that have induced the House to think that somehow or other they are obliged in point of honor to make this allowance to their employes. I do not know but that they were of opinion that there was nothing in the act of Congress which prohibited it; but certainly they were of opinion that they had a right, either with or against the act of Congress, to make that appropriation, and they have steadily adhered to it throughout. What I should desire, however, would be to have the difference between the two Houses accommodated without its being done in such a way as to repeal the provisions of the act which has created the difficulty; and I therefore asked that that instruction should be read, in order to ascertain whether it does repeal or not the act of Congress except pro hac vice. I will ask the honorable member who offered it whether he proposes by that section that the House may appropriate hereafter just as much as they please out of their contingent fund.

Mr. NESMITH. I suppose this amendment only refers to the appropriation in the bill for the next fiscal year. It will have no force beyond that. It only applies to this single appropriation.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I desire to offer the following amendment as a substitute:

That the committee be authorized to agree to a provision for the payment of twenty per cent. additional compensation to the officers of both Houses for the present session.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. I see no objection to the instruction proposed by the honorable Senator from Oregon, for it goes upon the ground the House of Representatives need an addition to their contingent fund; and if they do, I do not think the Senate should stand in the way of a sufficient appropriation to provide the necessary amount. That is all that the instruction to the committee will do. There will be time enough to meet other exigencies when they arise. If the House undertake to apply this money in the manner they have at former sessions, we shall be in the same condition, as between the two Houses, that we are in now; for this money cannot, by law, be applied to the increase of the salaries of the employes of the House. Still, that is a matter which we need not anticipate. I should be entirely in favor of agreeing to the proposition and giving the instruction to the committee which is suggested by the honorable Senator from Oregon, if it goes as I understand it, simply upon the ground that the House need an addition to their present contingent fund to meet their ordinary legal expenses; and if so, certainly we ought in right and justice to vote it.

Mr. HALE. The suggestions of the Senator from Connecticut would be very well if we did not all know better; if we did not know that it is to meet expenses that are illegal and that are expressly prohibited by law, and upon which the Senate have already voted three times.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Senator will allow me, as I understand it, this money cannot be appropriated for such a purpose, because by law neither House can use its contingent fund to pay an increase of salary to their employes. The addition of $40,000 to the contingent fund of either House for their legal contingent expenses will not alter that law at all, as I view it. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire may, of course, understand it differently, and his may be the better judgment, but I submit the increase of the amount of the contingent fund will not authorize either House to apply it otherwise than as by law they may now apply it. That is the point I make; and that, it seems to me, is all there is now involved.

Mr. HALE. That is all true; every word of it.

Mr. FOSTER. And (if the Senator in his courtesy will allow me one word more) if the House undertake to apply this money to the payment of their employes the additional sums which they have previously attempted to pay them, the accounting officers of the Treasury will not pay it.

Mr. HALE. In other words, the Senate will expect a single accounting officer of the Treasury to maintain the standard of public virtue and public law after the Senate has caved in. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all; there is no caving in about this.

Mr. HALE. Every word the Senator has said is true; but still it does not alter the case. I shall vote "no."

Mr. SUMNER. If the argument of the Senator from Connecticut is correct, will not the Senate vote for this proposition with one understanding of its meaning and the House vote for it with another understanding? Where are the two branches then? In disagreement always. It seems to me this question ought to be settled on grounds which both accept in the same sense.

Mr. FOSTER. The accounting officers will settle that.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator says the accounting officers will settle that. It strikes me we ought not to go forward and make a question for the accounting officers. Let us make our legislation so that it shall not be construed in a double sense.

Mr. CLARK. I desire that this matter shall be understood fully, frankly, and fairly by the Senate. I have not the least doubt in the world that this resolution is drawn for the very purpose of meeting the case of the House employes. We may as well understand it.

Mr. NESMITH. If the Senator will permit me, it was so stated by the House committee.

Mr. CLARK. I am not at liberty to state what was said in the committee, but I can state that my understanding is that the resolution was drawn for that purpose, and if the Senator from Connecticut will pay careful attention to the reading of it, I think he will see a reason for coming to the same conclusion. It is an appropriation of $43,000 to the contingent fund of the House, to be paid out according to a resolution of the House. The House have passed a resolution that it shall be for the additional compensation of their employes; and in my judgment the accounting officer of the Treasury will pay it.

Mr. HOWE. Is that the language?

Mr. CLARK. That is the language according to the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the substitute moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. CLARK. I understand what the question is precisely; but I desire that the Senate shall not turn its attention from what I understand to be fully and frankly the intention of the resolution. As to the other matter, the amendment moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I hope it will not be agreed to; for if it was wrong, as the Senate pronounced three times over, for the House to pay its employes an additional twenty per cent., it would be equally wrong for the Senate to do it; and if we are obliged to yield this point to the House to save the legislative bill, to save the deficiency bill, yes, to save the Government, let us not do it by a wrong on our own part, voting our own employes the same amount.

Mr. MORRILL. It seems to me this is a very clear question, and we might as well look it in the face. The House want $40,000, contrary to law, to appropriate to their employes. We have resisted it until it is obvious that resistance is in vain.

Mr. FOSTER. Not quite.

Mr. MORRILL. Well, it comes to this: we shall lose the appropriation bill if we do not yield.

Mr. FOSTER. That remains to be seen.

Mr. MORRILL. That is pretty apparent. I take it for granted that the House have persisted, intend to insist, admitting it to be illegal. I am going to vote for it under duress; but I prefer to vote it directly. Why not concur directly with the amendment of the House, naming it? Why all this thimble-rigging and this indirection? Why not say that the House put the point directly to us, "We want $40,000; you must yield, or the Government stops; we will not pay the soldiers; we will not perform our duty to the Government?" All argument on the subject has been in vain for the last four or five weeks, and the end will prove so undoubtedly; and upon the confession that that is all there is in it. I am going to vote for it under duress, but I prefer to vote for it direct as the House put it; to concur with the amendment of the House.

Mr. McDUGALL. I should like to ask the Senator wherein will it be an evasion if we agree to the resolution of the Senator from Oregon? I do not understand why it will be an evasion.

Mr. MORRILL. I will answer the Senator from California. I say the appropriation of the $40,000 by the House was an evasion; not that it would be an evasion if we assent to it.

Mr. FARWELL. I do not know but that I shall regret it if a majority of the Senate vote for this resolution. I shall vote against it. I believe that the independence of the two branches of Congress is of more importance than the defeat of the deficiency bill. I believe it would be better for the country and more to the honor of Congress if the President should be compelled to call Congress together again, and the expense of it be paid from the Treasury, than that the independence of either branch should be stricken down and destroyed. The theory of our Government is that the two branches are independent branches; that the assent of each branch of Congress shall be given to every measure. Here comes a measure to us which has not our assent. If we should attach an appropriation as an amendment to an appropriation bill originating in the other House, to which we could not get the willing consent of that House, I should be ashamed of myself to insist upon that appropriation, and to force it through upon the ground that we would stop the wheels of Government unless they yielded their judgments to us. Now, shall the House of Representatives, the popular branch of this Government, say to this Senate, "Unless you yield your judgment we will stop the wheels of Government?" If they do that, I shall feel glad that I am not to be a member of Congress more than three days more. If the thing were reversed, although I might believe it was right, and my pride might concur, I would not stand as the majority of that House stand; and as one member of this Senate I shall vote against yielding this point.

Mr. MORRILL. If it is in order, I move that the Senate recede and concur with the House on this amendment.

Mr. HALE. I am as unfortunately situated as my friend from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] with regard to this matter. I am going to vote under duress; but it is a duress that was devolved upon me when I took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. That holds me in duress and prevents me from voting for this measure which is insisted upon by the House. Sir, this is one of the cases in which the wisdom of the framers of the Constitution is manifested, and if this body give up their own clear convictions expressed over and over again, almost unanimously, on a question of expediency, it seems to me the object of the framers of the Constitution in making two branches of the legislature of the Government of this country will be defeated and destroyed. Here is a proposition which more than nine tenths of the Senate believe to be wrong.

Here is an appropriation bill appropriating one hundred millions, more or less, to pay our soldiers in the field; and the alternative is presented to us that the hundred millions shall not be paid to the soldiers in the field for defending the country unless the Senate will consent to an illegal appropriation of $40,000. I am ready to stand on that issue. I will not do it.

Mr. CLARK. I wish to suggest to my friend from Maine to withdraw his motion to concur with the amendment of the House, because I think it will be better to take the instruction of the Senate to the committee, and let the bill be recommitted to the committee for the purpose of disposing of the other amendments. It would be taken out of the hands of the committee if his motion should prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Maine is not strictly in order at this time, there being two motions pending, one an amendment to the other.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well; I will not press it.

Mr. CLARK. I will say while I am up, lest I should be misunderstood in regard to what I have stated, that I am for standing by the action of the Senate as heretofore expressed. I am not for yielding to the House. I think the judgment of the Senate was right. I am ready to stand by that judgment, and give my vote with it; but as this was a matter of so much consequence, I did not feel that the committee would have discharged its duty until it had brought it to the notice of the Senate for its action.

Mr. COWAN. I think the judgment of the Senate heretofore was right; and if it decides to vote for the proposition of the honorable Senator from Oregon I think that judgment will be right. Both are judgments of the Senate, and both are equally entitled to respect. I intend to vote for this proposition. I do not feel that I have yielded anything, that I have given up anything. It is as much a deliberate judgment in this respect, and as free from duress, as free from any constitutional restraint or obligation, as any one I have formed since I have been here. I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I desire simply to state, and I hope the country will note, the precise issue made here. The House of Representatives, in violation of the law of the country, decided to pay their employes a certain sum of money, twenty per cent. additional to their pay, right in the face of the law of the country. Now they make this proposition to add $40,000 to their contingent fund to enable them to pay their illegal resolution. The Senate, to its honor be it said, resisted that proposition that violated the laws of the country. The House of Representatives, by a small majority—a majority made up of a few supporters of the Administration and gentlemen who in that House are arraigning the Administration every day for its wild extravagances—instruct upon voting this $40,000 to pay for an illegal appropriation.

Mr. NESMITH. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I will state that this $43,000 embraces a great many other items; and even if the House should conclude to pay the extra twenty per cent. to its employes, it will embrace but a very small proportion of this amount, and only a small proportion will go to their officers.

Mr. WILSON. Only $38,000 out of $43,000 will go to their officers; that is all. I will be accurate about it. The rest of it will probably be used for something else. Now the issue is clearly presented of losing important measures to support the Government of the country, to pay the officers and soldiers of the Army and Navy and carry on the expenses of the Government, or yielding this $38,000.

Mr. COWAN. If the Senator will allow me, is he not presuming that the House will appropriate this money illegally? It does not follow now that they are going to pay their employes for past services twenty per cent. in addition. Have we any right to presume they will? I should think, when we show the magnanimous example of yielding in this way, letting them have their own way, and putting it within their control, perhaps they may reconsider their action and not do the thing which we deprecate; at least we have no right to presume they will. I will not presume they will.

Mr. WILSON. I do not presume it, but I know it. They avow it, declare it, proclaim it, in the face of the country and of the world; and I for one do not yield to it. I yield to no such issue; and if those gentlemen who have made it choose to stand by it, let them take the responsibility before the country. That is my position.

Mr. ANTHONY. I hope that the Senate will yield this point to the House; and if the Senator from Oregon had not made the motion, I was prepared to make it myself. I think that the appropriation insisted upon by the House is not according to law; but the House thinks it is according to law, and the House has as good a right to judge as we have. We are not to presume that the other branch of Congress would insist upon an appropriation which it considered contrary to law. The House says its honor is pledged. I think we have done quite sufficient by the way of protest, by the way of recording our judgment; and I hope we shall yield to the House. I differ from my friend from Massachusetts. I hope the country will take no note whatever of this disagreement between the two Houses, and that we shall get out of it as soon as we can; and the best way is to agree to the proposition of the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. When the chairman of the Committee on Finance, some days ago, proposed as an amendment to the legislative appropriation bill the deficiency bill, which I thought an extraordinary proceeding, I suggested that it would bring up this very controversy between the two Houses, and if it came up again I expected to yield to the House; and I now expect to do it. But upon that question I wish to submit one or two remarks.

I do not think the Senator from Massachusetts is justified by the facts in what he said. He said that the position of the House was assumed by a small minority of the Administration party and by the body of the opponents of the Administration in the House uniting upon this proposition. I understand that the position of the House was assumed by a unanimous vote, that the yeas and nays were not called; and I understand that it was taken under the leadership of the distinguished chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and that in pressing his arguments upon the House he used most uncourteous debate toward the Senate. That is all I have to say to the Senator from Massachusetts. He is not justified by the facts in what he says.

I think the real trouble ought to be removed. This is but surface work, in my judgment, getting away from this $38,000. I believe that each House ought to control its own contingent fund. The act of 1858 restricting that control of the contingent fund is an imputation of a want of confidence by Congress upon each branch, and I think it ought to be repealed. If the proposition of the Senator from Oregon is not adopted, I intend to propose the following:

That the bill be recommitted to the committee of conference, with instructions to agree to substitute for the House amendment for the benefit of its employes a section repealing section five of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th June, 1859," approved June 12, 1858.

I believe that it ought to be repealed. We give a contingent fund to the different Departments, and we allow the Secretary of the Department to control that contingent fund, and his decision is conclusive upon it. Why? Because Congress has confidence in his integrity. In the same bill we give a contingent fund to the Senate, and by that law we say we will not trust the Senate to dispose of its own contingent fund. We allow the President of the United States to control millions of a secret service fund, and never allow the expenditure of that money to come to the light of day; and why? Because, upon the theory of our legislation, we treat the President as an honest man, as we treat the heads of Departments in the disposal of their contingent funds, and I say, as a matter of honor, we ought to treat ourselves in the same way. If the proposition of the Senator from Oregon is not agreed to, I expect to offer this, and if it is agreed to we shall have no such discreditable scenes in the future as we have witnessed for these two weeks past. If the House abuses its power over its own contingent fund, it is responsible to the country, as we are. We are not the guardians of the honor of the House; we are not the guardians of the good faith of the House; and I deny that the House has any right to superintend or supervise the expenditure of our own contingent fund.

Mr. JOHNSON. Whether it is advisable to repeal the act of 1858 in the particular suggested by the honorable member from Indiana is perhaps not the question here. I rose to say, however, that I doubt exceedingly whether the instruction proposed by the member from Oregon will settle the difficulty. I understand that instruction as merely adding $43,000 to the contingent fund of the House, and nothing more. What is the effect of increasing the contingent fund? It does not relieve the manner in which the contingent fund is to be used from the restrictions to be found in the act of 1858; and when they go to the Department and ask to be allowed $38,000 for their employes the Department will say that that cannot be done, the act of 1858 is still in force, and by the act of 1858 it is provided that no resolution of one House shall have the effect of appropriating money in the Treasury, although it is there as a part of your contingent fund; the act of 1858, providing that the contingent funds of the two Houses is actually to be disposed of by the joint action of both Houses.

Now in relation to the dispute which exists as between the two Houses, I think that the Senate has gone far enough in expressing its own view of the authority which the House assumed to exercise by the original appropriation of last year; and I submit to Senators whether, although they are all clear about it that the House acted without authority, it is not fair to presume that at the time they made the appropriation they believed they had the authority; and although I am perfectly satisfied in my own mind that they were wrong in that opinion, yet I have lived long enough not to be surprised at the expression of any extraordinary opinion. I have heard just as many extraordinary opinions expressed on the floor of this Senate as this opinion of the House, if they really entertain it, that they had the power thus to appropriate their contingent fund.

But, sir, I rose solely for the purpose of suggesting that it is much better to instruct the committee to agree to the House amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY. I agree entirely with what the Senator from Indiana said, and I would prefer his proposition to that of the Senator from Oregon, although I shall vote for the latter. I do not wish that either House shall exercise any scrutiny over the contingent fund of the other. I think each House can be left to attend to its own contingent fund. If this resolution of the Senator from Oregon does not accomplish the object of allowing the House to pay what it thinks proper to its own employes, then I wish to have it altered so that it shall do so. If it merely increases the contingent fund, but does not allow the contingent fund to be employed for that purpose, then I wish it to be altered so that it shall be understood that we agree to allow the House to pay its own officers whatever it sees fit. It is responsible to the country and its constituents for the manner in which it employs its contingent fund.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment moved by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the motion made by the Senator from Oregon to insert the following as a substitute:

That the committee be authorized to agree to a provision for the payment of twenty per cent. additional compensation to the officers of both Houses for the present session.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the resolution offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not quite understand this proposition. I wish to know if this allows the House to appropriate the money for this purpose.

Mr. CLARK. They are content with it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Very well; then I am, certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. With due deference to the opinion of the Senator from Maryland, I do not think there is a doubt about it. The resolution of the House is substantially engrafted in the law, and this law says $40,000 shall be appropriated to enable the proper officers of the House to pay that resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the proposition again.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, be re-committed to the committee of conference on said bill on the part of the Senate, with instructions to agree to the following item:

And the sum of $43,000 is hereby appropriated, to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of paying such contingent expenses as may be directed by resolution of the House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I offer the following as a substitute ["Oh, no."] Very well; I will withdraw it.

Mr. WILSON. Before the vote is taken I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if there is any provision in this bill giving constructive mileage to the Senate. I see in the public press a statement that in this bill, I think, such a provision has been put into it by the Senate, or in some bill, giving Senators constructive mileage.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no such appropriation and no such provision in this bill or any other. On the contrary, a resolution of that kind was sent to the Committee on Finance and reported back adversely and acted upon. I will ask the Secretary to read the appropriation for mileage, the only reference there is to mileage.

The Secretary read, as follows:

For compensation and mileage of Senators, $247,430.

For compensation and mileage of members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories, $300,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all there is about mileage in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the resolution of instructions offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let us have the yeas and nays on that proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall vote for this proposition. I would have preferred to vote, first, for the proposition of the Senator from Indiana to repeal the law of 1858. That was the first mistake. The second mistake in this transaction, in my judgment, was that the House passed their resolution to pay their employees twenty per cent., and that involved them in difficulty. The third mistake was that the Senate put on the deficiency bill as an amendment to the legislative bill as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was the only way that we could save it. If we had not put the deficiency bill on this bill, the deficiency bill would have been defeated dead; and the deficiency bill is now dead.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think it was a mistake putting the two things together; but no matter. Under the circumstances I shall vote for the proposition of the Senator from Oregon.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Carlile, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Morrill, Nesmith, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Clark, Collamer, Conness, Farwell, Hale, Harlan, Howard, Howe, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, and Wilson—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Chandler, Davis, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Lane of Kansas, Richardson, Saulsbury, Stewart, Wade, and Wilkinson—11.

So the resolution was agreed to; and the bill was recommitted to the committee of conference with instructions to agree to the proposition of the House in relation to its contingent fund.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 390) relating to the postal laws; further insisted upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the Senate, asked a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. COLE, Mr. BROOKS, and Mr. ASHLEY managers at the same on its part.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 795) amendatory of certain acts imposing duties upon foreign importations; and

A bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal the eighth section of an act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July 2, 1864.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILSON. I now desire to make a report of the Committee on Military Affairs, and to ask that it be acted upon at this time. I think the provisions of it will readily be agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I must object to the interposition of other bills until I get the appropriation bills out of the way.

Mr. WILSON. What bill does the Senator want to take up now?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Indian appropriation bill, as it will take so long to enroll. I do not think it will take long to pass it.

Mr. WILSON. If this matter leads to debate I will let it go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. These bills are now in order, and I desire to go on with them. If the Senator will withdraw his motion, perhaps this evening he may have an opportunity of getting his measure considered. I want to get the appropriation bills out of the way.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to report back a bill from the House of Representatives with amendments, and I think the amendments are so plain that we might pass it at once; but as the Senator desires to get up his bill, I will let it pass over and will ask to have it printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That order will be made.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now move that the Senate take up House bill No. 682, the Indian appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 682) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1866.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that it has ever been customary in the Senate to forego the reading of a bill once at length, and I do not like to make such a motion now; but this is a bill fifty-eight pages long, of which at least forty-eight are simply the ordinary recitations that are continued in every Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. FOSTER. It can be done by unanimous consent. It is frequently done in the case of Post Office bills and post-road bills, and matters of that sort.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I trust that the amendments only will be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that the reading of bills has sometimes been dispensed with when they were printed and laid upon the tables of Senators.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will ask if this bill only contains the ordinary appropriations for the Indian service.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be dispensed with if there be no objection; and the amendments reported from the Committee on Finance will be read.

The first amendment of the committee was on page 20, line four hundred and fifty-eight, under the head of "Ottawas and Chippewas of Michigan," after the word "thousand" to strike out "eight" and insert "three;" so that the clause will read:

For interest on $206,000, unpaid part of the principal sum of $306,000, for one year, at five per cent. per annum, to be distributed per capita, in the usual manner of paying annuities, per second article of the treaty of 31st July, 1855, $10,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the bill be read from page 48 to the end, so that Senators may see the items about which there may possibly be some controversy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That course will be pursued; but there are some amendments reported by the committee previous to that, which will first be read.

The next amendment was on page 45, after line one thousand and ninety-seven, in the appropriation for "Chippewas of Red Lake and Pembina tribe of Indians," to insert the following:

For this amount, to supply a deficiency in the first payment per fourth article of the treaty of October 2, 1863, to be expended in the purchase of powder, lead, twine, or such other beneficial purposes as the chiefs may request, to be equitably distributed among the said bands, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 46, after line eleven hundred and three, to insert the following:

For the sum of $500, to be paid to each of the seven chiefs of said bands, at the first payment, to enable each to build for himself a house, per fifth article treaty October 2, 1863, $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill, commencing on the 48th page, with the following paragraph:

For the Wichitas and other affiliated bands:

For the expense of colonizing, supporting, and furnishing said bands with agricultural implements and stock, pay of necessary employes, purchase of clothing, medicines, iron and steel, and maintenance of schools, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $20,000.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That appropriation differs from the estimate. It is here placed at $20,000. It was estimated at $37,800. Such has been the estimate, and such has been paid from year to year; and it will be borne in mind by the Senate that by a general provision which has been inserted in the appropriation bills for the last two years this sum which belonged to the Wichitas has been in fact confiscated for the benefit of the refugee Indians, and therefore it ought to be $37,800; and I move that amendment as we go along.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment is not in order, and I trust that we shall first go through with the amendments of the Committee on Finance. I will state further that the House of Representatives have reduced these appropriations about one half, and I am rather disposed to leave them where they have left them unless there are very strong reasons given for increasing them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I cannot see what objection there is to taking up this matter as we go along. It will save its being read over again and our coming back to the subject again. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The custom of the Senate is to proceed first with the amendments of the Committee on Finance. The amendment of the Senator, however, is strictly in order if he insists upon it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will wait until the amendments of the committee are disposed of.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill down to and including the following item:

For expenses attending the vaccination of Indians, $2,500.

Mr. NYE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether this appropriation of $2,500 for vaccinating the Indians has application to any particular tribe.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the usual appropriation made for that purpose.

Mr. NYE. During the last four years I have had some twelve thousand of these Indians under my charge, and I have never seen any of this vaccination.

Mr. SHERMAN. Some of the constituents of my friend from Wisconsin probably appropriated the money. [Laughter.]

Mr. NYE. I think this vaccination must be applied principally to the Indians of Wisconsin. I never heard of it in Nevada.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will answer the Senator from Nevada. This is a miscellaneous provision, and applies to all the Indian tribes.

Mr. NYE. But we never saw any of it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps you did not in Nevada. Nevada is a young State.

Mr. SHERMAN. But she wants her share. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be continued.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

Mr. NYE. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin who has this matter in charge in which State, Nevada or Oregon, are there the most Indians. Here is an appropriation of $45,000 to Oregon for incidental and traveling expenses, and to Nevada nothing is appropriated. I think Nevada contains more Indians in her territory than Oregon, and I should like to know the reason for this difference.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can tell the Senator how he can get a larger appropriation for Nevada. If he will divide Nevada into two States he will get the same appropriation for each that is now given to Nevada. For instance, Idaho has been divided into Idaho and Montana. We formerly appropriated $20,000 for Idaho, and now we have appropriated $20,000 for Idaho and $20,000 for Montana. If the Senator will allow his State to be divided he will get twice $20,000; and I do not know of any other way.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator will excuse me, we do not propose to divide it. We propose to add to it; and then we should not get any more, I suppose. If Oregon is a little larger than Nevada, I do not see why she should have twice as much appropriation for the same service; neither do I propose to ask any more for Nevada.

Mr. NESMITH. If it is a matter of any interest to the Senator from Nevada to understand why the appropriations in Oregon are larger than in Nevada, or the reason for the amount of the appropriations embraced in this bill, I can state it very briefly. I do not know as to the comparative number of Indians in Oregon and Nevada. I know that there is quite a distinction as to the characteristics of the Indians inhabiting the two States. Those in Nevada have not been driven from their usual fishing places and hunting grounds, and their appropriation of the country occupied by an agricultural population, and consequently the Indians in Nevada have not been disturbed. They live there in a sterile country and get the usual amount of bugs, grasshoppers, crickets, and perennial grasses, upon which they feed; and their condition has not been disturbed. They have had no such wars there as we have had in Oregon. I think they have had but one or two. The wars in Oregon have grown out of the occupation of the agricultural lands and the possession of the fisheries, together with other circumstances; and it is necessary, in order to protect the settlers there, to collect the Indians upon large reservations, where they are being partially supported by the Government and being civilized; at least, the Government is making efforts in that direction. Consequently there is a necessity for a greater amount of money there than has been spent heretofore in protecting and providing for the Indians who have not been assembled upon reservations. The Senator from Nevada of course knows more about the necessity of their being sent into reservations there than I do. It is a matter of necessity with us in Oregon. We cannot permit the Indians to roam at large through the country; and the consequence of that condition of affairs has been that we have had two or three exterminating wars in that country. The Government has adopted the policy of assembling the Indians in reservations, some of them under treaty stipulations and some of them without, and in order to maintain peace in the country these appropriations are made. That is the only reason that I know of for the distinction between Oregon and Nevada in the appropriations.

Mr. NYE. I do not desire to be captious about this matter, but I see unusual provisions applied to this appropriation for Oregon and Washington that are not applied to any other State that is quite as much exposed; as, for instance, insurance, transportation of annuity goods, &c. We have annuity goods to transport in the State of Nevada, but we are required to pay for it out of this general appropriation of $25,000.

The Senator from Oregon is quite mistaken in one thing. There is perhaps no State or Territory in this Union where greater havoc has been made upon the means of living and subsistence of the Indians than in the State of Nevada. Their principal item of subsistence was what is called the pine nut, and the miners have cut down all the trees of that character in the localities where they formerly resided, and hence that portion of their subsistence is taken away. All I desire is that there shall be some equality in regard to these Indian appropriations.

I see also quite a striking inequality in regard to the appropriations for the State of California. Nevada has more Indians within her borders than the State of California, and yet her appropriations—I speak without examining them closely—are not half as much. The Indians of California can be sustained much cheaper than the Indians of Nevada. They live in a productive country, and where, if they have to purchase provisions, they are far cheaper than they are in Nevada; for we have to purchase ours and draw them from California to Nevada to feed them, and I think that is somewhat so in Oregon. I desire that there shall be at least a fair quality in these Indian appropriations. We have treaties to carry out in the State of Nevada with the Shoshonee Indians that were made last year by the superintendent of Indian affairs of Utah and the superintendent of Indian affairs of Nevada, and yet I see no provision here in this bill for those treaties.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The appropriation is contained in the part of the bill which has not been read.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must remind the Senator that there is no motion pending.

Mr. NYE. I asked the question for information, because if there is any good reason existing for it I do not propose to make a motion; but if there is not, I shall feel bound to make a motion to ascertain the reason of this inequality.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On page 46 the honorable Senator from Nevada will see the appropriations that are made to pay the Shoshonees, both the eastern and northwestern and the Goship bands of Shoshonees. Although no motion is pending, I desire to say a single word to my friend from Nevada. Owing to his good judgment, and the good judgment of his friend associated with him, who is superintendent of Indian affairs of Utah, in the negotiation of the treaties in Nevada, the provisions of those treaties were wiser and better, I think, both for the Indians and for the Government of the United States, than many of the old treaties that were negotiated years ago in Oregon. At all events, the annuities that are to be provided for under the treaties made with the Indians of Nevada are not as large as they were made in Oregon and Washington Territories. The Indians are a different kind of Indians, living in a different country. But, sir, I will not take up time.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert at the end of the bill the following:

Chippewas of the Mississippi and Pillagers and Lake Winnebagoish bands of Chippewa Indians in Minnesota.

For this amount to be applied in payment toward the settlement of claims for depredations committed by said Indians in 1862, per third article of the treaty, May 7, 1864, for the present fiscal year, $30,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before this amendment is adopted I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I have been told that, since this amendment has been reported by the Committee on Finance, there is an amendment to these treaties which has not yet been concurred in by the Indians. Is that so?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe there was an amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I allude to the treaty with the Pillagers and Lake Winnebagoish bands of Chippewas.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The only amendment to the treaty was an amendment authorizing certain portions of one of the bands at Sand Lake to remain there until the President should direct or fix the time when they should remove. It was an amendment entirely for the benefit of the Indians, and was put in at the instance of a delegation of Indians who were here at the time. They have assented to it as I am informed by the Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was to insert at the end of the bill the following:

For this amount to be paid to the chiefs of the Mississippi upon the ratification of this treaty, per third article treaty, May 7, 1864, for the present fiscal year, $10,000.

For this amount to be paid to the chief Hole-in-the-Day for depredations committed in burning his house and furniture in 1862, per third article treaty, May 7, 1864, for the present fiscal year, $5,000.

For clearing, stumping, grubbing, breaking, and planting on the reservation hereby set apart for the Chippewas of Mississippi, in lots of not less than ten acres each for the five bands of Indians, per fourth article of treaty, May 7, 1864, for the present fiscal year, $7,500.

For this amount to be expended in building for each of the chiefs of the five bands of the Chippewas of Mississippi, provided for in the fourth article of the treaty of May 7, 1864, one house each, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $5,000.

For first of ten installments to furnish said Indians with ten yoke of good work oxen, twenty log-chains, two hundred grubbing hoes, ten plows, two grindstones, one hundred axes, handled, twenty spades, and other farming implements, per fifth article treaty, May 7, 1864, for the present fiscal year, $1,500.

For the same object for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $1,500.

For the employment of two carpenters, $1,800, and two blacksmiths, $1,800; four farm laborers, $2,400; one physician, $1,200, and medicine for sick, $500, per fifth article treaty, May 7, 1864, for the present fiscal year, $7,700.

For the same object for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $7,700.

For this amount to be applied toward the support of a saw-mill to be built for the common use of the Chippewas of Mississippi, and the Red Lake and Pembina bands of Chippewas, so long as the President may deem it necessary, per sixth article treaty, May 7, 1864, for the present fiscal year, $1,000.

For same object for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $1,000.

For this amount to be expended in building a road, bridges, &c., to their new agency, per sixth article treaty, May 7, 1864, for the present fiscal year, $7,500.

For new agency buildings to be located by the Secretary of the Interior for the common use of the Chippewas of Mississippi, Red Lake, and Pembina, and Pillagers, and Lake Winnebagoish bands of Chippewa Indians, per sixth article treaty, May 7, 1864, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $25,000.

For pay of services and traveling expenses of a board of visitors, to consist of not more than five persons, to attend the annuity payments to the Indians, &c., and to inspect the fields, buildings, mills, and other improvements as stipulated in the seventh article treaty May 7, 1864, not exceeding any one year more than twenty days' service, at five dollars per day, or more than three hundred miles travel, at ten cents per mile, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $550.

For expenses of the removal of eleven hundred Chippewas, of Mississippi, to their new homes, per twelfth article treaty May 7, 1864, at ten dollars each person, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $11,000.

For the expenses of subsistence of eleven hundred Chippewas, of the Mississippi, for six months, at their new homes, at thirty-eight cents per day for each person, per twelfth article treaty May 7, 1864, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $25,240.

For transportation of subsistence for Indians, for six months, to their new homes, per twelfth article treaty May 7, 1864, being four hundred and thirty-five thousand six hundred pounds pork and flour, in packages, at seven cents per pound, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $30,492.

For the payment of female teachers employed on the reservation to instruct Indian girls in domestic economy, per thirteenth article treaty May 7, 1864, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On page 51, line twelve hundred and forty-three, after the word "sixty-five," I move to insert the words "of the Cherokee national fund," for the purpose of identifying the appropriation; so that the clause will read:

For payment of interest on $68,000, abstracted bonds, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, of the Cherokee national fund, $4,080.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On page 53, after line twelve hundred and ninety-six, I move to insert the following:

To enable the agent of the Yankton Sioux to restore to the friendly members of said tribe the goods and property and provisions taken from them by the troops of the United States, $10,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like an explanation of that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When Sully's expedition went West, making this grand expedition of which we have read so much, and which has cost the Government from fifteen to twenty million dollars at the least, they passed in the neighborhood of the Yankton Sioux agency, who are friendly Indians, and the soldiers and those connected with the expedition took from these Yankton Sioux the provisions, &c., &c., which they had raised, and which were necessary to their own support. The agent reports these facts to the Department, and the Secretary of the Interior recommends the appropriation. If the Senator from Ohio could read this report he would be satisfied, and he would raise no question as to the propriety of this appropriation.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the date?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The report is a very late one. It is dated the 18th of February. I have another appropriation of $20,000 here to accompany this one, which I will explain more at length to the Senate when this is disposed of.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move to insert after the amendment that has just been adopted the following:

To enable the superintendent of Indian affairs of Dakota Territory, under the direction of the President, to negotiate a treaty of peace and amity with the hostile Sioux and other hostile tribes allied with them, $20,000.

I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to this proposition. If the subject is sufficiently understood I will not take up the time of the Senate upon it. I have no doubt that this is one of the wisest appropriations that can be made. The truth is that the military expedition that has gone with artillery and infantry over the plains at this immense expense to the Government, so far from effecting anything against the hostile Sioux, has been almost a failure. A single regiment on horseback, in my judgment, would have accomplished five times as much. It has cost the Government an immense sum; the Sioux are still hostile; and I believe that the right persons appointed by the President to take the necessary means to negotiate for peace with these hostile Sioux can effect a peace and save all this immense expenditure to the Government, and that whole army can be sent to the front, where they can do something for the benefit of the country. The Secretary of the Interior has recommended that the sum of $50,000 be appropriated for this purpose; but the committee, on consultation with the superintendent of Indian affairs of Dakota, who is here present, believed that for the sum of $20,000 the thing might be accomplished.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know but it is useless to talk about Indian appropriations, and I generally make no resistance to them; but I never will vote, as I stated at the last session, to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to send a party of people to negotiate and treat with Indians. I think it is the most ridiculous farce that can be transacted in our Government. It is the most shameless prostitution not only of the money of the Government but of the name, and credit and fame of the Government. Let me illustrate it. Two years ago the honorable Senator proposed to send somebody out to negotiate and treat with the Chippewas, I believe. The consequence was, that after awhile a treaty came back to us, was sent to the Indian Committee, and ratified, and the first we know about it is an appropriation of one or two hundred thousand dollars per annum to carry into effect an Indian treaty with some Indian tribe that we knew nothing of. That is the effect of it. The Committee on Finance have reported a new appropriation to this bill for one Indian tribe of $200,000. We had no resort but to do it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator will find that these large appropriations are for the first year for removing these Indians, their subsistence, the building of the agencies, and the other buildings which are necessary; and after that the appropriations per annum are very small. The treaty to which the Senator alludes is a treaty which was negotiated in Minnesota, and which acquired for the Government of the United States the relinquishment of the Indian title to a country almost as large as the State of Ohio. The treaty was negotiated by the honorable Senator from Minnesota [Mr. RAMSEY] and I have no reason to believe that the treaty was not negotiated upon a fair basis.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not attack the treaty at all. I only say that this appropriation must be followed undoubtedly by a treaty probably providing for the payment of millions of dollars, because one installment alone on a modern Indian treaty will probably be $100,000. This bill appropriates $2,500,000 for the support of how many Indians? I do not know how many; but comparatively few in number.

Mr. BROWN. They number about three hundred thousand.

Mr. SHERMAN. Of whom probably about one third are what are called treaty Indians; and the balance, the wandering tribes of Camanches, &c., get comparatively little. It seems to me that an end ought to be put to this business of making treaties. Some three or four years ago the Senator from Wisconsin himself agreed to provide some other system, and a Senator from California not now with us (Mr. Latham) also agreed to the same thing, and it was understood that a different system was to be adopted in the management of the Indian tribes; that we were no longer to treat them as equal powers, but we were to provide for them as dependents. That ought to be done.

I have before me an account of one of these treaties which I think is the best illustration of an Indian treaty I have ever read. It is the history of the treaty of Grenville, made by General Wayne. General Wayne, after having slaughtered a good many thousands of the Indians, convened them all together at the town of Grenville, or the hamlet of Grenville, and there he made a speech to them. I will give the substance of his speech. He said there were many white people who had come to Cincinnati, and one or two other places in Ohio, and they were very poor and needy; that they had their wives, and their wives were begging for bread; that they had their children and their children were crying for clothing. General Wayne appealed to the Indians to give to the poor whites a little land to enable them to earn a living for their women and children. That was the substance of General Wayne's appeal. The Indians took it in grave consideration. They retired to their council; and the next day they came back, radiant with joy, and addressing themselves to General Wayne, they said, "Father, we have found a way in which we can reconcile all our difficulties. The Great Spirit has given us a road out of all our troubles. You say that there are but few people at Cincinnati; that they are poor, needy, hungry, without clothing. You have offered to give us for our lands $10,000 in gold, five hundred blankets, so many guns, so much ammunition. Now, let the great father who lives at Washington give all this money, and all these goods, and all these blankets, to the few poor white people at Cincinnati and make them rich and happy, and then let them go back from whence they came, and we will have no further trouble."

That is about the history of all Indian treaties. General Wayne did not see it in that light; and the consequence was that the Indians were compelled to give up one half of the State of Ohio; and they have been driven westward and westward until they are gradually disappearing. The idea of treating with these Indians as separate and independent nations in my judgment ought to be abandoned. I therefore never will vote to send a commission out there to negotiate with roving tribes of Indians as free and independent nations. Let the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, or the Secretary of the Interior, or the President of the United States, or some authority, prescribe laws or rules or regulations, subject to the action of Congress, for the government of these poor people who are dependent upon our bounty. Let us help them and aid them; but do not let us continue the two systems. We have now with many Indian tribes arrangements by which we give them help upon their farms; send women to teach their children; send schoolmasters and blacksmiths and laborers to them. That is the proper way to dispose of the Indians. In the present condition of affairs I am not in favor of making any more Indian treaties. If the Senator says to me that the Indian service requires $10,000 or $20,000 to relieve these Indians temporarily, to enable them to obtain homes for themselves, I will feel myself bound to vote for whatever he says is necessary in that respect; but to negotiate any more Indian treaties, it seems to me, is simply to enable some people to rob and plunder the Indians, and prescribe laws for them without our sanction or supervision.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am quite sure that the attention of my honorable friend from Ohio has not been drawn to the consideration of the present relation of the Government of the United States to the Sioux nation of Indians and the hostile tribes upon the plains that are allied with them. I say to my honorable friend that he is voting here upon the appropriation bills millions and millions of dollars for transportation and subsistence to carry on a warlike expedition against these very Sioux. They are in hostility with the Government of the United States, and trying to ally with them all the Indians of the plains. It is believed by the superintendent of Indian affairs of Dakota Territory, that for the little sum of $20,000, by which he can furnish the kind of presents that may be necessary to induce their chiefs to come in and hold a talk or a treaty, peace can be obtained between the Government of the United States and these Sioux, and thus put an end to this immense expenditure. I say to my honorable friend that while I have not the slightest doubt that under the Indian department there are many expenditures which never ought to be incurred, and there are undoubtedly men who are interested in contracts for provisions and supplies and transportation who may be making money out of it, yet as compared with what is going on in relation to the army which is dealing with this very question, they are not one drop in the bucket.

While I am on the floor I may as well call the attention of the Senate to another amendment that will immediately occur, and I can discuss them both at once; and that is, in relation to what is proposed concerning the Navajos in New Mexico. The Department recommend the appropriation of $350,000 for them. The House bill provides for $100,000. Our committee after consultation have determined not to ask that the appropriation be increased, but to change that appropriation, to authorize the Department to employ the money appropriated under the provision of the House bill in furnishing wool to these Navajos to be manufactured by them into blankets for their own clothing; and I will state to the honorable Senator from Ohio the true condition of things there.

These Navajos, to the number of nearly ten thousand, have been taken by the Military Department of the Government from their homes, and moved nearly five hundred miles and established upon the Pecos river, in New Mexico, at what is called the Bosque Redondo, without any treaty. That is dealing with the Indians without treaty. They were taken without treaty by the military forces, and moved away and put upon the Bosque Redondo; and I have not a particle of doubt that that very thing will cost this Government millions of dollars. But when the Indian Department asks $100,000, as they did last year, for the purpose of enabling these Indians, after the War Department had put them on this river, to dig canals so that they can irrigate a little portion of the land to raise corn to feed themselves, the Indian department is denounced from beginning to end, and from the beginning of the world down to this day.

Now, in relation to this matter, the reason why the Indian department do not ask any more is because the War Department are feeding those Indians now. The War Department, under the powers which are possessed by the officers connected with the Army, have purchased a million pounds of corn to be delivered there in New Mexico to feed these Indians. They have got the corn on hand, or contracted for the corn which will feed them for a year. We hope that these Indians, under the administration of the Department, will be able to irrigate this land and raise their own corn for another year.

My honorable friend from Ohio, I know, is very much prejudiced against Indian treaties. I do not think that an Indian treaty is like a treaty between the Government of the United States and Great Britain; but certainly these Indian tribes have treaties with one another. They make war and they make peace with one another. They form alliances with each other. They perform, to be sure in a semi-civilized way, what the great nations of the earth do: they make war and peace; and do it by compact, by alliance; and make peace by treaty; and whether you say these treaties are to be regarded in the same light as a treaty between us and Great Britain or not, still they are treaties between us and these Indian tribes. The best and most economical way to have peace with the Indian tribes is to enter into some kind of stipulation with them.

But I agree with the honorable Senator from Ohio in one thing. I am opposed to putting into these Indian treaties stipulations binding this Government to pay money annuities. I know it has been the steady policy of the Indian Committee to prevent the payment of money annuities to the Indians. In this very treaty which was lately made in Minnesota, there are hardly any money annuities; and in the treaties which were negotiated by the honorable Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] with the Shoshonees, and in the treaties that were negotiated in Utah with the Indians there, the stipulation was to supply them with provisions, with agricultural instruments, and not to give money; for the purpose is to treat with them, and accomplish just what the honorable Senator from Ohio desires; to lead them to agriculture if possible, as they are driven from their hunting grounds by the rushing of our white population. Our people go into the valleys of the mountains and go all over the plains; the buffalo is destroyed; the game is driven away; and the question is, what is to be done with these Indians? When you reduce them to such a position that they must either steal or starve, of course wars are the consequence. The policy which has been adopted, it seems to me, is the best policy: to come to some arrangement with them; and it is much cheaper and more economical to agree with these Indians, to feed them rather than fight them, even if there are some contracts made under which unscrupulous men may sometimes overreach the Government.

But, sir, I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate.

Mr. HARLAN. I have no doubt this amendment ought to be made. It is a trifling expenditure compared with the expenditure we are now incurring in that direction in relation to these same Indians. The members of the Indian Committee were of opinion that with a small appropriation of this kind, the Governor of Dakota Territory will be able to arrange terms of peace with the large tribes of Indians that have been making war on the Government for the last two years; and although it does cost a little money to arrange these matters, it is a mere drop in the bucket compared with the expense of a military campaign. It is said to me, on authority that I think reliable, that the campaign up the Missouri river during the last summer will cost from fourteen to fifteen million dollars; and if we by an appropriation of a few thousand dollars can arrange terms of peace, it will certainly be a great economy to the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On page 51, after the word "dollars" in line twelve hundred and forty-nine, the committee have instructed me to move to insert the following:

Provided, That any part of said sum may be used to furnish wool or other necessary materials to said Indians to be by them manufactured into clothing and blankets.

So that the clause will read:

For subsistence for the Navajo Indians, and for the purchase of agricultural implements, seeds, and other articles necessary for breaking the ground on the reservation upon the Pecos river, $100,000: Provided, That any part of said sum may be used to furnish wool or other necessary materials to said Indians to be by them manufactured into clothing and blankets.

Mr. NYE. I should like to hear the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs explain why this appropriation of $100,000 is necessary for New Mexico. I know but very little of Indian affairs in that Territory; but it is entirely disproportioned to the number of Indians there and the result that is expected to be produced in any other State or Territory. I should like to ask him also whether the same appropriation was not made last year.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Perhaps the honorable Senator was not in the Chamber when I addressed myself to the Senator from Ohio on the subject of these Navajos.

Mr. NYE. You were addressing him so entirely that I could not hear you.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Those Navajos were brought by the Military Department and placed upon a reservation on the Pecos river. There were about seven thousand of them last year, and there are now about ten thousand. The military forces have them there under their control. One hundred thousand dollars was appropriated last year toward aiding them in making a canal to irrigate the land, furnishing them with necessary seeds, agricultural implements, &c. We now propose to vary the appropriation, to authorize the Department to furnish them the wool or other necessary materials for the Navajos to manufacture into clothing and blankets. The Navajos are the most ingenious manufacturers of blankets in the world. The girls of the Navajo nation will make a blanket which, held by the four corners, will hold water; and water can be carried and transported on horseback in one of the blankets that they make. I only speak of that to show that these Indians are not altogether savages; they are almost in a condition of the more advanced Pueblos of New Mexico; and this amendment is to enable them to make their own clothing.

Besides, I stated to the Senator from Ohio, the War Department are feeding them at a very heavy rate of expense to the Government for the present year. I have before me the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, and of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on this subject. They urge upon us to appropriate $350,000 for the clothing of these Indians. Under the circumstances, the Committee on Indian Affairs have determined not to ask an additional appropriation, but to enable this appropriation provided for by the House to be diverted so as to furnish them with material to make their own clothing as they have heretofore.

Mr. NYE. The general rule, I believe, is that the nearer civilized these Indians are, the better able they are to take care of themselves. Now, I understand—the gentleman did not answer me on that point; I presume it slipped his memory—that there was $100,000 appropriated last year for this same purpose. Was that expended by the military, or by the superintendent of Indian affairs; and what proportion of it was expended and what result was produced?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe the money was expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs for that purpose. I have not gone into all the details of the subject so as to be able now to state to the Senator from Nevada precisely what was done with the $100,000.

Mr. McDUGALL. I have been in the Nevada country and know something about that nation of Indians. They lived on their own lands, they had flocks and herds, and cultivated their own ground. They were the most powerful enemy we had on the frontier of New Mexico. After a war against them, which had been carried on for years, they were subjugated about two years since, I think. They were taken down to a country where they did not belong, to a new and strange country, away from their houses, away from their lands, away from their flocks and herds; and there, under the force of the Government, compelled to begin life anew.

The Navajos are a very ingenious race of Indians. It is my impression, from all I know of the Indian tribes, that the Navajos are superior to any race of Indians that I have ever had intercourse with. It is true they were at war with us, and they maintained successful war; and the only Indian tribe that dared to be their adversaries were the Camanches. They would go down hundreds of miles and fight the Camanches on their ground, and the Camanches would make war parties to go back and fight them upon their ground. We had not force enough in New Mexico until recently to make successful war against them. To secure peace they were brought more directly in contact with our Government; their location was changed, and they were brought down close to the valley of the Rio Grande that they might be supervised by the military forces of the United States. They require everything, if we are to treat them as fair adversaries whom we propose to protect, for we said to them, "Come down and settle in this new country and make your new homes, and we will furnish you the materials for starting in the way of self-subsistence." The amount here is nothing like equal to what might be justly demanded, to do full justice to them, according to the compact with them when they agreed to leave their own homes, two or three hundred miles distant, and make their homes where they would be within the reach of our Government. I think the appropriation a very small one for the purpose of rendering exact justice to those Indians.

Sir, they are not savages. They are highly intelligent Indians of the Aztec race. They are warlike, but only so for the purpose of self-protection as a rule. They cultivate the ground; and, as was said by my friend from Wisconsin, they are the best spinners and weavers in the world. I have lain many a night under a Navajo blanket when the storm was high and the rain fell fast, and their blankets are impervious to the rain. They understand a number of the mechanic arts, sufficient for their purpose. There are no Indians on the continent that have any relation to us that are anything like their equals. We have promised them protection if they would change their homes, and $100,000 is not anything like equal to their necessities.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On page 48, line eleven hundred and sixty-seven, I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty-five;" so that the clause will read:

For the purchase of cattle for beef and milk, together with clothing and food, teams, and farming tools for Indians in California, $55,000.

I will state to the Senator from Ohio, or any gentleman who desires an explanation, that this is the amount that was estimated for by the Department; it is the amount that has been appropriated for several years past; and now that our currency has become so inflated, as we pay in currency, the amount in California is substantially reduced to one half or even more than one half. It seems to me very bad policy now to make this reduction when no reason is given for it. California once embraced two superintendencies. It has since been consolidated into one; and this is the sum which was allowed to take charge of the Indians there, and keep the peace.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have another appropriation in relation to California. It is the same appropriation which was contained in a bill passed by the Senate the other day, but which has failed to become a law from its not having passed the House. I move to insert, on page 48, after line eleven hundred and sixty-seven, the following:

For the purpose of enabling the Secretary of the Interior to pay the settlers in Hoopa valley, California, for their improvements on the Indian reservation thereon, $80,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That before the same, or any part of the money hereby appropriated, shall be paid, the said improvements shall be appraised by the superintendent of Indian affairs, the Indian agent at said reservation, and the surveyor general of California; and if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, their appraisement shall be reasonable, and shall not in the aggregate exceed the sum herein appropriated, the said Secretary is hereby authorized to apply the same, or so much thereof as may be necessary, in payment for the said improvements, taking proper releases therefor: And provided further, That the moneys hereby appropriated be reimbursed from the proceeds of the sales of Indian reservations in said State under the provisions of the "act to provide for the better organization of Indian affairs in California," approved April 8, 1864.

Mr. SHERMAN. I raise the point of order that this is an appropriation for a private claim.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to state simply a fact to the Senator from Ohio, and then let the sense of the Senate be taken on the question whether it is within the rule or not. I understand the facts to be that in the north part of California for several years past we have had some seven or eight companies of United States soldiers at war with some Indians there. They have come at last to an arrangement for peace, the basis of which is that they are to go into the Hoopa valley and live there and be at peace. But in this Hoopa valley there are certain persons residing, our own citizens, who are upon some lands there; and the bill to which this proposition was reported as an amendment a year ago provided for appraising those claims; but from the disturbed state of affairs there it was not carried out. The bill provided that commissioners should be appointed to appraise the claims and they should report to Congress, and then Congress should pass a law on the subject of those claims. But this has occurred since the treaty was made, and now the provision in this amendment is that these lands are to be appraised by the superintendent of Indian affairs, the surveyor general of California, and the agent of the Indians residing in this Hoopa valley; and from all the information I can obtain of those gentlemen, if the judgment of any man in California can be taken on any such question we can take theirs. We limit the whole amount of appropriation not to exceed $60,000, which is the statement made of the value of this property. Now, here is the difficulty. How can you carry out the arrangement with those Indians and have those settlers still remain in the valley and occupy the land? It is a necessity, as it seems to me, that this arrangement should be made.

Mr. SHERMAN. That does not reach the point of order at all. The point of order is that this is money due to private individuals. The statement of the Senator from Wisconsin shows clearly that it comes within the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) The Chair will submit the question whether the amendment shall be received to the sense of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS. I am very much astonished that the chairman of the Committee on Finance should make this objection to this amendment. It is not to pay for a debt due, and therefore it is not a private claim. It is not in the nature of a claim. The main facts were stated by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. I add this statement as I am particularly acquainted with the whole matter. Under the act which reduced the expenses of Indian affairs in California largely, and which is now rapidly carrying Indian affairs to a basis of self-support in that State, which we expect to reach very soon, it was necessary to abandon certain reservations in that State, and among them is what is known as the Nomee-Lackee reservation, where the lands are of great value. The act providing for the reorganization of Indian affairs in California, to which the Senator from Wisconsin refers, provided for the sale of that reservation. He states exactly the fact when he says that for three years past there has been a war carried on there; no matter of joke at all, but a very severe contest; and the United States have had six companies of regular soldiers employed in carrying on that war. Recently terms of peace have been made, and a treaty with the Indians, by which it was stipulated, or rather said, that if the Indians would give up their arms and submit to the authority of the United States the Government would purchase Hoopa valley, as it was their most immediate locality, for them to reside in. Now, the question is whether we shall make an appropriation to carry out the treaty and bargain made. It is not in the nature of a claim at all. We simply propose to pay the settlers in that valley for the improvements they have made there, and extinguish their title, while we propose to give to the United States the more valuable lands that are being abandoned as reservations. It can in no manner be subject to the Senator's point of order at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have the 30th rule of the Senate read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

"30. No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments; and no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation."

Mr. CONNESS. This is to carry out the terms of an existing law.

Mr. SHERMAN. No.

Mr. CONNESS. I will call the attention of the Senator to the law.

Mr. SHERMAN. Read the law.

Mr. CONNESS. I will, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. If there is a law making an appropriation, where is the necessity of a new law? If there is a law on the subject, why introduce a bill at this session and send it to the other House? We must enforce the rule in every case, or not enforce it at all.

Mr. HARLAN. This case is about as follows. I think: about a year ago a law was passed by Congress authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to appraise the improvements made on the land by settlers in this Hoopa valley, and to report the appraised value of those lands to Congress, with a view of the purchase of the lands, and with a view of the location of the Indians in that valley. This has not been done. A war has been going on between the Government and these Indians, and, as we are informed by the Department, it has become absolutely necessary for the purpose of preserving peace that they should be immediately located in the valley, perhaps before this appraisal can be made, and be submitted to Congress at its next session; and this amendment offered by the chairman is to enable the Secretary to buy the improvements.

I might say to the Senator from Ohio that these men own the improvements they have made on this land. They have a right to settle on it under the preemption law, and if not taken by the Government they would have a right when the land is surveyed. I do not know whether they are or not.

Mr. CONNESS. No, sir.

Mr. HARLAN. They would have a right as soon as the lands were surveyed, to enter the lands at $1 25 an acre. This proposition is to extinguish at once the inchoate right of these settlers under the preemption law; and it is intended that the money shall be refunded so soon as the lands now or hereafter occupied by the Indians can be sold under the law of Congress to which I have referred. The operation of this amendment will be a temporary loan to the Indian department by the Treasury.

Mr. CONNESS. I will now read for the information of the Senator from Ohio from page 43 of the Statutes of the last Congress, the proviso to the second section of an act entitled "An act to provide for the better organization of Indian affairs in California:"

"And provided further, That if it shall be found impracticable to establish the reservations herein contemplated without embracing improvements made within their limits by white persons lawfully there, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to contract for the purchase of such improvements, at a price not exceeding a fair valuation thereof, to be made under his direction."

The amendment is in exact contemplation of this law and carrying out its provisions; and I beg to say to the Senator that the Treasury will not lose a single dollar of this appropriation. It is true this money is to be now appropriated, but the sale of the lands in Nomee-Lackee reservation, which is to be paid into the Treasury, will pay for it three or four times over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will take the sense of the Senate on the question of order submitted by the Senator from Ohio unless it is withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not withdrawn. I have no doubt at all that this is a private claim intended to furnish money to particular individuals designated and described by the amendment. It is so regarded by the Senator from California, who introduced a bill which has passed the Senate, as I am informed, and gone to the other House; and if we are to put all such bills on appropriation bills I am in despair of ever getting through with this bill in time to pass the tax bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Allow me to state for the information of the honorable Senator—his mind is so much occupied with regard to the business of his own committee that he could not have given attention to this subject—that the bill introduced by the Senator from California embraced matters in relation to all these reservations in California, and it was general in its nature. But here is the point, and herein is where this is not, in my judgment, a private claim: these settlers are now upon the lands in Hoopa valley, unwilling to leave until they are paid. How are you going to get them out? There was a provision under that law last year which provided that the Secretary of the Interior might enter into a contract with them for their improvements, but the contract should not be binding until it came back to Congress. Then the war with these Indians was still going on. Now, as I understand, it has been terminated, with the express understanding that this Hoopa valley should be theirs. They want to go in, and many of them have been taken into this valley already. I do not understand that the Secretary has made a contract for the purchase of the lands, but this amendment provides that, with this $60,000, he may purchase the improvements of these settlers; but in making that purchase he is to have the superintendent of Indian affairs, the surveyor general of the State of California, and the Indian agent to appraise the property, and $60,000 is the limit.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to say in addition, as I do not want to take up time, that this valley has been selected and confirmed by the President of the United States as a reservation, and there is left nothing to do but to appraise the improvements and pay for them; and it has been selected and ratified by the President in pursuance to law.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know, if that is so, why this is not a private claim. It seems, according to the statement of the Senator from California, that this Government has entered into a contract with certain individuals residing upon a piece of land, and has agreed to pay them a certain amount.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No such contract has been made.

Mr. McDougall. If the Senator from Iowa will allow me, it is not a private claim, for this reason: the Government have undertaken to locate the Indians in that valley, and have so treated with them; but they are not in possession of the valley, for legal rights exist there on the part of persons in possession under the preemption laws of the United States. The Government, not having possession of it, cannot carry out its contract or treaty. Therefore it is a matter not for individuals, but for the Government. It is acting directly to furnish the means to the Government officers to carry out its own foregone obligation. That is not a private claim. It is merely giving power to the Government to perform obligations already contracted.

Mr. GRIMES. Admitting it to be a fact that the President, or any one of his subordinates, has made an express contract with the parties who are in possession of these lands to pay them for their improvements, I think this state of facts is agreed on all hands: that a portion of the public domain was occupied by certain settlers upon it who had made improvements; those settlers claim to be reimbursed for the value of those improvements; and we are told they refuse to leave the public domain and surrender their possession until they are reimbursed. It is asserted by the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS,] and by others, that these persons who have made the improvements refuse to leave until what they say is their valid subsisting claim against the Government for their improvements shall have been paid to them; and now it is proposed by the proposition under consideration to pay those claims for improvements. If it is not a private claim I do not know what is.

Mr. CONNESS. It is not a private claim in any sense. The United States have undertaken to locate a reservation for public uses. They have accomplished that. The act has been ratified by the President. A part of that business, in pursuance of law, is yet to be done. What is it? The appraisement of the value of the improvements there is to be ascertained. This is an appropriation asked to meet that appraisement when it shall be made in pursuance of public policy and law. Senators in their anxiety to oppose this, raise a point of order that it is a private claim which ought to go into the Court of Claims or to the Committee on Claims. I think it is not in any sense a private claim.

Mr. McDougall. The Government undertook to locate the Indians on this land, assuming that the Government would be able to relieve the valley from their presence. The obligation is charged on the Government. Individuals are not coming here and claiming $60,000, but it is an appropriation asked to enable the Government to carry out its own action. It is not a private claim, and cannot be so denominated in any proper sense.

Mr. GRIMES. Let me ask what is to be done with the money sought to be appropriated by this amendment? Is it not to go to pay claims of the individuals settlers on this reservation? If it be not to pay for those claims, why do they ask for an appropriation?

Mr. McDougall. Does that make it a private claim? Of course all the money that is appropriated by this Government in any bill is to pay some existing obligation or some anticipated obligation on the part of the Government. John Smith, and John Doe, and Richard Roe do not in this instance come here claiming anything, but the Executive Department of the Government having done certain things, ask that they may be enabled to carry out their contracts in good faith, and to put in possession of this land the Indians to whom they promised possession. The land there is possessed by citizens of the United States who have rights of property, and the appropriation is to pay them for surrendering those rights, like all appropriations are made to pay somebody. It is for a public purpose, to carry out a public contract for the public good, and does not go to individuals, but goes to the administration of the Government for the purpose of carrying out a Government contract.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. POMEROY.) The Chair will take the sense of the Senate whether this amendment shall be received under the rule.

Mr. McDUGALL asked for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 22, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Collamer, Conness, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Ramsey, Richardson, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wilson, and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Grimes, Hale, Howe, Morrill, Pomeroy, Sherman, Sprague, and Wilcox—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Cowan, Davis, Harding, Harris, Howard, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Powell, Sausbury, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilkinson—18.

So the Senate decided to receive the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I now move the following amendment for the Shoshonees of Ruby valley, to come in on page 46, after line eleven hundred and thirteen:

Western bands of Shoshonees:

For the first of twenty installments in such articles, including cattle for herding or other purposes, as the President shall deem suitable for their wants and condition either as hunters or herdsmen, per seventh article of the treaty of October 1, 1863, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1865, $5,000.

For the second of twenty installments for the same objects for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $5,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like a little explanation. This is not included in the estimates.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand that it was by mistake omitted in the estimates. There were four of these treaties; one with the eastern Shoshonees, one with the northwestern bands, one with the western Shoshonees, and one with the Goshop bands of Shoshonees—treaties which were negotiated by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NYE] in association with the superintendent of Utah. These items were not in the estimates, but the Secretary of the Interior sent in a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs with his recommendation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I offer the following amendment for the Territory of Montana, to come in after line twelve hundred and eighty-four, on page 53:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to negotiate a treaty with the Black Foot and other tribes of Indians to relinquish so much of their reservation as lies south of the Missouri river, $15,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays on that. It is for another Indian treaty. I shall not take time on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not know but that it is a misfortune that our country is extending as it is, and our Territories are being opened as they are; but within a few years the Congress of the United States have organized a large number of Territories, and the discovery of the mines in all those Territories, and perhaps, too, the existence of war in the United States, led thousands of men to go into them. Perhaps many men have not gone for the purpose of escaping the draft, but they find them to be very convenient places when the drafts occur in the States. I have no doubt that some are there for that reason. All these facts have thrown a large emigration into the Territories, and they are going in among the Blackfoot Indians, and the Assiniboinis. These Indians are of a very different character from some Indians lower down. They live in the higher regions; the colder regions. They are stronger men, and bolder men, and more difficult men to deal with if you get engaged in a conflict with them.

Mr. President, it is a question of economy as well as a question of duty, in my judgment, whether we shall not by the expenditure of a small amount of money induce the Blackfoot Indians in the Territory of Montana to come across the Missouri river and occupy the country which is on the north side of the Missouri river. These Blackfeet and the Assiniboinis range from the British possessions on the north down into our Territory of Montana, mingling up with the miners and citizens who are going into that Territory, exposing us to constant danger of conflict, and you may have Indian wars on your hands growing out of the fact that the miners rush into the valleys and take possession of the fertile spaces, open the mines, and you cannot resist it. The Government may as well acknowledge the facts that it cannot control. I say there are laws governing this emigration, like the laws of trade or the laws of the winds or the laws of the seas, that human legislation cannot control. We must recognize these great facts. It is our growth, our development, our being brought in contact with these great tribes, that compels the necessity of entering into some kind of arrangement. I am not in favor of negotiating a treaty providing for paying to them money, but for inducing them by offices, by something in the shape of agricultural implements if you please, presents, or whatever you will, to keep the peace and persuade them to go to the north side of the Missouri river. There is country enough for them there.

I hold in my hand a letter of the Secretary of the Interior which recommends this appropriation in the very strongest terms. It is, however, a question for the Senate to decide. If we do not make any arrangements of this sort we must run the chance of difficulty with the Indians, and we must run the risk of an Indian war and its attendant expenses. I think you can negotiate with them at a great deal less expense than you can fight them. There is not much honor in Indian wars at any rate.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have been negotiating with the Indian tribes for about fifty years, and every year we have an Indian war. The more treaties we have with them, the more wars. The question with me is where the poor Indian will go. You make a treaty with him to have him go west of a range of mountains, and next year a treaty to make him go still further. The scheme ought to be abandoned. It has been discussed often in the Senate, and I think a majority of the Senate are opposed to any further treaties with Indian tribes. I simply want a vote to be taken by yeas and nays, and if the Senate are in favor of authorizing new treaties, as a matter of course I shall make no further resistance, and the Senator may have as many treaties made next year as he chooses.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] asks me how many bands of Indians we propose to treat with. There are four, the names of all of which I cannot pronounce. One is the Blackfeet proper. I do not profess to know all these Indian names, but there is a very large number of them, and they are a really powerful set of men; and I think it better to have peace with them and to negotiate. Men with provisions in their hands will secure peace much more readily with Indians than men wearing blue coats and carrying swords and guns. I am satisfied of that. The undertaking, by means of warfare, to have peace with the Indians, is not the best policy. Sometimes, it is true, it is necessary to show your power, to let them know that you have power, but as a general rule it is much better to negotiate and feed them rather than fight them. Our people are rushing into Montana. You cannot hinder their going there. By organizing the Territory you in substance invited them to go there and develop it. You are projecting railroads through it. Our people are on their way there, and they flow there from all those laws which control human events and human action, like, as I said, the laws of nature.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Finance to one fact. These Indians claim to have a right to all that country. I believe no treaty has been made extinguishing their title or supposed title to any of it. The white people who are going in there are all trespassers on their right, as they understand, and it is a right that we have recognized heretofore—not a right to the soil in fee simple, but a right to the use and occupancy of the land. Heretofore we have extinguished this claim of theirs, which we have admitted to be valid, by entering into a contract with them to abandon certain portions of it for the use of white people who may desire to settle near them. I understand the Senator from Ohio proposes to prohibit all treaties hereafter being made with any of the Indian tribes. I desire consequently to be informed by him by what process he will propose hereafter to extinguish their supposed right to the use of the lands.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to enter into a discussion of this Indian question now; but my own idea is that the control of Indian affairs ought to be put on an entirely different basis; that they should be gathered into reservations by a general system; that in the States they should be put under the State governments, leaving to the State governments their regulation, and in the Territories they should be put on reservations under some general system of discipline, and they should be protected and defended for the time being. I object to making treaties with them, to treating these wandering Indian bands as independent Powers. I have no objection to providing the necessary food and clothing, care, maintenance, and nurture for them; I have no objection to gathering them into reservations; but the idea of treating them as independent nations ought to have been abandoned years ago. I believe that is the conclusion of nearly all those who have had much experience in our Indian affairs, and I believe it is the opinion of the honorable Senator himself. I object to continuing treaty stipulations which are made sometimes without reflection and without supervision, and which we are compelled subsequently to carry into execution, although the Indians themselves disappear.

Mr. HARLAN. The question is not as to the policy that ought to be adopted in relation to the Indians. I have no doubt that their possessory right ought to have been extinguished to a part of the soil before the territorial governments were organized. Unfortunately this was not done. Congress in its wisdom proceeded to organize territorial governments embracing the Indian lands without first having extinguished their title. That they ought to be gathered together on smaller portions of land I believe is conceded by all. How are they to be collected? You have to treat them as rational beings with volition, or as animals. You must either run them down and by physical force collect and confine them on the reservations, or you must induce them to go, persuade them to go, make them believe that it is their interest thus to abandon a part of their lands and collect together on smaller tracts of country. What are denominated treaties with the Indians are nothing more nor less than bargains made by the Government agents with the Indians that the Indians will abandon their supposed right to a portion of the land and take something as a consideration. I do not know of any other way of accomplishing this end unless we attempt to run them down by the employment of soldiers and others as we run down wolves and other wild animals. How can you induce them to go on to these reservations voluntarily unless you make them feel that it is their interest to go? How can you make them feel that it is their interest unless you treat them as voluntary agents, people who have wills of their own, who must be consulted in any arrangement of this kind? If they are to be consulted as to where they will go and the part of their country they will abandon to the occupancy of white people, and we do thus consult them and write down the result of this understanding, it becomes in the common legal parlance of the country a treaty with that particular Indian tribe; and that is all there is of it. This amendment proposes to make a small appropriation to enable the proper agents of the Government to enter into an arrangement with the Indians in Montana Territory to abandon a part of it for the use of white people and to occupy by their tribes a smaller portion of the whole of the Territory. I know of no other way of doing it. If this is not done they will, of course claim that they have a right to go everywhere and occupy the whole of it, and conflicts will grow up between them and the white people.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 27, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Farwell, Harlan, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Wiley, Wilson, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Foot, Foster, Grimes, Lane of Indiana, Sherman, Sprague, and Ten Eyck—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Clark, Collamer, Cowan, Hale, Harding, Howard, Johnson, Morrill, Richardson, Saulsbury, Stewart, Trumbull, and Wilkinson—14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Our committee has received a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in which he states that by mistake an omission was made in the regular estimates in relation to the insurance and transportation of goods and provisions for the Flathead Indians. His letter is here and can be read if desired. I offer in conformity with it this amendment, to come in on page 39, after line nine hundred and twenty-eight:

Insurance and transportation of annuity goods and provisions for the Flathead Indians, per fifth article of treaty of July 16, 1855, for the present fiscal year, $11,920 41.

Insurance and transportation of annuity goods and provisions, per fifth article of the treaty of July 16, 1855, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $11,920 41.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The next amendment is to come in after line four hundred and twenty-four, on page 18:

Omahas:

For pay of miller and assistant miller, farmer, blacksmith, and assistant; for iron and steel; supplying smith shop with tools, and keeping the same in repair; keeping in repair grist and saw-mill; and for pay of engineer and assistant engineer for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, $4,840: Provided, That all tolls or profits arising from the working of the mill or shops shall be accounted for to the agent and by him applied to the use and benefit of said Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to insert after line four hundred and thirty-six, on page 19:

Quotes and Missourians:

For pay of miller, blacksmith and assistant, and for iron and steel for smith shop; for pay of farmer; for repair of grist and saw-mill; supplying smith's shop with tools, and keeping the same in repair; and for pay of engineer, $3,940: Provided, That any tolls or profits arising from the working of the mill or shops shall be accounted for to the agent and by him applied to the use and benefit of said Indians.

Mr. BROWN. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs whether the provisions of the treaty with those Indians in regard to a miller, &c., have not expired.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The provision in the treaty has expired, but the mill is still there for the benefit of the Indians, and this appropriation is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and I have no doubt it is a wise appropriation. It is not a very large one. It is to keep this mill going for the benefit of these Indian tribes, although the treaty requiring it has expired. We are not now compelled to keep up the mill, but it is there, and perhaps it is better for us to continue it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The next amendment is to insert after line six hundred and ninety-nine, on page 29:

For the payment of goods purchased for the Winnebagoes, Mississippi Sioux, and Yankton Sioux, to replace those lost by the burning of the steamer Welcome, at St. Louis, on the 15th of July, 1854, $54,771 83; and to replace the goods destroyed for Indians in New Mexico which were burned on the steamer Welcome at St. Louis on the 15th of July, 1854, $2,745 83; and to replace the goods destroyed for Indians in the Territory of Utah, which were burned on one of the wagons transporting the same from Nebraska City to Utah, on the 22d of August, 1854, $6,331 38: Provided, however, Any moneys to be recovered for insurance upon said goods shall be refunded to the Treasury of the United States.

The facts are, as appears to the committee and as is stated by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior, that on the 15th of July last, at St. Louis, the steamer Welcome was burned, with goods amounting to $64,086.

They were insured, and protest was duly made, and the wreck being taken possession of by the underwriters, a considerable amount of property was recovered, and the sum of $9,314 72 has been received at the Indian Office on account of the loss. A demand for reimbursement of the balance was made on the insurance company, and upon failure to comply with the demand suit was commenced.

Mr. GRIMES. Where was the property insured?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In the city of New York, I am informed; I do not know the name of the company.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The committee instruct me to offer the following amendment, as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay in gold and silver coin such of the above annuities as may be necessary to fulfill the treaty obligations of the United States to the friendly Indians, upon specific requisitions made upon him by the Secretary of the Interior for the same, with the approval of the President.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to amend that by inserting, "wherever by said treaties the money is to be paid in coin." The appropriation is in coin now made in such cases, I believe, and therefore this section is not necessary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I accept the modification.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that in all cases where there is a specific requirement to pay in coin, the money is so appropriated by this bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. All I ask is that where you agreed to pay in coin you shall pay in coin; but the provisions of the bill as it is do not allow it to be done.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That to provide for the usual distribution of medals among the chiefs of the Indian tribes, $5,000 is hereby appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is an amendment proposed by the Secretary of the Interior to which I would especially call the attention of the Senators from West Virginia. There is no appropriation of money in it. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to enter into arrangements with the State of West Virginia to exchange with her her share of the bonds of old Virginia that are held by the Government. The amendment is to add as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to surrender to the State of West Virginia the bonds and obligations of the State of Virginia held by the Secretary of the Interior in trust for various Indian tribes, for a like amount of the obligations of the said State of West Virginia, to be issued in accordance with the eighth clause of the eighth article of the constitution of West Virginia.

Mr. WILLEY. Of course that imposes no obligation on the State of West Virginia now. It only authorizes an arrangement to be made. A little reflection will convince the Senator from Wisconsin that it would be entirely nugatory at this time. West Virginia proposes at a proper time to assume an equitable proportion of the public debt of Virginia. She has bound herself to do so by her fundamental law, and it is right and proper that she should discharge that obligation; but what her due proportion is cannot be ascertained at this time. There must be an arrangement with the State of Virginia; there must be some process resorted to for the purpose of adjusting what will be the equitable share of the public debt of West Virginia. The amendment at this time will amount to nothing practically, and I respectfully suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin whether it is necessary for him now to offer it. I should have been glad to have been advised of the intention to do so. It is sprung upon us just at this moment without notice. I remember very well the provision in the constitution of West Virginia, and know very well that West Virginia proposes to pay and discharge her proper share of the public debt of Virginia; but no arrangement has been made between the State of West Virginia and the State of Virginia for the purpose of ascertaining what that just share of the public debt of Virginia will be. It cannot now be ascertained; but when it is so ascertained it is very likely the Senator from Wisconsin will find it proper to modify the legislation which he now proposes to adopt. There can be nothing gained on the part of the United States Government by present action on the matter, that I can see.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. In addition to what my colleague has said, I will state I have just seen a report of the Secretary of the Interior sent to the House of Representatives and laid on our tables to-day. I think it rather remarkable that neither the Secretary of the Interior nor the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs should have thought it worth while to ask us something about this question. I was going to say that I perceive in that report that the United States hold not only bonds of the State of Virginia for which we might be in some sort implicated under this provision of our Constitution, but certain guaranteed bonds of the State of Virginia. With these of course we have nothing to do until the remedy against the parties making them has been exhausted. I notice a certain amount of bonds of the city of Wheeling, which I believe were guaranteed by the State of Virginia, and were secured by a pledge of stock of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. Of course we shall never have anything to do with them.

I will state further that we proposed in our constitution to pay an equitable proportion of the debt of the State of Virginia. The debt on the 1st of January, 1861 was perhaps forty million dollars, of which considerably upward of thirty millions had been contracted for the construction of railroads and the James river canal, and other internal improvements. After we had separated from old Virginia and came to look about us we found that there was not within the whole territory of West Virginia one mile of railroad, one mile of canal, a single public building, or anything of the kind, for which any portion of the debt had been issued. All we have there is a few dirt turnpikes and a very insufficient and common canal, indeed a mere sluice navigation on a part of the Big Kanawha river. The gentleman and the Secretary of the Interior may calculate how much of that thirty or forty millions our equitable proportion would be.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I had no purpose to press the passage of this amendment if it was opposed by the gentleman from West Virginia. It contains nothing but a provision authorizing the President to enter into that negotiation when the State of West Virginia shall be ready to do it. I do not suppose it is of any great practical moment to pass it at this session; but it is supposed that before any arrangement can be made by the United States, which holds some of these bonds in trust for the Indians, we must give authority to the President to make the arrangement. I will not insist upon it against the objection.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. If we are liable for any portion of the State debt, we are liable only for our proportion; and most certainly we shall make no arrangements to pay any holders anything if they are not able to give us a release on paying our equitable proportion of the whole debt. I think, therefore, any legislation on the subject at this time is perfectly nugatory. Until the State of Virginia is in a situation to appoint commissioners to meet commissioners from our State and settle what that debt will be it is utterly impossible to do anything.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I offer an amendment in relation to the Stockbridges and Munsees of Wisconsin that does not contain any money appropriation. It is to add, as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That each of the chiefs, warriors, and heads of families of the Stockbridge and Munsee tribes of Indians residing in the county of Shawano and State of Wisconsin, may, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, enter a homestead and become entitled to all the benefits of an act entitled "An act to secure homesteads to actual settlers on the public domain," approved March 20, 1863, free from any fee or charge whatever. Any part of the lands being a part of their present reservation, which may be abandoned under the foregoing provisions, may be sold under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds applied for the benefit of such Indians as may settle on said homesteads to aid them in improving the same. The said homestead thus secured shall not be subject to any tax-levy or sale whatever, nor shall the same be sold, conveyed, mortgaged, or in any manner encumbered, except upon the decree of the dis-strict court of the United States as hereinafter provided. Whenever any of the said chiefs, warriors, or heads of families of said tribes, having filed with the clerk of the district court of the United States a declaration of his intention to become a citizen of the United States, and to dissolve all relations within any Indian tribe, two years prior thereto shall appear in said court and prove to the satisfaction thereof, by the testimony of two citizens of the United States, that for five years last past he has adopted the habits of civilized life; that he has maintained himself and family by his own industry; that he reads and speaks the English language; that he is well disposed to become a peaceable and orderly citizen; and that he has sufficient capacity to manage his own affairs—the court may enter a decree admitting him to all the rights of a citizen of the United States, and thenceforth he shall be no longer held or treated as a member of any Indian tribe, but shall be entitled to all the rights and privileges, and be subject to all the duties of other citizens of the United States; but nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive them of annuities to which they are or may be entitled.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will say to the Senator from Indiana that if there is any opposition to this measure, I shall not insist on its going upon this bill. I will state to the Senator from Indiana that the reason why I offer the amendment here is, that the measure has been pending before the House of Representatives, and unable to pass there. It is a question of legislation, it is true, in relation to the Stockbridge tribe of Indians in the State of Wisconsin. They are a tribe very far advanced in civilization. By an arrangement which was formerly made with them the reservation which was made for them on Lake Shawano is a very poor reservation, and this authorizes them to go and take homesteads like other settlers, and there is also a provision which, I admit, is in the nature of legislation rather than appropriation, which provides that on their proving certain things they may become admitted citizens of the United States, and cease any longer to be members of Indian tribes. I did not wish to present them to raise discussion, nor will I press it to a vote if it is resisted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not rise with a view of opposing it, but to make some inquiry of the chairman as to its merits. It seems to me that it is a measure which ought to be considered by some other committee as well as the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is a modification of the homestead law, and in that respect it ought to go to the Committee on Public Lands. It also relates to a question of citizenship, which I think ought to go to the Judiciary Committee. But if the Senator will declare that his committee have so thoroughly examined it in connection with the land system, which I know from his location he is familiar with, as to say it is all right, I am not going to interpose an objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no doubt the provisions are all right as applied to these Indians. The only objection I see is that it is something in the nature of legislation on an appropriation bill, which I desire as much as possible to avoid. If there is no objection to it, I would like to have it passed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will proceed as rapidly as possible. I have given way on the tax bill for the Indian bill. I have no objection to this amendment if the Senator desires it to be put on, but I know nothing about it. I hope he will press forward, as time is very precious.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin what consideration this measure has received; how thoroughly has it been examined by his own committee in connection with the question of the public lands to which it relates in part?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It has been discussed several times in our committee, and so far as I know meets the unanimous approval of the committee.

Mr. HARLAN. It will not affect the homestead law at all, except in relation to these particular Indians. There are very few of them. They are pretty well civilized. Their annuities have all expired, except about five hundred dollars to the whole tribe, payable annually. They have settled on a piece of land that is very poor, and on which it is impossible for them to make a living. This is to enable them to get land they can cultivate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I see the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands understands the measure and approves it. Of course I shall make no opposition.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On page 19, after line four hundred and thirty-six, I move to insert:

For the balance due the confederated tribes of the Kaskaskias, Peorias, Weas, and Piankeshaws, arising from the sale of their trust lands by William Brindall, late receiver of the land office, as reported by the Commissioner of the General Land Office held by said late receiver Brindall, unaccounted for and not deposited in the United States Treasury, $6,818 30: Provided, That when said sum shall be received it shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the decision of the Chair if that is not a private claim.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator from Iowa has given his special attention to this, and will explain it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I make no objection to it, but simply wish to know whether it is a private claim.

Mr. HARLAN. It is not a private claim. It is an amount of money due by the Government to these Indians for their land held in trust for them. This portion of the proceeds of sale has been held by the receiver, and which he claims is due to him for extra services, and the Government has not yet recovered it from him; but it is due to the Indians, and the Committee on Indian Affairs propose that it shall be taken from the Treasury temporarily, and if the Government recovers it from him the money will go into the Treasury.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it is a private claim. It is for the Chair to decide.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This money belonged to these Indians by treaty. The lands were to be surveyed and sold, and the proceeds go to the Indians. This man whom we have employed pockets the money, and what is to be done with the Indians? That is the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the impression of the Chair it is not a private claim within the meaning of the rule. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will now present an additional section in relation to the clerical force of the Indian Office, which, upon the statement of the Secretary of the Interior, reduces, in fact, the expense of the clerks in the office by $3,200. It is a reorganization of the clerks.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance have examined that matter thoroughly, and rejected it already. There has been a proposition to reorganize several bureaus of the Treasury Department. All are postponed to the next session by the action of a committee of conference. I trust, therefore, this will not be acted on.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If the Committee on Finance have rejected it, I shall not insist on its passage; but these papers were handed to us with no information that they had been considered by that committee, and as it appeared to be a better organization of the Indian Office than now exists, and costs less money, our committee recommended it.

Mr. SHERMAN. It increases the grade of clerks, and we were not prepared to act now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I shall not press the amendment if the Committee on Finance have discussed this question in committee and rejected it, because it would raise a question for discussion and division upon a matter which is not of sufficient importance. I therefore withdraw the amendment. I was not aware of the fact that it had received any consideration in that committee. I now offer another amendment. I am not, in my own mind, quite clear whether it can be objected to on the ground taken by my friend from Ohio as a private claim or not. I will state precisely what it is. In 1856—

Mr. GRIMES. Let it be read first.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

Insert at the end of page 18:

For refunding to Jacob White Crow, and others, the trustees or stewards of the Wyandotte mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the Wyandotte nation of Indians in Kansas, for the destruction of their church buildings, parsonage, and library, $3,000, to be applied in the rebuilding of said building and improvement of said parsonage for the use of the said Wyandotte tribe of Indians.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. These church buildings and parsonage belonging to this mission of the Wyandottes were on their lands in the State of Kansas. We were under treaty stipulations with them to prevent them from being depredated upon by the whites. The border ruffians went in there and burned them down, and they have been from that day to this deprived of them, and the money honestly belongs to them and should be paid. They are not our own citizens, private individuals making claims against the Government; they stand in the nature of an Indian tribe through their stewards representing their mission. I state just the facts.

Mr. POMEROY. I know very well the facts of which the Senator from Wisconsin has spoken. The treaty was not made when Kansas was a State, but when we were a Territory. When I first went there I found these Wyandottes the most loyal and radical anti-slavery men I could find anywhere, and they incurred early the hostility of the pro-slavery party, who came over there and burned their church. That is a simple statement of the facts. I have always hoped and prayed that the time would come when they could be recompensed. They suffered immeasurably, as we all did, but on account of there being treaty stipulations with them, it was thought the Government should pay them for their church.

Mr. GRIMES. Is not this a private claim?

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair it is a private claim.

Mr. GRIMES. Then it comes within the rule, and cannot be received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not for the Chair to raise the question.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to stand here as a perpetual objector. I am disposed to let the Senator from Wisconsin put on this bill, if he desires, all the Indians and all the burnt houses and burnt churches. I do not want to raise any objection, because I know one or two of this Indian tribe, and they are worthy people, and I know something about these depredations because I happened to be in Kansas at the time they were committed.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not look upon it as a private claim.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair it is a private claim, but it will be received if there be no objection.

Mr. GRIMES. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the Chair must rule that it is a private claim, and therefore the amendment cannot be received.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move to insert after line twelve hundred and seventy-six, on page 53, these words:

All that part of the public domain in the Territory of Arizona lying west of a direct line from Half-way Bend to Corner Rock, on the Colorado river, containing about seventy-five thousand acres of land, shall be set apart as an Indian reservation for the Indians of said river and its tributaries.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to my honorable friend from Ohio that there were two other propositions in relation to this appropriation bill as to which the Committee on Indian Affairs have not determined precisely upon the amount they will propose to offer as amendments. We supposed the bill would come up to-morrow morning, and this morning our committee had a meeting and concluded upon the various propositions which have been offered, and they were compelled to offer so many amendments from the fact that these matters were not acted upon in the other House. There is one other amendment in relation to refugees in the Indian territory and one in relation to Arizona which I am not prepared to offer.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope this bill may be closed to-night. I gave way on the tax bill to take up this bill, so that it might be got ready for enrollment. We are now so near to the close of the session that we must look at the clerical labor of preparing the bills. I hope, therefore, the Senator will offer his amendments and let us act on the bill now.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. There is one other amendment which I will offer now:

For balances due claimants under the third article of the treaty of September 10, 1853, with the Rogue river Indians for improvements made by the claimants on the Indian reserve, $814 82.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is not that a private claim? If so, I object to its going on the bill. If it is not, I have nothing to say.

Mr. NESMITH. I beg to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the third section of the treaty of September 10, 1853, which provides for the payments of these particular claims. It was provided in the treaty that $5,000 of the fund should be appropriated to pay these claims, and I have a report of the Secretary of the Interior which shows that $2,836 25 has been paid.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is still money due to private individuals, and I take it, therefore, the amendment is not in order.

Mr. NESMITH. I call the attention of the Senate to the language of the treaty under which this obligation arises:

"And for the payment of such permanent improvements as may have been made by land claimants on the aforesaid reserve, the value of which to be ascertained by three persons appointed by the said superintendent."

This provision is in the treaty of September 10, 1853, with the Rogue river Indians. The Secretary of the Interior sends us a report showing that $2,836 25 has been appropriated and paid pro rata, and that there has not been a sufficient sum appropriated to carry out the provision of the treaty. The language of the rule is that "no amendment shall be received whose object is to provide for a private claim, unless it be to carry out the provisions of an existing law or a treaty stipulation." The treaty stipulation is plain; it provides for these identical cases. The Secretary of the Interior recommends the payment, and the Committee on Indian Affairs have reported favorably upon it, so that it comes completely within the exception contained in the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the amendment is in order. It is to carry out a treaty stipulation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I understand that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs wants a little time to prepare his other amendments, and as we have but about ten minutes left before the recess, I propose to take up some bills on the table which have come from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to anything taking the place of this bill. We have got this bill and the tax bill before us, and I insist upon going on regularly.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio to allow this bill to lie over informally until after the recess. The truth is, as I stated, it was forced on us within a day or two, and we have been devoting day and night to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move, then, that the Indian appropriation bill be postponed till to-morrow. I cannot allow it to interfere with the tax bill to-night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asks the indulgence of the Senate to state that there are several House bills on the table which have not been referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let them be disposed of.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 735) amendatory of certain acts imposing duties upon foreign importations was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. No. 805) to repeal the eighth section of an act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July 4, 1864, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 535) to regulate the appointment of admirals and for the appointment of certain volunteer officers to the regular Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 605) to increase the pay of midshipmen and others;

A bill (H. R. No. 801) to amend certain acts relating to the naval service, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 803) to revive in part the act approved March 3, 1857, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1858.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of February 14, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of War forwarding a copy of the report of the court of inquiry in respect to the explosion of the mine in front of Petersburg.

The message was ordered to lie on the table and be printed, and a motion of Mr. HARRIS to print five thousand additional copies was referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in obedience to law, copies of the accounts of the superintendent of Indian affairs, and agents having charge of the Refugee Creek, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Indians, for the fourth quarter of 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ACCEPTANCE OF PRESIDENT LINCOLN.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the joint committee of the two Houses appointed to wait upon Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois, and notify him of his election as President of the United States, reported that the committee had performed the duty assigned them, and that the President-elect, in signifying his acceptance of the office to which he had been chosen by the people, said:

"Having served four years in the depths of a great and yet unended national peril, I can view this call to a second term in nowise more flatteringly to myself than as an expression of the public judgment that I may still finish a difficult work in which I have labored from the first, than could any one less severely schooled to the task. In this view, and with assured reliance on that Almighty Ruler who has so graciously sustained us thus far, and with increased gratitude to the generous people for their continued confidence, I accept the renewed trust with its yet onerous and perplexing duties and responsibilities."

PAUL S. FORBES'S CONTRACT.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 176) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance to Paul S. Forbes $250,000 additional out of the sum to be paid him under his contract for building a steam screw sloop-of-war, was read twice by its title.

Mr. GRIMES. The Senate a few days ago passed a resolution in the precise words of this and sent it to the House of Representatives, but the House, instead of acting on our resolution, took and passed the one reported by the Naval Committee of the House and have sent us a transcript of the one we sent to them. I ask to have it put on its passage now.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. No part of the $250,000 is to be paid without the assent in writing of Forbes's sureties, and the payment is not to affect or vary the contract except as to the time of making the payment.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NAVAL JUDGE ADVOCATE.

The bill (H. R. No. 800) to establish the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate was read twice by its title.

Mr. GRIMES. That is in the same category with the joint resolution just acted on, except that the House bill fixes the salary at $3,500 instead of $4,000, as provided by the Senate bill. I ask for the consideration of the bill at this time.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the appointment, for service during the rebellion and one year thereafter, of a Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate General for the Navy Department at an annual salary of $3,500. It also provides, that the fees for records in naval courts-martial shall not in any one case exceed $200.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POSTAL LAWS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (No. 390) relating to the postal laws, disagreed to by the Senate and insisted on by the House; and,

On motion by Mr. COLLAMER, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said bill insisted on by the House, and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conference on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. COLLAMER, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. POMEROY.

CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate (No. 88) regulating proceedings in criminal cases and for other purposes; and,

On motion by Mr. TRUMBULL, it was

Resolved, That the Senate agree thereto.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register, and an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 772) to provide ways and means to support the Government.

ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I now move to take up Senate bill No. 419. It was amended, and we had reached the question of its passage, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let it be taken up by unanimous consent, not displacing the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The bill to which I have called attention is a bill for the better organization of the pay department of the United States Army. It was reported unanimously from the Committee on Military Affairs, has been amended in the Senate, and all that is required to dispose of it is a vote by yeas and nays on its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to taking up the bill indicated by the Senator from Rhode Island. It is before the Senate, and the question is upon its passage, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the session be extended ten minutes so as to enable us to get this matter out of the way. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. HALE. I object to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion cannot be received, objection being made.

Mr. HALE. I should like to hear an explanation of this bill.

Mr. SPRAGUE. The explanation is simply this: it organizes a department of this Government that has never been organized since the beginning of this war. While every other department has received the attention of Congress and has been organized efficiently, this department has been neglected. The opposition to the bill is not in consequence of any increased appropriation that it provides for, but in consequence of some prejudice against those who it is supposed may fill the new offices. Now, I pledge myself to those who suppose they may have reason to think that suitable men will not be appointed, that I will fight with them to prevent such men from occupying the places. This bill is necessary for the efficient organization of the department.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the honorable Senator give way so that we may extend the session for a few minutes in order to dispose of this bill?

Mr. SPRAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I move that the session be extended for ten minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to that motion?

Mr. HALE. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the motion is not in order. The hour fixed for that purpose having arrived, the Senate will now take a recess till seven o'clock, p. m.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1865.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate resumed its session at seven o'clock, p. m.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE LANDS.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. The Committee on Agriculture have directed me to report a bill to extend the time for selecting agricultural college lands by the different States, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 483) to amend "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts" was read three times, and passed. It proposes to extend for two years from the time mentioned in that act the period for the performance of the condition on which the land and land scrip authorized by the act were granted.

ENROLLMENT LAWS.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 678) to amend the act entitled "An act further to regulate and provide for the enrolling of and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved July 4, 1864, and the other acts relating to enrollment and draft, reported it with amendments.

MILITARY AND NAVAL ASYLUM.

Mr. WILSON. As I have to be out upon a committee of conference this evening I desire now to call up a little bill to which there can be no objection. It is a bill to provide for a home or asylum for totally disabled volunteers. It costs the Government nothing. I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 479) to incorporate a national military and naval asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. GRIMES. I should like to know what is in the bill. It has not been read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We ought to know what is in it.

Mr. WILSON. The first section simply makes a hundred eminent citizens of the country a body politic and corporate. I do not think anybody will wish to take up time with reading them; let the rest of the bill be read.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to dispense with the reading of the names.

The motion was agreed to.

The residue of the bill was read. It provides that the corporation shall consist of one hundred members, with power to fill all vacancies created by death, resignation, or otherwise, and to make by-laws, rules, and regulations; but these by-laws, rules, and regulations are not to be repugnant to the Constitution or laws of the United States. The business of the corporation is to be managed by a board of twelve directors, who shall elect from their number a president, two vice presidents, and a secretary; and seven of the directors, of whom the president or one of the vice presidents shall be one, are to form a quorum for the transaction of business at any special meeting of the board of directors.

The board of directors are to have authority to procure for early use, at a suitable place, a site for a military asylum for officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States who have been or may hereafter be totally disabled by wounds received or sickness contracted while in the line of their duty during the present rebellion; and to have the necessary buildings erected, having due regard to the health of the location, facility of access, and competency to accommodate the persons provided for.

For the establishment and support of this asylum there are to be appropriated all stoppages or fines adjudged against volunteer officers, soldiers, or seamen, by sentence of courts-martial or military commission, over and above the amounts necessary for the reimbursement of the Government or of individuals; all forfeitures on account of desertion from the volunteer service; and all moneys due deceased volunteer officers, soldiers, or seamen, which now are, or may be, unclaimed for three years after the death of such officers, soldiers, or seamen, to be repaid upon the demand of the heirs or legal representatives of such deceased officers, soldiers, or seamen. The directors may receive donations of money or property, made by any person or persons, for the benefit of the asylum, and hold or dispose of it for its sole and exclusive use.

The selection of the site for the asylum, and the plan of the buildings, and the rules and regulations for the general and internal direction of the asylum are to be made by the directors, and they may do all other acts necessary for its government and interests; but no selection of a site or adoption of any plan of buildings is to be agreed upon until after the sum of $500,000 shall have been first subscribed or donated and paid into the treasury of the corporation.

The officers of the asylum are to be a governor, a deputy governor, a secretary, and a treasurer, and these officers are to be appointed from the pensioned officers of the volunteer service, and they may be appointed and removed from time to time, as the interests of the institution may require, by the board of directors.

The following persons only are to be entitled to the benefits of the asylum, and may be admitted upon the recommendation of the board of directors: all volunteer officers, soldiers, and seamen who have served during the present war, who have been or who may be totally disabled by wounds received or sickness contracted in the line of their duty, and such persons on becoming inmates of the asylum are to assign thereto their pensions during the time they shall remain therein and receive its benefits.

The directors are to make an annual report of the condition of the asylum to the War Department, which shall be communicated to Congress on the first Monday of every January. The directors are to examine and audit the accounts of the treasurer of the asylum quarterly, and to visit and inspect them at least six times a year.

All inmates of the asylum are to be subject to the rules and articles of war, and will be governed thereby in the same manner as if they were in the Army or Navy of the United States.

Mr. HALE. I move this as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That Congress may at any time hereafter alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. One provision seems to be omitted, which I suppose the committee intended to insert. I think that after the words "body corporate" the words "in the District of Columbia" should be inserted. I suppose it is intended to make this a corporation in the District of Columbia. If it is intended to make it a corporation for the whole country, it is rather a new proceeding on the part of Congress.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator thinks we have not the power to make a general corporation for this purpose, a matter of benevolence, let him put in that it shall be for the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I supposed the committee intended to do that. I did not suppose the committee intended to assert power to establish a corporation of the United States for this purpose.

Mr. WILSON. This is a corporation of a hundred individuals in different parts of the country for a purely charitable object, the relief of totally disabled soldiers.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The purpose I do not question. It is simply a question of power.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let the words proposed be inserted, because I have serious doubts about our power to incorporate anything outside of the District.

Mr. HALE. Let me suggest to the Senator from Wisconsin that two years ago we created an institution called, I believe, the National Academy of Sciences, covering the whole country, and we have printed their reports.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. They had their seat of operations here in Washington, I understand. I do not wish, however, to raise a discussion.

Mr. SUMNER. Have we not created the Pacific railroad corporation by act of Congress?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] moves to amend the bill by inserting after the word "corporate," at the end of the first section, the words "in the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time, and passed.

ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. FOSTER. There are two or three little bills from the Committee on Pensions which I should like to have passed. They will not take long.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business. I object to anything else being entertained unless the Senate decide to postpone it.

Mr. FOSTER. It will not take long to pass the bills which I desire to call up.

Mr. SHERMAN. Every other Senator has bills which he desires to have passed.

Mr. FOSTER. If any gentleman offers an amendment or makes opposition to the bills which I wish to call up, I shall withdraw the application.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to get rid of the Indian appropriation bill and the tax bill.

Mr. FOSTER. In one or two of these cases there are amendments merely to correct names, which will cause the bills to go back to the other House; and whether the Indian appropriation bill is passed at half past seven o'clock or at thirty-five minutes past seven o'clock is of very little importance, but whether these bills pass or not is important to the parties.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is called for. It is the bill (S. No. 419) for the better organization of the pay department of the United States Army, the question being on its passage.

Mr. POWELL. I object to taking that up. That was not the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is so informed by the Clerk.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio. Is the bill about the pay department of the Army the bill which he designed to call up?

Mr. SHERMAN. I called for the unfinished business. I want to proceed with the order of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has called up the unfinished business.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill was only called up informally, subject to be laid aside at any moment. It was taken up informally by consent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. We can pass it while we are discussing this question.

Mr. SPRAGUE. This bill had better be considered; otherwise it will interrupt legislation from this time until Congress adjourns. It is a bill that has been considered in committee and before the Senate. It is understood thoroughly. There can be no objection to it. All I ask is a vote upon it. I wish, however, to perfect the bill in one respect, by striking out the word "infantry" in one place and inserting the word "cavalry," to conform to all the other bills of the same character that have been enacted by Congress from time immemorial. It only occurs in one place.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I believe the present occupant of the chair was not in the chair at the time the recess was taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant was not in the chair, and depends upon the Clerk as to what was the unfinished business.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. When that bill was asked to be taken up this afternoon, I addressed myself to the President and said that if it came up I supposed it would be by unanimous consent, so as not to displace the Indian appropriation bill, and I received his affirmative response.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that when a bill comes up by unanimous consent, it is as if everybody voted to take it up, unless the other bill be laid aside merely informally.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit a motion that I believe is in order. I move to postpone all pending and prior orders, with a view to take up the tax bill. I will state, before the question is put, that I gave way with great reluctance for the Indian appropriation bill, supposing it would take only about an hour. I know now that it will take much longer. I must, therefore, insist upon going on with the regular business, which is the tax bill, which I agreed for a time to waive for the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I hope that motion will not prevail. I have endeavored, without any personal interest whatever, to obtain the consideration of the Senate to this bill, not private, not personal, but concerning the whole people of the United States. It affects a portion of the military department more important almost than any other, the officers who disburse the money to your soldiers; and if there is any department of this Government that in my opinion should receive the attention of the Senate, it is a department that comes so closely to the soldiers who have received more of the attention of Senators, who have received more of the attention of the country in legislation, and in every other respect, as they deserve, than anybody else. I do not know the reason why this obstruction should be put in the way of the passage of this bill. Personally I have no interest in it; and when I assumed to be the advocate of this bill at the suggestion of those who were interested in it, and being assured, too, of the cooperation of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs as well as the members of that committee, I thought that I was doing a duty here in my position as a Senator, and as a member of that committee, and as a citizen. And, sir, so long as this session lasts I shall deem it my duty to bring to the attention of the Senate this bill, believing that I am thereby doing my duty, and that I am neglecting my duty if I do not so bring it to their attention; and I shall avail myself of every opportunity to ask, to solicit, to beg the attention of Senators to this bill. If it had not received the assent of the committee, if it had not received the assent of the War Department, if it had not received the assent of the very department that it is to improve, and if it had not received the consideration of and been adjusted by the Military Committee, I should have great hesitation in urging it. Indeed if I did not believe it important and necessary, even if it had received their assent, I would not advocate it.

But, sir, here is a department of the Army that has received no attention from the Government and from Congress since the rebellion. It was an organization for fifteen thousand men, and you have now a million. There are several hundred paymasters now, when before their number might have been counted by tens and twenties. There is no gradation, there is no difference in the grade, they all are established as one grade. There is no opportunity for advancement, no pride, no opportunity for emulation. One man if he discharges his duty thoroughly, patriotically, better than his companions, has no opportunity to reach a position above his comrades, above his associates. There is no other such department in this Government. There is no department where, by attention to duty and by good conduct, there is not an opportunity for advancement; but there is no supervision of this department as there is in all others; there is no inspection; there is nothing except one general level, and no one to care for it, no one to have pride in it, no one to perfect it.

This bill establishes as its head a brigadier general. It is so in all the inferior sub-departments of the War Department. It does not advance the salary of this brigadier general a dollar. The service rations of the occupant of that office now make his salary equal to that of a brigadier general. The increased amount of expense the bill will involve over and above the present system is something like four thousand four hundred dollars a year. There will be some twelve or fifteen gentlemen who will be appointed to fill these new vacancies, but they do not increase the corps one member, and all the additional expense drops at the close of the war or one year after. It will require at the end of this war a year to adjust the accounts of the paymaster's department, and this bill provides that those who are now appointed shall, at the end of one year after the war, drop from the list of officers. It is a plain, simple, compact arrangement for this department, and I trust that the Senate will at any rate, if they do not concede its value and its necessity, concede me a vote, which is all I ask.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Chair will take this occasion to state that, while the present occupant of the chair shall be called to preside over the body, he will hold members strictly in debate to the question under consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. The lesson that is now taught me to-night will make me at least adhere to the rules more strictly. My friend from Rhode Island stated to me just as we were about taking the recess that he desired to move to take up a bill which would take but a moment. I did not dream that he would press it afterward, after the recess was over, against two of the most important bills of the session, especially by arguing and discussing the question before the Senate. I trust that we shall proceed in order to dispose of the bill which was first in order, the tax bill, and then proceed with the Indian appropriation bill. After that, I will do all I can to enable Senators to call up bills in which they take especial interest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio, to postpone the present and all prior orders and proceed to the consideration of the tax bill, so called. That motion does not admit of debate on the merits of any question aside from the mere motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Before the motion is put I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate and of my friend from Ohio to offer one amendment to go on the Indian appropriation bill, which will lead to no discussion, and is precisely in the language of the provision passed in the last Indian appropriation bill, that the annuities appropriated for the benefit of the rebel Indians or those in hostility to the United States may be used for the benefit of the loyal Indians. Senators will remember the provision.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better go on regularly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, the pending question being on an amendment of Mr. RAMSEY to an amendment reported by the Committee on Finance. The Committee on Finance proposed to strike out the fifth section of the bill, which is as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of notes of any State bank or State banking association, paid out by them after the 1st day of January, 1866.

Mr. RAMSEY's amendment was to add to the section proposed to be stricken out the following proviso:

Provided, That banks incorporated under State authority whose circulating notes are secured wholly by bonds of the United States, at their par value to the amount of ten per cent. beyond the amount of their circulating notes, shall be taxed upon their circulation and deposits in the same manner and at the same rates as are or may be prescribed for the taxation of national banks.

Mr. RAMSEY. In support of the amendment I have suggested to this fifth section of the bill, I have this to say: the tax of ten per cent. upon the circulation of the State banks is obviously designed to drive these institutions into the adoption of the national banking system. This is manifestly unjust to the banking institutions of the States with a capital less than $50,000; for them there is no provision; on the contrary, they are prohibited.

With us, a capital of $25,000 in many instances is all that is wanted. We have not yet the great accumulations of wealth that stimulate banking in the East, and why should we be denied this convenience?

Again, sir, the circulation of the banks of Minnesota is as perfectly secured upon the bonds of the State or of the United States, as is the circulation of any national or State system—secured upon a pledge of the bonds of the State or of the United States.

Now, what object is gained by driving out of existence a circulation based upon the General Government bonds? What is gained by annihilating these institutions, when they absorb your bonds equally with the national banks to the extent of their circulation. Is it not a wanton, objectless piece of mischief?

In point of fact, seven banks of Minnesota are secured wholly by bonds of the United States, and of a total of $507,627 of securities deposited by all the Minnesota banks, $430,907 are bonds of the United States.

These banks, by the investment of capital in United States bonds, furnish every benefit to the Government which is derived from the national banks.

With this amendment, I shall vote for the section. Without it, I shall do so with great hesitation, if at all.

Mr. McDUGALL. I hold, Mr. President, that the provisions of this section are not only unjust in themselves but against fundamental law and tend to disorganization. We are undertaking here by this legislation to deny to the States the right to control their own financial affairs in their own way. It is not many years since a majority of the people of the Republic entertained, or at least indorsed, the opinion that the United States Bank was unconstitutional, that we had not a right to establish an institution that should raise itself in the various States as a great money power and be a corporate body under the influence of this Government. Now a further proposition is made—it goes much further—that no State may organize a banking institution; for although in form of words this is not said, it is substantially expressed by this Machiavellian style of language, not saying the thing but providing for the thing being done. In the State in which I live we have a gold and silver currency, and we have banks, and so we have on all the coast of the Pacific. Now it is proposed to say that they cannot do business without paying a tax of ten per cent., which of itself would be a large profit per annum, yes more than could be distributed ordinarily to the stockholders by a bank doing an honest business and conducting its affairs with prudence.

I cannot understand what all this means unless it means the upturning of our institutions, the affirmation that the States have no rights, and that the men who established this Republic in the light of all the ancient States and those of the middle ages and of modern Europe were ignorant of what they were about when they laid the foundations of this Republic and established the Constitution under which as I think we still live.

I should like to ask some person conversant with law by what right does the Federal Congress say that State institutions may not exist under the laws of the States, issuing a currency without being subject to a taxation of ten per cent. per annum? I should like to hear some person conversant with the law answer me the question I now put. Perhaps there may be learned men who affirm this doctrine that can instruct me, and I am always willing to be instructed. Perhaps some learned men who advocate this doctrine can give me a reason why banks in the city of San Francisco who pay gold and silver and deal in the precious metals shall be taxed ten per cent. for their business, to force upon them a currency which they repudiate; for, sir, men who have an opportunity to handle gold and silver every day are not willing to take a mere fragmentary, false representative of them. I have not since I have been in this Senate Chamber seen or read a proposition so absolutely false and wrong as this, as a question of public policy.

Mr. President, I assure the gentlemen of the Senate that the people of my country will not submit to such legislation. It is one of the false expedients of ignorant philosophers in political science. If it obtains for a day, it produces the evils of the day; it may produce evils that will continue beyond the day. I fear it will. There is no justice in it, there is no policy in it; and in it there is infinite mischief. I have an intense desire to maintain the integrity of our people. It is the feeling that lies nearest to my heart. But if you adopt such a rule as this, and it shall be enforced, its effect must be to force apart the men beyond the mountains from the men on this side by the necessary force of necessary interest. Are you going to force national banks into the city of San Francisco, are you going to force national banks into the city of Sacramento, are you going to force national banks into the city of Stockton, and drive out of those cities the institutions that do their business now, and others throughout the State, by the compulsive power of the votes of the House of Representatives and the Senate and the approval of the President? I assure Senators that this thing cannot be done without more sacrifices than will be compensated by any promise of good they may see in the proposition.

There is no one on this Senate floor more anxious to support this Government intact than myself. I think so, although some Senators may call it in question; but allow me to warn Senators against this false legislation with regard to finance. If a man undertakes to deal with finance who lives in a town or city, and whose learning has been circumscribed by his local opportunities, and he undertakes to make laws here, supposing that those laws will adapt themselves and be adapted to the people of a great country embracing the lines of two oceans, he is unfit for place in Senate hall. I do not wish to take the time of the Senate in elaborating the subject, because I think that suggestion should be equal to argument upon a question of this kind. I say this thing cannot be executed as a matter of law, and will not be submitted to as a matter of law; and then again, recurring to another matter, (I say this particularly as to my own course,) do we propose really to abandon our system of Government as it was established? Do we intend to ignore the States in their proper sovereignty? Do we intend to make in all respects the Federal Government supreme? That should be boldly affirmed by those who propose such a measure.

I will not affirm that we have become so depraved since the days of our fathers that we are unequal to the Republic they founded and incorporated in 1787, but I doubt it much. If so, and we have to make a new departure, let us make a bold and open departure, and say that we are not equal to the Government established by our fathers, and that we will found another one sufficient to control the corruptions, the iniquities, and the sins that have grown out of office under the Republic within the last thirty years.

I know that I am impinging upon the time of the Senate at a period of importance, but I desire to speak what I think important words. This proposition itself is a proposition to usurp the powers of the States, to exercise them here where they do not properly belong. That has been understood always; it never has been questioned until now; and if such things as these can be done, all things can be done. It is a revolutionary proposition, and if revolution is demanded let us have a full revolution; let us commence at the foundation stone. No State should organize a bank or transact business in that way, for it is a denial of the right by indirection. It says a State has not this power, the Federal Government has it, and will exercise it. These things had better be outspoken. If they can be justified, if necessity demands them, well; because revolutionized revolution may be justified by necessity, by the demands of a country. I am not sure but that revolutionized revolution is demanded here, but I am not prepared for revolution myself. I think yet the laws laid down by our fathers are good laws; I know they are good laws to sustain a true, upright, and just people. The only reason why we should change them, at all is that we have been corrupted. It may be so, but I cannot understand how any Senator can vote for this proposition in the light of his learning, as he must have possessed himself of it before he took the oath as Senator, for he should have been somewhat instructed in public law and in the Constitution of our Government; and then having taken the oath of a Senator, I do not see how he can vote for this amendment, for I say it is false in principle, false in policy, and cannot be justified as a mere expedient.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I feel some reluctance in submitting any remarks to the Senate on this question after the Senator from Ohio, as chairman of the Finance Committee, has said that it is our duty to let the whole bill go to a committee of conference without discussion, and let that committee legislate for us; and especially after the patronizing suggestion of the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] with which he favored the Senate last night, that it was our duty to vote, and not to speak; in other words, that the examination of the committee room should take the place of the deliberations of the Senate upon one of the most important bills that ever occupied the attention of the body. I will say to those two Senators that if they bring in a revenue bill, strictly a revenue bill, they will probably not meet with much discussion; but if they seek on a revenue bill to carry propositions of a general sort affecting the policy of the Government, and affecting the rights of the States, not really germane to the bill, they must expect them to be discussed. Especially does the Senator from California occupy a position in reference to this question that does not peculiarly authorize him to lecture us upon the subject of discussing the particular question that is before the body. He comes from a State that is not plagued with paper money. Gold and silver are the standards of value in California now as before the Government flooded the country with paper money. Values there are not measured as in the eastern States by a paper currency, and it is a matter of no concern to him or his constituents whether State banking institutions go up or go down. California and her prosperity goes on all the same whether there be a commercial crisis in Indiana or commercial prosperity. Without banks in his own State, with a currency exclusively metallic, he says to us when the proposition is made to legislate our State banks out of existence that we ought to have nothing to say, let the committee have its way, and banks go down.

Mr. President, what is this proposition? "That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of notes of any State bank or State banking association paid out by them after the 1st day of January, 1866." Is that for revenue? I suppose the chairman will scarcely claim that it is for revenue. I suppose in the other House it was not claimed as a revenue measure, but as a penalty to prevent the circulation of State bank paper. I submit whether we have a right to legislate for such a purpose as that. I submit to the Senate that the Congress of the United States has no power to legislate State institutions out of existence. The Committee on Finance of this body have not recommended the adoption of this section. They have recommended that it be stricken out, but the chairman insists that the section shall be retained. The recommendation of the committee is that this be stricken out, and I hope the Senate will adopt the recommendation of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ought to inform the gentleman that in my opinion—and I have no doubt that he will find it so on the vote—a majority of the committee were in favor of the House proposition, but reported in favor of striking it out so as to submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That may be so, though I do not so understand it. If the Senator understood that to be the view of his committee, it is all right.

Mr. SHERMAN. The committee were so evenly divided that they thought it better to submit the question to the Senate, and hence proposed to strike out the section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is certain that the committee, as the representative of the body for the examination of this measure, has said to the Senate that the section ought to be stricken out. I think so too. I suppose no Senator questions the right and the power of a State to establish banking institutions. That is too well established to admit of discussion any longer. It is one of the rights, one of the prerogatives of the States to establish banking institutions and to authorize them to issue paper money. The States have exercised this power. In the State of Indiana it has been exercised very beneficially to the trade and prosperity of the people. If a State have the power to establish State banking institutions, has Congress the power to forbid it? If not to forbid it directly, has Congress the power to defeat the purpose of the State in the exercise of one of its powers by indirect legislation? I claim, Mr. President, that to some extent this question was considered by the Supreme Court in a case very familiar to all Senators, of McCulloch vs. the State of Maryland. It may be recollected that the question there was whether the State of Maryland had the power to tax the branch of the United States Bank established within the limits of that State, and the Supreme Court decided that it could not be done; that the State of Maryland could not tax the branch bank of the United States within her limits as a branch; could tax its property, its real estate, and could tax the stockholders, but could not tax it as a branch. The court said:

"That the power to tax involves the power to destroy; that the power to destroy may defeat and render useless the power to create; that there is a plain repugnance, in conferring on one Government a power to control the constitutional measures of another, which other, with respect to those very measures, is declared to be supreme over that which exerts the control, are propositions not to be denied. But all inconsistencies are to be reconciled by the magic of the word confidence. Taxation, it is said, does not necessarily and unavoidably destroy. To carry it to the excess of destruction would be an abuse, to presume which would banish that confidence which is essential to all government."

"But is this a case of confidence? Would the people of any one State trust those of another with a power to control the most insignificant operations of their State government? We know they would not. Why, then, should we suppose that the people of any one State should be willing to trust those of another with a power to control the operations of a government to which they have confided their most important and most valuable interests?"

That is the reverse now of the proposition I am discussing. There the Supreme Court was discussing the question whether a State could materially by taxation interfere with the General Government in the exercise of any of its powers; but in another passage in the decision the court is more pointed:

"We are relieved, as we ought to be, from clashing sovereignty; from interfering powers; from a repugnancy between a right in one Government to pull down what there is an acknowledged right in another to build up; from the incompatibility of a right in one Government to destroy what there is a right in another to preserve. We are not driven to the perplexing inquiry, so unfit for the judicial department, what degree of taxation is the legitimate use, and what degree may amount to the abuse of the power. The attempt to use it on the means employed by the Government of the Union, in pursuance of the Constitution, is itself an abuse, because it is the usurpation of a power which the people of a single State cannot give."

The language to which I wish particularly to call the attention of Senators is the following:

"We are relieved, as we ought to be, from clashing sovereignty; from interfering powers; from a repugnancy between a right in one Government to pull down what there is an acknowledged right in another to build up; from the incompatibility of a right in one Government to destroy what there is a right in another to preserve."

It is conceded that the States have the right and the power to establish State banks. The Supreme Court, in the decision of this case, do not base their decision upon any peculiar power possessed by the General Government, but they hold the broad doctrine, the doctrine necessary to be held in maintaining the proper relations among the States themselves and between the States and the Federal Government, that one Government cannot pull down that which another Government has a right to establish. Does the Senator from Ohio claim that a State has not the right to establish a State bank? That is conceded, so well is it established by the judicial decisions of the country. Then if the State of Indiana, as an illustration, has the power to establish a State bank, I ask Senators if Congress has the power to forbid it? If Congress has not the power to forbid it directly, has Congress the power to defeat the State by indirect legislation in an effort to exercise the power which it is conceded she possesses?

But I do not desire to discuss the question of power further. I wish to refer to some other considerations. Why is it claimed, not as a matter of revenue—for from this section there will come no revenue; no Senator believes there will come a revenue from this section—why is it asked, that if a bank in any one State, after the time mentioned in this section, shall not issue, but pay out a State bank bill, that bank shall be taxed ten per cent. upon that payment? It is for the purpose of driving from the commercial channels the circulation put there by the States, and to give the occupation of the whole field to the national banks. That, to strip it of all words covering it up, is the purpose of this proposition, to drive State circulation from the field, and give the field entirely to the national banks.

What cause of complaint has the Government of the United States against the State banks, Mr. President? A great many men are charged with being disloyal in these times, but I have not heard that any of the banks have been charged with that offense. I have not heard that the State bank of Indiana was charged with that offense when she furnished money to get regiments into the field. I did not understand that the President questioned the loyalty of the New York banks when, in the most trying hour of the Government, money was obtained from them upon a loan perhaps to the extent at one time of $50,000,000. What is the offense of the State banks that war must here be made upon them? I ask Senators, what have they done? They have furnished the Government money whenever called upon, to the full extent of their ability, in some instances interfering seriously with the commercial operations of their ordinary customers. I understood the Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the committee, in his speech the other evening, to intimate that the banks had been extending their circulation. Is this proposition, then, to prevent too large a circulation? Is that the idea? Let us see how that is. I will take up first the State bank of Indiana, as a blow is aimed at that State, which, as one of the representatives of that State, it is my duty to see is dealt fairly by. I will state to the Senate now the history of that bank's circulation within the last four years. In December, 1861, the cir-ulation of the State bank of Indiana was $5,979,419; at the same date in 1862 the circulation was $4,922,951, making a reduction in the year 1862 of $1,056,468. The amount in circulation on December 31, 1862, was $4,922,951; and in December, 1863, $2,563,845, reducing in 1863, $2,359,106. The amount of circulation on December 31, 1863, was $2,563,845; in 1864 it was $1,524,948, making a reduction in that year of $1,038,897, making a total reduction since 1861 of $4,454,471, and leaving in the field only $1,524,948. I give that one bank and its history during these three years past as an illustration. She has reduced her circulation from above five millions to a little above one million; and yet it is claimed that that is not a reduction sufficiently rapid to give the entire field to the national bank circulation.

I recollect that the debate of last year on the revenue bill showed that the entire circulation of the State banks was about one hundred and sixty-nine millions. The Senator from Ohio, in his speech the night before last, stated to the Senate that the circulation of the State banks was now about one hundred and thirty-six millions, so that within the last year the State banks have in fact reduced their circulation about thirty-three million dollars, and that does not yet satisfy the demands of the national banks. If a reduction of $33,000,000 has been made in one year by the State banks, is not that sufficiently rapid to answer the purposes of the national institutions? Mr. President, I ask Senators if they think the circulation in the country ought to be reduced much more rapidly? Ought the circulation of the country be reduced more rapidly than $33,000,000 a year out of $169,000,000? Is it for the good of commerce and trade that it should be reduced more rapidly?

The next consideration to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate is the effect of this measure upon the circulation now in the field. Senators all know that it is not possible for the State banks immediately to call in their circulation. I believe the State bank of Indiana at any hour has been able to call in her entire circulation if the people would give it up. She has offered premiums of from one to five per cent. for her circulation since this war, and yet has not been able to call it all in, because the people have confidence in that circulation and prefer to lay it by rather than the national bank circulation.

One hundred and thirty-six million dollars of State bank circulation is now in the channels of trade and commerce of the country, and it is proposed to say by this section that any bank which after the 1st day of January next shall pay out any note of these $136,000,000 of currency shall be liable to a penalty of ten per cent.; and what will be the immediate effect? The banks are not going to lose this ten per cent. It was never known yet that legislation striking at banks caused the banks to lose anything. The effect of the proposition is to depreciate $136,000,000 of currency in the pockets of the people ten per cent. In other words, if the reduction does not go on so as to bring the currency down below $136,000,000 by the 1st of January, the effect will be to make the people lose in their pockets ten per cent. upon $136,000,000 of currency. I have five dollars of this currency; you have; it is in the pockets of everybody. You say we cannot go to a neighboring bank and pay it in upon our debts; it can only be used by us in passing it from hand to hand; it ceases to be bankable paper. It can only be received by the bank that issued it, and that bank can only receive it for the purpose of redemption. You make it by an act of Congress not bankable paper, and what is the effect? To strike it down ten per cent. at once and to make the people lose just exactly ten per cent. upon $136,000,000, and what for? Not to bring in a revenue, for there is no mode by which you collect this revenue. How are you to know when a bank pays out five dollars of another bank's paper? What is the machinery by which this tax is to be collected? It is a penalty without a remedy to enforce it; but it will have the effect to depreciate the currency as I have stated.

But, Mr. President, I ask Senators if the national banks have not advantages enough already? What are the advantages that national banks have over the State banks? First, they have the advantage of banking upon Government bonds, the interest payable in gold. A national bank buys $100,000 of United States bonds bearing six per cent. interest; they are deposited in the Treasury. Every six months that interest is received from the Treasury, and it is worth at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, the gold being worth 200. That is the first advantage a national bank has. The next is not specially provided for in the law, but a practice that has grown up in the Department, as I understand, that the Government borrows the notes from the bank and instead of that gives to the bank interest-bearing Treasury notes. I know that was done in respect to some of the western banks. Bonds were deposited in the Treasury Department, ninety per cent. of currency issued upon the bonds, and that currency was never taken West, but was borrowed in this city by the Government, and the banker received instead thereof five per cent. interest-bearing Treasury notes. The gold interest is worth to the bank twelve per cent., and the interest-bearing note is worth five per cent., and without doing any legitimate banking at all the bank can thus make seventeen per cent. It has the advantage, next, of the Government deposit as a means of doing ordinary banking upon a reliable deposit, a very important deposit, which is drawn out only gradually. The next advantage the national banks have is that their currency is receivable in payment of Government taxes and State bank paper is not. The Government taxes are intended to go to between three and four hundred million dollars, and the State bank paper cannot be received in payment of those taxes. Here is a very large field occupied exclusively by the national bank paper and by the Treasury notes. How important that is to the national banks can be appreciated by Senators.

These notes are also, as I understand, receivable at the Treasury in payment for the Government bonds; and last, the capital of the national banks is not taxable as the capital of State banks is—I mean the bonds that are on deposit. The basis of all this business, the bonds that are filed here, out of which grows a profit, as I have shown, of seventeen per cent., are not taxable by the State and local authorities, while the State bank capital is liable to taxation by State and local authorities. Now, I appeal to Senators if there need be a penalty to drive the State circulation from the field and to give it up exclusively to the national bank currency, when there are such great advantages given by present legislation to the national currency.

As a matter of fact I suppose Senators know the enormous profits that these national banks are making. Having a very trifling interest in one, having no interest whatever in any State bank, I do know a little of the profits made by the national concerns, while I know nothing of the profits made by the State banks. And, sir, with the advantages that the laws on your statute-book now give to them, these national banks can make at the present time twenty-five per cent. every year. I know of instances in which from April last up to November they made at the rate of over thirty per cent. per annum.

Then, sir, if you give such great advantages to the national circulation by legislation already adopted, why is it proposed arbitrarily to say that the State banks shall not issue their paper? I ask Senators if it is fair. If the people wish to use the State bank circulation, if they have more confidence in it and give it the preference, as a matter of confidence and commercial credit, have they not a right to do it? If I have my money invested in a State bank, and another Senator has his (I speak in this way simply as the representatives of our people) in a national bank, is it fair to say that my capital shall be taxed out of the field, so that unreasonable and extraordinary profit shall be made by the capital invested in another direction? I say this is legislation not becoming this body. If revenue is wanted, let that revenue be collected. I do not raise the question upon the decision to which I have referred, that no taxes can be collected off the State banks by the General Government. I do not here question it. I am willing that the State banks shall be taxed, dollar for dollar, as the national banks are; and any person engaged in the national banking institutions that is not content with that is not satisfied with fair play. If a man has his money in a national bank and he says, "I am not willing to trust in the struggle for business to my credit before the people; I invoke the arbitrary aid of Congress to drive my competitor from the field, to give the entire commercial world up to me, that I may make large gains out of it," it is not an address that the Congress of the United States ought to heed. As one humble representative of an interest, (not a large interest, as is shown to the Senate by the figures I have given,) all I ask is equality.

These institutions have been established by the States, according to the authority that the States have; that is not questioned. This currency is now in the pockets of the people; it is important to them. It is proposed now, not as a measure of revenue, but arbitrarily, first to depreciate it in the pockets of the people, and then to drive it out of the field that the national banks may make a larger profit. I say to Senators that the national banks are making enough now. It cannot last and the commercial prosperity of the country continue. When banks can make from twenty to thirty per cent. on their capital, there is something wrong in the commercial world that will show itself at some time. They are making such profits as no banks ever made before; yet they are not content.

I know Senators pretend that the Government has got some interest in this. I have looked on all sides to see how the Government is interested in it. The Government is interested, of course, when she sells her bonds, to sell them and get currency such as she receives; but why is she interested in driving the State bank circulation out of the field? Why is the Government interested in that? If she borrows from a national bank the issues of that bank she has to pay interest for them; she has to pay just as much interest as if she borrowed from a State bank. If there were any machinery by which a national bank could make money and give it to the Government without any interest, I could see some advantage in this business; but as these national banks simply make money for the stockholders, I cannot see how the Government of the United States is interested in the question. I can see how the Government would have saved a good deal of money by issuing the ordinary Treasury notes, the legal tenders, instead of establishing this banking system, because she pays no interest on those notes, and they will pass if the people have faith in the ability of the Government to pay the money. But instead of that, the Government has adopted the policy of issuing bonds bearing interest payable in coin, receiving the bonds back as security, and then issuing bank paper to the national banks, and that paper is to take the place of the circulation of the country. I am not able to see how the Government has made money out of that transaction; and yet it is claimed that it was a sharp thing, that the Government made money somehow. I am not able to see it; but that is past; the national banks are established, and they are now being increased, as I notice in an evening paper, at the rate of $3,000,000 of capital a week; they are in the field; and the State banks are in the field trying to reduce their circulation, reducing it in one year $33,000,000, and we are called upon to clear the field for the national banks, not to make money for the Government, for it does not do it; it is simply to give the national banks an opportunity to make all the money that it is possible to make out of the trade and commerce of the country.

Mr. McDougall. And centralize power here.

Mr. Hendricks. I spoke of that very briefly awhile ago. At the last session this subject was somewhat discussed, and Congress decided that the tax should be the same upon the national banks and upon the State banks, the same upon their circulation and upon their deposits. Have Senators changed their views on the subject? Senators gave their vote when the circulation of the State banks was one hundred and sixty-nine millions. Now that they have reduced it to one hundred and thirty-six millions, why are Senators asked to change the policy? There is something about this that I cannot understand. Equality in this matter is justice. But of all the modes of striking at the State banks, this is the most objectionable. It brings no revenue, but depreciates the currency now in the pockets of the people to the extent of one hundred and thirty-six millions, bringing upon that sum a depreciation of ten per cent. The bank will say to a man who brings home that paper, "Yes, we will take it, deducting the penalty to which we are liable." After this provision is adopted, a farmer goes to the neighboring bank in Indiana with an Indiana bill, which to-day has better credit than your greenback or your national bank paper, and he says, "I want to pay off my note; here is $100 of State bank paper." The bank officer says "We cannot receive it at the bank; it is not upon our branch; we cannot receive it unless at the rate of ninety cents on the dollar; we cannot afford to give you any more, because it is not bankable paper any longer;" and yet the Government makes nothing out of it. It is a loss to the people, makes no money to the Government, and gives the field to the national banks who are to-day making money more rapidly than the true interests of the country justify.

I simply ask, Mr. President, that now when the State banks are reducing as rapidly as they can, we shall decide, as we did at the last session, that equality is justice and right.

The amendment of Mr. RAMSEY was rejected.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to be allowed, at this time, to submit a report from a committee of conference.

No objection being made,

Mr. CLARK, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first, second, fifth, twenty-seventh, thirty-fifth, forty-fifth, and forty-eighth amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their amendments to the bill of the House numbered thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, twenty-eight, and twenty-nine.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the House to their third amendment, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment of the House, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, however, that any Senator who has already, as a member of the House of Representatives, received a portion of a set of the Congressional Globe, shall only be entitled to receive, as such Senator, the additional volumes required to complete one full set."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the ninth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: add at the end of said amendment the words "so much thereof to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior as may be necessary for the erection of said addition."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the tenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: strike out the word "ninety" and insert in lieu thereof the words "seventy-five."

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the House to their twelfth and twenty-fourth amendments, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: insert in lieu of the words stricken out the words for legal assistance, and other necessary, and special, and extraordinary expenses in the disposal of private land claims in California, $10,000."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the forty-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment all after the word "appropriated;" in the eighth line, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and for the purpose of furnishing and fitting up suitable rooms for the office of the Attorney General, if it shall be necessary for him to remove from the Treasury Department, the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to so much of the amendments of the House to their forty-sixth amendment as is contained in the last two sections of said amendment of the House, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the forty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: add to the end of said amendment the following: "and the sum of $43,000 is hereby appropriated to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of paying such contingent expenses as may be directed by resolution of the House."

DANIEL CLARK,

IRA HARRIS,

J. W. NESMITH,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN A. KASSON,

R. MALLORY,

H. WINTER DAVIS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CLARK. I am ready to explain the action of the committee on the amendments seriatim or to answer any question of any Senator in regard to any particular amendment, just as may be the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to know what was done with the appropriation for extending the printing establishment.

Mr. CLARK. It was kept as the Senator desired it.

Mr. STEWART. What was done with Judge Field's mileage?

Mr. CLARK. He was kept as the Senate left him.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 745) granting land to the State of Michigan to aid in building a harbor and ship-canal at Portage Lake, Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 178) to authorize the continuation of the Joint Committee on Commerce of the Senate and House after the 4th day of March, 1865, to complete their investigations and make their report on the subject of trade with the rebellious States.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Finance to strike out the fifth section of the bill, in the following words:

Sec. 5. And he it further enacted, That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of notes of any State bank or State banking association paid out by them after the 1st day of January, 1866.

Mr. JOHNSON. The question before the Senate, I suppose, is whether they will concur with the amendment suggested by the Committee on Finance; for, although we hear from the chairman of the committee that a majority of the committee were in favor of retaining this fifth section, their report shows that they were against retaining it, for they have suggested to us the propriety of rejecting the section altogether. The question, then, I suppose, before the Senate is whether that section is to be stricken out or not. I think I am right as to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) That is the question.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is too late in the session, and therefore would be altogether improper, to do more than state the objection which I entertain on this question as to the reason why I shall vote in favor of the amendment. I think it involves a constitutional question, free, in my judgment, of all real difficulty. From the beginning of the Government to the present time the authority of the States to establish banks and to clothe these banks with the authority to issue notes has never been seriously questioned. When the charter of the original Bank of the United States was before Congress, and when the subsequent charter of the bank of 1816 was before Congress, and when its constitutionality was before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of McCulloch vs. The State of Maryland, the only question about which there existed any difference of opinion was whether Congress had a right to establish a bank. The discussion in both branches and the argument in the Supreme Court conceded that the authority existed in the States. But when the Supreme Court affirmed the authority of Congress to establish a bank, and Maryland imposed (what she had not the authority to do) a tax upon the exercise of that franchise within her limits, the Supreme Court, by a unanimous opinion, and they reaffirmed it in a subsequent case from Ohio, declared that the State had no authority to impose that tax, not because the particular tax in that instance would have been any serious impediment to the business of the bank or its office of discount and deposit in Maryland, but because it involved a principle, which, if carried out, would be fatal to the right of Congress to establish a bank at all.

I have said that neither in Congress nor in the court has the authority of the States to establish banks been questioned. This section on its face assumes the right of the States to establish banks. It is not a provision declaring that it shall not be in the power of the States to establish banks and to give them the authority to issue notes, but it professes to tax the notes, so far as the particular section is concerned in this bill, for the purpose of raising revenue. The bill itself upon its face is a supplement to the original act, which was an act to raise revenue exclusively. But I understand the honorable member, with the frankness which characterizes him, to say that the purpose of the friends of this section is to drive out of existence State bank notes; in other words, to deny to the State banks the authority to issue notes by imposing upon them a tax which will render that authority absolutely futile. That is precisely the question upon which the Supreme Court of the United States unanimously declared that the tax proposed by Maryland upon the Bank of the United States could not be maintained. I shall be compelled, therefore, upon constitutional grounds, to say nothing of the question of policy, to deny my assent to this section upon the ground of an absolute want of power.

Mr. POWELL. It is not my purpose to detain the Senate more than a few moments; but as the State which I have the honor in part to represent is very deeply interested in this matter, I will say a few words. After the very able speech of the Senator from Indiana, and the pointed remarks of the Senator from Maryland, it is not really necessary indeed to say anything.

The sole object, and I suppose it is on all hands the avowed object of those who desire to place this ten per cent. tax on the State banks, is to drive out their circulation. No person contends that it is for the purpose or raising money. That purpose is clearly in my judgment unconstitutional. Mr. President, if I were not in council chamber with grave Senators, I should suppose that persons who desired by legislative enactment to drive out a better in order to substitute a meaner currency, were a council of persons who had probably taken leave of their wits; but of course the surroundings forbid my entertaining any such notion as that. I dare say gentlemen have good reasons for this measure, but I regret to say they have not made them manifest.

This proposition is to tax all the State bank issues after a certain day in January next ten per cent. What is the condition of these banks? I am not accurately advised about the condition of the State banks throughout the country, but I do know that the banks in Kentucky, every one of them, are much better and safer institutions than any of the national banks. The bank issues of every bank in the State of Kentucky to-day command a premium over the issues of the national banks, or the greenbacks, as they are commonly called, and I will say further that there is not a State bank in Kentucky that, if the law was repealed authorizing greenbacks to be a legal tender, could not to-morrow resume specie payments. They never did suspend specie payments until the passage of that law, and then they availed themselves of course of it to pay greenbacks instead of coin when their notes were presented for redemption.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, has changed his views, I think, somewhat, about this national bank system. I remember distinctly, when the first national bank bill was under consideration, that the Senator spoke most earnestly and most ably in its favor, and he declared over and over again that it would be the best currency in the world, the best in the Union certainly, and I believe he went so far on one occasion as to say it would be better than coin. The Senator night before last, however, in some remarks he made seemed to have changed his views somewhat, for he announced to the Senate that the Government had now to pay more than twice as much in this paper money for articles it was necessarily compelled to purchase than it would have to pay if the currency were gold, and hence he desired heavy taxes to pay off the debt now.

It is, as I remarked before, strange indeed that wise and sensible men should be engaged in the work of so forming a bill ostensibly for the purpose of raising revenue as to affix a provision to destroy the institutions of the States, and by that destruction to drive out a much better currency than the one they propose to substitute. If they succeed in this, carrying their principle out, after they shall have by their legislation prevented the issue or circulation of notes of any State bank, however good or solvent that bank may be, I should not be astonished if I were to find these same gentlemen introducing a bill to tax the national bank issues out of existence in order to substitute shavings as a currency. I venture to say that in the history of no people on earth who understood anything of finance and commerce and circulation was there ever such a proposition before. The avowed object of this section of the bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, was and is to drive the circulation of the State banks out of existence for the purpose of substituting that of your national banks. Does any gentleman here pretend to say that your national bank currency is as good as that of the larger portion of the State banks? If any gentleman in this Chamber entertains any such opinion as that, I shall be most happy if he will bring me a million or two of the notes of the State banks of Kentucky and allow me to give him for them greenbacks at par. The State bank notes in all my region of country are better than your national bank currency. Those banks are formed and organized on principles that have been approved by wise bankers for the last five hundred years; they have been eminently successful, and to-day their paper is much better than your national bank paper; it is much better than your Government paper in any form whatever. And yet, sir, those institutions that have been established by the State of Kentucky and other States, that our people know to be safe and solvent and that they desire to retain, are to be taxed out of existence by the Congress of the United States. You have no constitutional power to do it. If you wish to raise revenue from these banks, tax them precisely as you do the national banks, and tax them no more.

The result of this course of legislation is utterly to destroy all the rights of the States. It is asserting a power which if carried out to its logical result would enable the national Congress to destroy every institution of the States and cause all power to be consolidated and concentrated here. Instead of doing this, in my judgment, if you were to act like wise and sensible men, you would pass a law repealing your national bank system entirely, for it has so far proved an utter failure, and the longer it exists the more manifest its rottenness will be. Talk not to me of the success of a banking system that has not been in existence two years and the notes of which are already at fifty per cent. discount. It is rotten to the very core; it violates every sound principle of finance and every correct principle of banking. If we do anything in this matter let us repeal the law creating the national banks, repeal the law making your greenbacks a legal tender, and then all the good State banks in the country will resume specie payments, and you will come to something like a healthy currency, and then the chairman of the Committee on Finance will not be under the necessity of appealing to the people to pay large taxes now when they have a worthless currency in which to pay them, because by and by they will have to pay in gold.

Sir, I have a fear of the concentrated power that is claimed by some gentlemen to exist here. So shape your legislation under the asserted power of taxation (not to raise revenue, but to destroy existing institutions) that no State in the Union can have a bank of issue, and then you have a grand consolidated system of centralization so far as your finances are concerned, with a controlling power in this capital. Every man knows the power of money. It is dangerous to the liberties of the people, and I fear will ultimately be used as a lever by which to overthrow and destroy those liberties. For one, I look on this system of consolidation with the greatest fear and apprehension.

In my judgment there never was a more unjust or unwise proposition, never one more utterly destructive of the principles of the Constitution of our country, and when you shall have accomplished what is proposed, you will by your law have driven out a better for the purpose of substituting a meaner currency. When the Senator from Ohio was urging upon us the national bank bill, if we could have believed the arguments he adduced and the proclamations he made about the glory and the grandeur and the greatness of the system and the excellence of the currency it would give us, we must have supposed that by this time it would command a small premium over gold instead of being at fifty per cent. discount as it is.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will long pause before they claim the power to tax the institutions of the States out of existence, or claim power to destroy the local institutions of the States which it is admitted on all hands they have the power to create. No man doubts the power of the States to create State banks. It is a power that never was and I suppose never will be questioned. I believe there are one or two States in which banks cannot be established. I think in the constitution of Arkansas there is a provision that there shall be no banks in that State; but where a constitutional provision of the State does not intervene there can be no doubt of the power.

The honorable Senator from Ohio spoke of the very great issues of the State banks; he said that they had increased their circulation. The Senator is mistaken in that. About the New England banks I am not so particularly advised, but I know there is not a bank in Kentucky which has not been retiring its issues as fast as it could during the last two years. I have not the tables before me, but I know every bank in Kentucky has been retiring its issues as fast as it possibly could, and for a very sound financial reason, because the greenback which they give for their notes when they redeem them is of less value than their own circulation. Their own bank paper is better than the greenback with which they redeem; and while that is the case the State banks will continue to retire their circulation. Two or three years ago we had many millions more of local circulation than we now have, and perhaps at one time some banking institutions availed themselves of the fact that they were not required to redeem in coin in order to make greater issues than before, but I think the solvent, good banks throughout the country have not done so. I do not believe the banks of New York have done so, and I know that the banks in the West, at least in Kentucky and Indiana, have not so acted.

Mr. President, it was not my purpose to detain the Senate, for I know that time is precious, but I could not allow this proposition to be acted upon without saying a few words in regard to it.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate very long; but before the vote is taken on this amendment I wish to say a few words. The proposition contained in this section is simply a proposition to wind up the State banks. In fact the proposition might be put in different language altogether, and should declare that after the date named no State bank in the United States shall be permitted to issue paper as a circulating medium. We all know very well that no bank can afford to issue its paper if it has to pay upon that issue a tax of ten per cent. So it is, as the chairman of the Committee on Finance says, a proposition simply to get rid of the State banks.

I know the unwillingness of the Senate to hear anything upon this subject now; we are getting very near to the end of the session, and time is precious; but the measure is one of the most important ever presented to this body, and this must be my excuse for trespassing at all. What do you propose to do? You propose to divert all the capital now in the State banks into national banks; to break down the one system and to build up the other; and if time permitted, it would be well to inquire what is the one and what is the other? I know there is a prejudice against State banks, but why is it? What creates that prejudice? What have the State banks done against the Government? Can any Senator tell me? I should be very glad to know. Are they disloyal? Are they in the hands of disloyal men? Have they refused to sustain the Government? Have they refused to purchase the bonds of the Government? Mr. President, I make the assertion before the Senate that the local banks of this country to-day have in their hands, purchased from the Government of the United States, and from individuals who had obtained them from the Government, double the amount of United States securities that the national banks have. You have succeeded in incorporating $190,000,000 of capital in the national banks, and, delighted with the success, you propose now to drive all the bank capital of this country into a system of banking that has never been tried except to be condemned.

I deny, first, the constitutional power of Congress to do the thing proposed. Is it any longer a doubted question that a State may incorporate a company to issue paper, a company called a banking company? The Supreme Court has again and again decided the question. It was thought to be settled in the days of Chief Justice Marshall and no longer subject to dispute. Then if it be a constitutional power of a State to charter a bank to issue circulation, I desire to know what power Congress has to break it down. I will admit the power of Congress to tax the State banks; I have no doubt about it; but I deny the power, under the plea and pretense of taxation, to destroy those institutions. Congress may tax for purposes of revenue, but not with the direct and avowed purpose of destroying an interest created and built up under a power legitimately belonging to the States. Congress may lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, but all duties, imposts, and excises should be uniform. If any one interest may be specially and without limit subjected to the burdens of excise tax, with our present public debt, that interest may be entirely destroyed. The supposed guarantees of the Constitution, securing equality of right and an equitable and just distribution of public burdens, would prove wholly unavailing.

The chief pretext under which you now propose to destroy the State banks is that they stand in the way of successful financial operations by the General Government. Let me tell Senators, and especially those from States proposing to tear down these institutions, because, forsooth, they are in the way of a good currency, in the way of the proper adjustment of the financial concerns of the Government, that in the course of a few years from now the great West, which is putting State after State into the American Union, will have the power in this body and in the other House to say that a great many things stand in the way of the prosperity of the country. Suppose they should say that the great manufacturing establishments of the northern or New England States have received bounties and premiums at the hands of Congress long enough, and that it has become the duty of the West, for the general good, to force the immense amount of capital aggregated in Massachusetts, in New York, in Connecticut, in Vermont, New Hampshire, and other States, to abandon the avocations in which that capital is now invested and compel it to go West and seek employment with us; can it not be done? I insist that there is no trouble in accomplishing it if this precedent be followed.

You say the money power of the local banks is too strong for the success of a banking scheme having only the merit of being incorporated by Congress. The national bank system upsets every principle of finance which time and experience, through peace as well as war, have proved to be correct; but Congress in its wisdom has chosen to adopt it. The people, the trading, commercial classes, do not seem to be so well satisfied with it as Congress. They deposit their surplus means with the old institutions. They discount their notes with them, and receive their issues and pay them out. The national banks hunger for this business. They are already made the depositories of the Government funds, but that will not do. The State banks may survive even with this advantage against them. They next seek private deposits and the exclusive privilege of furnishing to the country a circulation. If the people will not cease to keep their deposit accounts with the local banks and obstinately refuse to transfer them to the new banks; if they will receive and circulate the notes of the old banks, believing them to be a safe medium of exchange, there is nothing left but the course now proposed. Experience condemns the new system; the commercial and trading people will not trust it. No country has ever tried an irredeemable currency without great loss, and very often financial ruin. Yet the Government has determined to inaugurate the policy, and now, to make it succeed against the fixed judgment of the people, it is proposed to drive out of existence all rival systems. The new system cannot live on its own merits. It cannot brook competition. Hence the strong arm of the Government must be brought up to the rescue—not to sustain by favors and privileges the new system, but to crush out the old.

Let us see how these principles proposed to be established will operate. Peace will come after awhile. When it does come it will find a large public debt to be liquidated. Each section, with more vigilance even than now, will endeavor to protect its peculiar and local interests against the burden. In order to do so, as revenue needs must be had, each will find excuses for placing the tax upon the interests of the other. It may also be safely assumed that each will use, as it may properly do, the conceded powers of the Government to bring the wealth of the country to itself.

That being the case, the West may say that its tobacco and whisky are taxed several hundred per cent. on its value, while the manufactures of the northern States are taxed but six per cent. and protected by increased tariff duties of at least fifty per cent., thus enabling the manufacturers to feel that the excise tax is a blessing to them and a curse to the country. It is easy for us to believe what we want to believe. Were this not the case few persons would think it proper to drive out the issues of State banks, bad as they may be, to give place to the irredeemable circulation proposed by the national currency. It may be easy and very convenient for the West to believe that northern and eastern productions and manufactures should pay more of the public burdens. It may be equally as convenient to believe it just and constitutional to divert a part of the accumulated capital of the East to seek investment in the West.

If I believed, as some seem to believe, why could I not in my legislative capacity hereafter say to our western friends, "There is a large amount of capital in Massachusetts, an immense amount in New York and other States; let us tear it down, make it remove out West, settle upon our rich and teeming lands, and there prosper and build up our States; we want it to dig out the ore from the Iron mountain; to draw out the native ore of the Pilot Knob; to go to Newton country in my State and dig up the lead ore of that country." How can we do it? Put twenty-five per cent. instead of six per cent., as proposed by this bill, on the manufactures of New England and the investments of New York. Can you oppose it on constitutional grounds? What objections have you to it? Did you not tax out of existence a bank in the State of Missouri? Did you not crush the banks of Iowa and Wisconsin? It was no uniform or ordinary tax you levied; it was a tax of ten cents on every dollar they issued. You levied no such tax on national banks. Why cannot I say twenty-five per cent. on you? Is it not an analogous case? What right have you to say I am restrained or forbidden to do this thing? Why cannot I do it? Cannot I lawfully put even fifty per cent. on your manufactures? If this should not destroy your business we can repeal the tariff and give you no drawback when you export. I think you would pick up your capital and go to farming or digging lead and iron in my State and others of the West. Will you not? Surely so. I think Senators ought to think what they are doing.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HENDERSON. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to put a question to the Senator because I cannot comprehend the kind of argument he is making, as though the East was forcing this system on the West. If I understand it, and I ask the Senator if it be not correct, the policy going against the State banks has been from the beginning a policy against the eastern States and has found its strongest supporters in the western States. It is a measure that we have supported for the good of the country peculiarly against our section and in favor of the West.

Mr. SHERMAN. I trust my friend from Missouri will allow me to make an appeal to him. He and I are both members of the same committee, and I am no more responsible for this bill than he is. It is manifest if these various propositions are discussed at great length we shall never get through.

Mr. HENDERSON. I assure the Senator that I shall not speak many minutes longer. In answer to my friend from Massachusetts I will say that if he understands me as speaking against the New England States, or as being hostile to them in any particular, or if he understands me to be otherwise than friendly to the New England States, he is very much mistaken. I am only endeavoring to show the dangerous conclusions of our present legislation. I am exemplifying what I think may be improperly done on this precedent. When I say that I am friendly to all the interests of the New England States, I do not express my true feelings. I am more than friendly. I admire as much as the Senator from Massachusetts, and perhaps more, the sacrificing spirit of those States since this war commenced. I have always admired the energy, the industry, the learning, the greatness of their people. No American should feel otherwise than proud of the New England States. He cannot speak of his country and forget them. They constitute a large part, and perhaps the noblest part, of the American Union.

I cannot give point to my argument so well in any way as by showing the great enormity that might be perpetrated upon the industry and earnings of an active, energetic, and frugal people, by mere force of numbers. Their shield is the Constitution. If we disregard it in one case, others will come after us ready to use the precedent.

But I cannot delay.

Now, Mr. President, I say in the first place, this thing is unconstitutional; in the second place, it does not aid the Government. Tell me wherein it aids the Government. If some Senator will tell me I will give up my opposition. If Senators see no constitutional objection, and have no fears that dangerous legislation may be predicated upon it, I am willing they may urge it; but no such radical change should be made in the business relations of a country, whether the act be constitutional or not, unless the highest considerations of public policy can be urged in its behalf.

If the Government proposes to borrow money, I presume each system of banks will loan if the loan be thought advantageous. Capital seeks investment wherever dividends can be assured. The mere conversion of State bank capital into national bank capital will not induce it to serve the Government without fee or reward. State banks invest in Government bonds because of the hope of profit. National banks, or rather those who control them, are operated upon by the same motives. Senators seem to admit this view of the case, but insist that the State banks are continually inflating the currency, and a wise policy demands that bank circulation be curtailed.

Let us look at this argument. On the 1st of January, 1863, the State bank circulation, in round numbers, was $173,000,000; on the 1st of January, 1864, it was $169,000,000, and on the 1st of December, 1864, according to a report which the honorable chairman of the Finance Committee has just received from the Treasury Department, it was $136,965,902. Is not the State bank circulation being decreased instead of being increased? Unquestionably so. But if it be the desire to decrease the circulation, I submit to Senators why it was that they sat here this morning and contentedly permitted a bill to pass authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury in his discretion to issue $600,000,000 more of Treasury notes. Do you dare to tell me that you want to curtail the circulation? Is there any Senator here who raises his head this evening and says so? Why then did he vote for the proposition that was passed authorizing the Treasury Department to issue $600,000,000 more of Treasury notes?

But aside from the Government issues which we have authorized without a division, and for which excuse may be rendered, we are asked, under pretense of contracting the currency, to foster and encourage a system which can do nothing but expand in bulk and depreciate in value. The argument in favor of curtailment may be good, but I fear it is only urged against the State banks.

I will state the result of the contracting process in several States. The bank capital of Missouri is $8,929,220. The circulation of the banks of that State on the 1st of January, 1863, was about $4,000,000; on the 1st of January, 1864, about $2,000,000; on the 1st of November, 1864,

$1,460,000, and on the 1st of January, 1865, only $965,372. The object now is to drive all that capital into national banking associations, and when you do it what will be the result? You tell me that you are attempting to curtail the circulation, but the very moment you do what you propose you actually put in circulation $8,026,298 instead of the $965,000 now outstanding. And yet you tell me that you wish to decrease the circulation, and thereby enable the Treasury Department to get along with its financial affairs.

Now, let us look at the great State of New York. It has a banking capital of say $108,000,000. What is its circulation? It was $28,000,000 until you went there with your national banks, under the pretext that you intended to curtail the circulation, and you have issued $13,000,000 more, so that, including both State and national bank circulation in New York, there are now $41,500,000 circulation in that State.

How is it in Massachusetts? On the 1st of December, 1864, there was $20,000,000 of circulation in that State. You were not satisfied with that; you said you wanted to curtail the circulation in the State of Massachusetts, and you authorized national banks, and now you have there $19,958,050 of national bank circulation, making a total circulation of $40,303,486. You have increased the circulation nearly $20,000,000, and yet you tell me you are trying to decrease it, and that unless you succeed the Government will be greatly injured.

Pennsylvania was complained of for increasing her bank circulation. How is it in that State? Pennsylvania, on the 1st of December, 1864, had a State bank circulation of $20,323,390. You wanted to decrease the currency, and through your national bank system you have authorized $16,544,160 of national bank paper in that State, making a total circulation in Pennsylvania of nearly $37,000,000 instead of the $20,000,000 that existed there previously, and you tell me that you do it in order to decrease the circulation!

How is it in Vermont? On the 1st of December, 1864, the banks of that gallant little State had a circulation of $5,415,600. You wanted to curtail it. I remember well that it was stated upon this floor less than a year ago that Vermont was expanding her circulation, that Maine was doing so, that all the New England States were doing so. In order to curtail the circulation in Vermont you have established your national banking system, and authorized to be put in circulation by the national banks in that State $1,579,200, making now an aggregate circulation of $6,994,800. All this is done under the plea that you must curtail the circulation of the country!

How is it in Wisconsin? That State, too, I remember, was complained of. Wisconsin, on the 1st of January, 1863, had a circulation of $2,235,105, and on the 1st of December, 1864, $2,248,492; just about the same at each date. But you wanted to curtail the circulation in Wisconsin, and you have authorized to be issued to the national banks $840,000 more, and still the work goes on. You have now an aggregate circulation in the State of Wisconsin of $3,088,492.

You have already in circulation $96,000,000 of the national bank currency, while the State banks have decreased $33,000,000, and you have authorized by a law of the last session $300,000,000 to be issued, and yet all this is done under the plea that it is necessary to curtail the circulation! If the real excuse were given for this legislation I should not object so much, but it is monstrous, in my view, to give such reasons as have been urged upon the floor of the Senate in favor of it.

Then look at the great State so ably represented by the chairman of the Committee on Finance—the great western State of Ohio. I find that on the 1st of January, 1864, the State banks there had a circulation of $5,936,333. I recollect that some time ago the Senator said the State banks in his State had expanded their circulation. I find on the 1st of December, 1864, instead of having expanded their circulation since the 1st of January of that year, they had decreased it to $4,135,439. Since the Senator has got the national banking circulation in operation they have not only $4,000,000 of State bank circulation, but in addition thereto $8,579,870 of national bank circulation, making an aggregate circulation in that State of $12,715,309, nearly three times as much circulation as existed before we began the national bank system; and yet we are told the object of that system is to decrease the circulation!

Mr. President, the State banks, as I have said, are bound at some time to redeem their issues in coin, and they have the coin with which to redeem them. The coin account in the State banks to-day is much larger than the circulation, taking them altogether throughout the Union. How is it with the national banks? How is it with that system which you have established and now declare shall override everything else in this country? I should like to see the coin account of the national banks, having already a capital of $190,000,000, and rapidly increasing. I dare Senators to tell me how much coin there is in those banks. I said, when the national banking system was established, the word "coin" is not known in the act, and coin will not be known in their vaults.

How do the national banks in any other way benefit the operations of the Government? Will some Senator tell me? I want that question answered this evening before this vote is taken. We have been told that if we drive all the State banks out of existence the Government will then get along with its financial operations. Will some Senator tell me how it facilitates the operations of the Government? Shall I be told that individuals will purchase the bonds of the Government provided they authorize those individuals to deposit them with the Treasurer and to receive circulating notes to the extent of ninety per cent. of their par value? Is that the answer? Then I have already declared, and I reassert it, that the State banks in this country hold to-day more of the bonds of the United States than do the national banks. Then why not let capital alone? I have said that you have no constitutional power to go into the States, and to tear down their institutions of banking, any more than I have the right to go into New England and tear down the cotton factories. You have no more authority by your act to do this thing than I have to break up the manufacturing of New England, the sugar-growing interests of Louisiana, or the agricultural interests of the West.

I am well aware that this proposition is going to carry. I feel perfectly confident that it will prevail. I am unable to give any arguments against it which will have any weight with those whose opinions are fixed. I can but submit and leave the future to furnish that conviction which in some cases experience alone can bring. I am no advocate of bank issues, even the best of them. But among systems of banking there is a choice, and the issues of some are infinitely better than those of others.

Sir, this is not the first time that a banking system of this sort has been forced on a community. England went crazy about banking on one occasion. The trouble is that when a nation commences a career of wild and reckless banking no man knows the end thereof. The limit can never be reached. New issues stimulate speculation, and speculation creates demand for additional circulation. Destroying the State banks concentrates the money power and makes it strong in its demands. After the amount now authorized is issued will you not authorize more? Do you suppose you will ever stop the issue of a circulating medium on the public securities of this country? No; you have already passed the point at which you can do it. In less than five years from to-day the legislation of this country will be greatly warped by a moneyed power called the national banking system. You and I will live, if we live but a few years more, to see it a power in the land. We shall be unable to resist it. When they come to Congress to make a demand that their circulation shall be increased, that their capital shall be increased, that new and more favorable acts of incorporation shall be passed, you and I and all of us will have to bow down and acknowledge the superiority of the money power. Nations once were jealous of it. We have ceased to be. We have trampled under foot all such fears. We imagine the nation was once weak. We want it stronger, and to make it so we will give the Government to the money power.

I said there was a rage for banking once in England immediately preceding the South Sea bubble. They got their satisfaction of it. There was a rage for banking in France upon one occasion, and John Law gave the French satisfaction. There is a rage for banking in America, and the national banking system will nauseate the stomach of every man in less than ten years. Every dollar of the public credit of this country is to be made capital upon which you are to issue paper. The public debt of the country is to become the substratum of a circulating medium.

The old prejudice in favor of the precious metals is to be abandoned. Money is the same as public debt. Debt therefore is a public blessing and not a calamity. But for the war we should have had no debt and therefore no safe and sound currency. This new era of prosperity and wealth proposes to give each holder of public indebtedness ninety per cent. of its par value in circulating notes, and by ostracizing all other circulation force the community to take it. During the prevalence of the disease in the English mind on this subject, and before the public debt was created which shortly thereafter gave the South Sea bubble its origin, it was supposed that the lands of the kingdom constituted the proper capital for banks. The rage for bank issues demanded more than the precious metals could redeem, and learned statesmen yielded to the fascinating idea that the Government impress on a piece of paper gave it the intrinsic value of metal, and that wealth increased as bank issues expanded. They did not abandon the thought that the paper should be the representative of something valuable. Having no considerable public debt, each man was to be called on to put in his land as bank capital, and this entitled him to its appraised value in circulating notes. In our case we take the public debt as bank capital, which instead of being wealth or money is the want of either, and to each holder we give circulating notes. England was luckily saved from the consequences of this humbug, only to be tempted into a system scarcely less fatal—I mean the system of issuing notes on the public debt. The assignats of France were based on the confiscated lands of the nobility and clergy falling under the penal decrees of the Revolution, and were a failure.

The land-bank system proposed by Briscoe and Chamberlayne, in England, was ridiculed by Macaulay in one of his essays, as follows:

"Preeminently conspicuous among the political mountebanks whose busy faces were seen every day in the lobby of the House of Commons, were John Briscoe and Hugh Chamberlayne, two projectors worthy to have been members of that academy which Gulliver found at Lagado. These men affirmed that the one cure for every distemper of the State was a land bank. A land bank would work for England miracles such as had never been wrought for Israel, miracles exceeding the heaps of quails and the daily shower of manna. There would be no taxes, and yet the exchequer would be full to overflowing. There would be no poor rates, for there would be no poor. The income of every land-owner would be doubled. The profits of every merchant would be increased. In short, the island would, to use Briscoe's words, be the paradise of the world. The only losers would be the moneyed men, those worst enemies of the nation, who had done more injury to the gentry and yeomanry than an invading army from France would have had the heart to do.

"These blessed effects the land bank was to produce simply by issuing enormous quantities of notes on landed security. The doctrine of the projectors was, that every person who had real property ought to have, besides that property, paper money to the full value of that property. Thus, if his estate was worth £2,000, he ought to have his estate and £2,000 in paper money."

We have only deducted ten per cent.

"Both Briscoe and Chamberlayne treated with the greatest contempt the notion that there could be an over-issue of paper as long as there was for every £10 note a piece of land in the country worth £10."

Our political doctors now tell us that there is no danger of an over-issue provided the national banks make the issues, and in order that the national banks shall have full sway, you must remove the State banks. You will not for a great while maintain any limit on the national bank issues. Are they any better than the issues of the banks of my State with a capital of upward of eight millions, and only $965,000 of circulation, and $2,000,000 of coin in those banks with which to redeem their circulation?

"Nobody," they said, would accuse a goldsmith of over-issuing as long as his vaults contained guineas and crowns to the full value of all the notes which bore his signature. Indeed, no goldsmith had in his vaults guineas and crowns to the full value of all his paper. And was not a square mile of rich land in Taunton Dean at least as well entitled to be called wealth as a bag of gold or silver? The projectors could not deny that many people had a prejudice in favor of the precious metals; and that, therefore, if the land bank were bound to cash its notes, it would very soon stop payment. This difficulty they got over by proposing that the notes should be inconvertible, and that everybody should be forced to take them."

That was a necessary consequence; and now I submit in all reason, that if the object of gentlemen be to stop the inflation of the currency they should commence somewhere else than upon the pitiful amount issued by the State banks. Those banks, with a capital of $400,000,000, have a circulation of only $136,000,000; and they are reducing it all the time. They have reduced it $33,000,000 in the last twelve months; and yet gentlemen say they do not reduce it fast enough. It is very much like the wolf in Æsop's fables, that complained of the lamb for muddying the water above him. It should be confessed that we are determined to sell Government bonds at par. If they fall below that standard, the Government wants the power to pour in upon the country additional circulation until the bonds can be floated. It is upon the same principle that the canal-boat is floated through the lock. The bond can be sold for fifty cents in gold. It is true that the fifty cents will purchase as much as the one hundred cents in paper, but it is thought better to sell the bond for paper apparently at par, but really at a discount. If the bond had always been sold for gold, the Government credit would have been at par to-day; but a vicious system was adopted, whereby we purchase on Government account at currency prices, agreeing ultimately to pay in gold. A great Government, the most powerful on earth, ashamed to sell its bonds at a discount of perhaps five per cent. for gold, is led into a false position, and forced to pay two prices for the subsistence and transportation of its armies and the construction of its navies, because it has to seek a short credit.

But the error is to be continued. I have no power to resist it. This banking system is the legitimate fruit of the first mistake. It will have to run its course. Some things never cease to be used until they blow up. A vicious banking system is one of them. Every system that does not redeem its issues in coin is vicious and corrupt. Every such system will fail. It will bring distress and bankruptcy; but the world will move on. Storms come and darken the skies, but the sun shines again. All will be well at some time. Looking at this banking system I feel as the prophet felt when he gazed on Hazeal. Hazeal committed his crimes, but the world lived on. This is my consolation now. I hope the world may be wiser when one more attempt to make something out of nothing shall have failed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, McDougall, Powell, Riddle, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wiley, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Farwell, Grimes, Harlan, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Cowan, Hale, Harding, Lane of Indiana, Nesmith, Richardson, and Saulsbury—8.

So the Senate refused to strike out the section.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move after the word "association" in the second line of the section to insert the words "or broker."

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the motion if the Senator makes it, though it has been thus far the understanding that the amendments proposed by the Committee on Finance to the bill were first to be gone through with.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not insist on it. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The reading of the bill will be continued and the amendments of the committee will be acted on as they are reached in their order.

The next amendment was in line four of section six, to strike out "six" and insert "two," so as to make the tax on crude petroleum two cents a gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line ten of section six, to strike out "five" before "days" and insert "ten."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line nine of section seven, after "oil" to strike out the words "produced and also the number of gallons," and to insert "barreled or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines eighteen and nineteen of section seven, to strike out the words "produced and also of the number of gallons."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was before the word "re-moved" in line twenty of section seven, to insert "barreled or."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line five of section nine to strike out "tank" before "or," and after "or" to strike out "other."

Mr. VAN WINKLE. The word "tank" is proposed to be stricken out in several places in that section. I suppose one vote will answer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so understood, and that word will be stricken out to make the bill consistent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 51, section twelve, line eight, to strike out the word "act" and to insert the word "law," and in line ten to insert the word "competent" before "jurisdiction," so that the section will read:

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That all persons and every person who shall engage or be concerned in the business of a lottery dealer without having first obtained a license so to do, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall forfeit and pay a penalty of $1,000, to be assessed by the assessor of the proper district and collected as assessed taxes are collected, subject, nevertheless, to the provisions of this law relating to erroneous assessments, and shall, on conviction by any court of competent jurisdiction, suffer imprisonment for a period not exceeding a year, at the discretion of the court. And it shall be the duty of all managers and proprietors, and their agents, to keep or cause to be kept, just and true books of account wherein all their transactions shall be plainly and legibly set forth, which books of account shall at all reasonable times and hours be subject to the inspection of the assessor, assistant assessor, revenue agent, and inspector of the proper district; and any manager, proprietor, agent, or vender under this act, who shall refuse or prohibit such inspection of his or their books, as aforesaid, shall pay a penalty of $1,000 or suffer imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year for every such offense.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 52, section thirteen, line three, to insert the word "ceased" before the word "or," and after the word "has" to insert the word "been;" in lines four and five to strike out the words "was intended to be and shall be assumed to be;" and in line six, after the word "amendment" to insert the words "shall be assumed to be;" so that the section will read:

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the capital of any State bank or banking association which has ceased or shall cease to exist, or which has been or shall be converted into a national bank, for all the purposes of the act to which this is an amendment, shall be assumed to be the capital as it existed immediately before such bank ceased to exist or was converted as aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 52, at the end of section thirteen, to add the following:

And whenever the outstanding circulation of any bank, association, corporation, company, or person, shall be reduced to an amount not exceeding five per cent. of the chartered or declared capital, said circulation shall be free from taxation. And whenever any State bank or banking association has been converted into a national banking association, and such national banking association has assumed the liabilities of such State bank or banking association, including the redemption of its bills, such national banking association shall be held to make the required return and payment on the circulation outstanding, so long as such circulation shall exceed five per cent. of the capital before such conversion of such State bank or banking association.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I move to amend this amendment by striking out "five," wherever it occurs, and inserting "ten;" and also by inserting after the word "capital," in the eleventh line, the words "existing at the time the same was issued." The effect of the amendment will be this: when a State bank shall have reduced its whole circulation to an amount not exceeding ten per cent. of its capital then the tax is not to be assessed, and the tax is to be upon the amount of the capital existing at the time of the assessment. The State Bank of Indiana, for instance, has within the last three years decreased its circulation three fourths, and its capital has decreased precisely the same amount. It certainly would not be proper to tax the capital that existed three years ago, and which does not now exist at all; and it seems to me, when they reduce their circulation to an amount not exceeding ten per cent. of the whole capital stock, the tax should not be imposed; and that is the effect of the amendment that I now propose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is on striking out "five" and inserting "ten."

Mr. GRIMES. I confess that I do not see the propriety of the original proposition as it comes from the committee. It is not the capital the committee propose to tax; it is the circulation of the banks.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will explain to the Senator, and he will see the necessity of it. This section only applies to those State banks that are going into the national system. By the present law, in taxing circulation, we put a tax of one per cent. upon the circulation to the extent of ninety per cent. of the capital, and three per cent. on all above that; and where a bank has become a national banking association, and consequently has ceased to exist as a State bank, except for the purpose of closing up the old bank, the question arose whether the State bank was entitled to pay one per cent. or three per cent. on ninety per cent. of its capital; whether the capital was in existence for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of the tax. That is the only thing in the section. The latter clause of the section is to require a national bank, when it takes the place of a State bank, to pay the taxes and assessments imposed on the State bank. A case occurred, I am told, in Massachusetts where a State bank ceased to exist, and the bank claimed, after having ceased to exist, that it was no longer subject to tax, as it had gone into the national association. The purpose of this section is to make the national association pay the tax on the outstanding circulation of the State bank.

Mr. GRIMES. The latter part of the amendment may be all well enough; but as I read the first clause it directs that where a bank which has had, say half a million of circulation, shall undertake to wind up, and $25,000 of that circulation is still outstanding not collected, that bank, although it may be deriving a profit from this circulation, shall not be compelled to pay any tax upon that amount.

Mr. SHERMAN. The reason of that I neglected to explain to the Senator, and it is this: it is presumed, from long experience, that five per cent. of the circulation of a bank of ten or twenty years' standing is about the amount that has been lost or destroyed in the process of business, and therefore it would be unjust to tax circulation which really did not exist. That was the theory of it. My friend from Indiana thinks that five per cent. is too little. I do not think it is. I think five per cent. would cover the average outstanding circulation of a bank which has been lost or destroyed, and which is therefore no longer in circulation.

Mr. GRIMES. I suppose the bank gets the advantage of this $25,000 that is lost; and I do not think it would be any very great hardship for them to pay five per cent. on it to the Government.

Mr. COLLAMER. How long?

Mr. GRIMES. For a reasonable length of time; until after an opportunity for further legislation on the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON. But the effect of this amendment, whether you make it five or ten per cent., is to say that the State banks may issue five or ten per cent. on their capital without any liability to tax it. It does not follow that they are to wind up because the circulation is reduced.

Mr. GRIMES. Take, for instance, the Bank of Commerce of the city of New York that we by special legislation invited into the national system or to take a national charter. If my recollection is not in error it had a capital of $9,000,000, and the whole amount of its circulation last year was but $1,700.

Mr. SHERMAN. Really they had not any.

Mr. GRIMES. Exactly; but under this provision I suppose they can issue five per cent. or ten per cent. (if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana shall be adopted) upon that $9,000,000 of capital, and they will not be compelled to pay any tax on it.

Mr. SHERMAN. If they have a circulation not exceeding five per cent. of their capital they do not pay a tax; but they are taxed for every dollar over five per cent.

Mr. GRIMES. Exactly; and if the amendment proposed by my friend from Indiana shall be adopted they will be allowed to issue ten per cent. on their capital; and ten per cent. on $9,000,000 will be a very considerable circulation for a bank; or it would be in my State. I am not disposed to enact anything into a law here that will enable that bank to have a circulation to the amount of $450,000 without paying any tax on it.

Mr. FARWELL. By an amendment which has been adopted to this bill by the Senate, if this bank shall pay out one of their bills they are to pay ten per cent. upon it. That is tax enough to keep them from paying it out. No other banks can pay them out, and of course the bank must redeem its own notes as fast as they come in. This is only providing for those cases where they do not come in. The bills cannot circulate and go to the bank if they are not in existence; that is certain.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. The difficulty suggested by the Senator from Iowa is all obviated by a simple statement. By the fifth section of this bill these banks after the 1st of next January will be charged ten per cent. upon all their issues. Now, the Senator seems to suppose that if they are exempt from taxation to the amount of ten per cent. of their capital they may issue to that amount; but there is no danger of that, because they are taxed ten per cent. for every dollar they issue after the 1st day of January next; and that will obviate the difficulty. I suppose that when a bank has reduced its circulation to ten per cent. of its whole capital, with a view to go into the national banking association, it ought to be taxed; but I think the other branch of the amendment more important, that they shall only be taxed upon the amount of the capital existing when the issues are made; and I understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance is willing to agree to that. I do not know whether five per cent. is too little, or ten too much, to cover the loss of notes not in existence, which have gone out of circulation, been destroyed, or obliterated; but the idea that this proposition may authorize a large increase of circulation is obviated entirely by the fifth section, because the bank has no inducement to issue when they are taxed ten per cent. for every dollar they do issue.

Mr. JOHNSON. But I ask the honorable member whether he is perfectly certain that that would be the effect of the fifth section if the eleven section is adopted. The fifth section provides:

And be it further enacted, That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association, shall pay a tax of ten per cent. on the amount of notes of any State bank, or State banking association, paid out by them after the 1st day of January, 1866.

Then this provision is, that when the circulation is reduced to five per cent. of the capital, the circulation shall be free from taxation; that is, free from taxation under this act.

Mr. GRIMES. The fifth section only applies to notes paid out after a certain time.

Mr. JOHNSON. But that does not apply to this. The effect of this will be to exempt from taxation circulation not exceeding five per cent., or ten per cent., if the amendment suggested is adopted.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I know the Senator from Iowa would not wish to do an unjust thing. It is not the purpose to tax the banks that are trying to bring their circulation in. They cannot bring all in; for some is lost, some is destroyed, some not presented. I am informed by a banker of our State, in whom I have great confidence, that in winding up the old Bank of the State of Indiana there was ten per cent. that could not be got in; and the bank had to make provision by making a contract, taking a bond from certain parties running far into the future, to redeem about that amount, which has never come in, because it is lost. Ten per cent. is about the amount that the winding up of that bank showed. It would be outrageous to charge them upon that. This amendment is a very fair proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on striking out "five" wherever it occurs in the committee's amendment and inserting "ten."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the second amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana, in line eleven of the committee's amendment, after the word "capital" to insert "existing at the time the same was issued."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to. The amendment of the committee, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was to add at the end of section fifteen, page 54, the words "unless otherwise provided by this act;" so that it will read:

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That this act shall be in force and effect on and after the 1st day of April, in the year 1865, unless otherwise provided by this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert the following at the end of the bill as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That all persons licensed under the provisions of this act or the act to which this is an amendment, and who are engaged in the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, or of articles produced or manufactured, whether foreign or domestic, shall, within ten days after the 1st day of each and every month, make return, under oath or affirmation, of the amount of goods, wares, and merchandise, or articles sold during the month preceding, and shall pay thereon a tax of one half of one per cent.; and all such persons, in the assessment and collection of the tax imposed by this section, shall be subject to the provisions of law relating to the assessment and collection of taxes of manufacturers, mentioned in the eighty-second section of the act to which this is an amendment, as far as the same are applicable. And the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to make all needful rules and regulations for the assessment and collection of the tax imposed by this section.

Mr. GRIMES. I move to amend the amendment in line nine by striking out the word "half" and inserting the word "fourth," making the tax one fourth of one per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not intend to debate this question. This is the tax on sales. We have put the tax at one half of one per cent. only on the sales of persons engaged in trade. It does not apply to all sales, but only to the sales of persons engaged in trade. This was as near an approximation of the view of the House as it was possible to obtain. I think a tax of one half of one per cent. is small enough. One fourth of one per cent. might in many cases be too insignificant to collect. I hope, therefore, that amendment will not be made.

Mr. COLLAMER. Is this tax to be imposed on all sales?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; it is to be imposed on all sales made by persons who have to take out a license under this law. There is no minimum.

The VICE PRESIDENT put the question on the amendment to the amendment, and declared that the "noes" appeared to have it.

Mr. GRIMES. I think this question important enough to have a division of the Senate upon it. I am satisfied that a tax of one half of one per cent. on sales will be the most onerous measure ever passed by Congress; but I think a tax of one fourth of one per cent. could be borne by the people of the country.

Mr. HOWE. It would not pay for collecting.

Mr. GRIMES. Has the Senator ever made any calculation as to the amount that would be derived from a tax of one fourth of one per cent.? Will he tell us how much it would be upon all the sales that are made by the persons who are required to take out licenses in this country?

Mr. HOWE. You tell us.

Mr. GRIMES. More than fifty million dollars would be realized. I know that these gentlemen who are members of the Finance Committee imagine that any calculation or any statement made by gentlemen who are not connected with it is necessarily unsound; but I think a tax of one fourth of one per cent. on all sales made in this country is just about as much as the people are prepared to stand.

Mr. POWELL. I am opposed to the adoption of this section. I concur with the honorable Senator from Iowa that it would be one of the most odious measures that could possibly be passed. It is not my purpose to make any extended argument on the subject. This is simply a tax on sales. It is a revival of the doctrines that prevailed in Spain some two hundred years ago under the rule of Philip II. I believe there are but two nations on the face of the earth that ever indulged in such a tax as this: one was Spain, and the other was Naples; and they have both abandoned it. The proposition of the Committee on Finance is this:

That all persons licensed under the provisions of this act or the act to which this is an amendment, and who are engaged in the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, or of articles produced or manufactured, whether foreign or domestic, shall, within ten days after the 1st day of each and every month, make return, under oath or affirmation, of the amount of goods, wares, and merchandise, or articles sold during the month preceding, and shall pay thereon a tax of one half of one per cent.

That provision would send the tax-gatherer once every month into the house of every business man in this whole country. The whole doctrine is odious, and one that never should be permitted to exist for one moment on the statute-book of any enlightened commercial people. I am aware that this tax was recommended in the report of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, a gentleman for whom I entertain the most profound respect; and I regret, for the fame of that distinguished man, that he ever made such a recommendation. I believe it was recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, but was voted down by that body. At this late period of the session I will not attempt any elaborate argument upon it. I know that under it articles may be taxed twenty times before they reach the consumer. Those who buy from the importing merchant will have to pay the tax. They sell to the wholesale dealers, and they will have to pay it. They sell again to the jobbers, and they will have to pay it; and then when the consumer buys, he will have to pay one half of one per cent.; and at last the whole tax falls on the consumer. Every commodity that comes from one of your manufacturing establishments and is sold has to pay this tax. Then the wholesale dealer pays it when he sells it. The various merchants throughout the country to whom he sells it have to pay it also; and so, perhaps, the tax may be paid twenty times over on the same article before reaching the consumer.

Senators who desire the commercial prosperity of this country should not entertain for one moment such a proposition as this. I will read to the Senate the opinions of two or three men on the subject who I suppose are entitled to some consideration; and I beg Senators to listen to what these men say. I will first read an extract from Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations. Speaking of a tax on sales, Mr. Smith says:

"In consequence of the notion that duties upon consumable goods were taxes upon the profits of merchants, those duties have in some countries been repeated upon every successive sale of the goods. If the profits of the merchant importer or merchant manufacturer were taxed, equality seemed to require that those of all the middle buyers who intervened between either of them and the consumers should likewise be taxed. The famous alcavala of Spain seems to have been established upon this principle. It was at first a tax of ten per cent., afterward of fourteen per cent., and is at present only six per cent., upon the sale of every sort of property, whether movable or immovable; and it is repeated every time the property is sold.

"The levying of this tax requires a multitude of revenue officers, sufficient to guard the transportation of goods, not only from one province to another, but from one shop to another. It subjects not only the dealers in some sorts of goods, but those in all sorts, every farmer, every manufacturer, every merchant and shopkeeper, to the continual visits and examination of the tax-gatherers. Through the greater part of a country in which a tax of this kind is established, nothing can be produced for distant sale. The produce of every part of the country must be proportioned to the consumption of the neighborhood. It is to the alcavala, accordingly, that Ustaritz imputes the ruin of the manufactures of Spain. He might have imputed to it, likewise, the declension of agriculture, it being imposed not only upon manufactures, but upon the rude produce of the land.

"In the kingdom of Naples there is a similar tax of three per cent. upon the value of all contracts, and consequently upon that of all contracts of sale. It is both lighter than the Spanish tax, and the greater part of towns and parishes are allowed to pay a composition in lieu of it. They levy this composition in what manner they please, generally in a way that gives no interruption to the interior commerce of the place. The Neapolitan tax, therefore, is not near so ruinous as the Spanish one."—Adam Smith's Wealth of Nations, vol. 3, page 493.

Now, sir, we are about to enact that odious policy of Spain. It is a fact, I believe, that during the whole time that tax existed in Spain they had no bank of issue in that country; their commerce was stricken down; their agricultural wealth destroyed; and they became poorer and poorer every day. It is further true that when the cruel Duke of Alva attempted to enforce this policy on the Netherlands the Hollanders revolted against it more than against any other imposition attempted by that cruel and narrow-minded bigot. They resented the imposition of this law more fiercely than they did the attack on their religion. The Hollanders were then the wisest commercial people on the face of the earth, and they understood the ruinous and destructive policy that was sought to be imposed upon them by their Spanish rulers.

M. Say, another eminent author, in his work on political economy, speaks quite as pointedly against the imposition of such a tax as this. He says:

"Taxes upon transfer, besides the mischief of pressing upon capital, are a clog to the circulation of property. But has the public any interest in its free circulation? So long as the object is in existence, is it not as well placed in one hand as in another? Certainly not. The public has a perpetual interest in the utmost possible freedom of its circulation, because by that means it is most likely to get into the hands of those that can make the most of it."—M. Say's Political Economy, page 259.

Thus speaks M. Say, an eminent political economist, on this subject. I will now, with the indulgence of the Senate, read a very short extract from another distinguished writer, John Stuart Mill, who is certainly one of the greatest intellects that has written on this or any other subject in this century. Mr. Mill says:

"Of taxes on contracts, the most important are those on the transfer of property, chiefly on purchases and sales. Taxes on the sale of consumable commodities are simply taxes on those commodities. If they affect only some particular commodities they raise the prices of those commodities, and are paid by the consumer. If the attempt were made to tax all purchases and sales, which, however absurd, was for centuries the law of Spain, the tax, if it could be enforced, would be equivalent to a tax on all commodities, and would not affect prices; if levied from the sellers, it would be a tax on profits; if from the buyers, a tax on consumption; and neither class could throw the burden upon the other."—Mill's Political Economy, book 5, chapter 2.

I do not believe there is a writer on political economy of any note whatever but what has denounced in the strongest terms this idea of a tax upon sales. It is utterly at war with the free circulation of property. It is utterly at war with the commerce of any nation on earth. The Senate are now about to trick themselves out in the old, effete garments that were worn by the Spaniards, that destroyed their commerce, destroyed their agriculture, and destroyed all their industrial pursuits. Why, sir, all other nations have long since abandoned it; and yet we are recommended here to assume this policy. I shall never cast my vote for such a proposition, or for any bill that has such an odious feature in it. We are evidently a great commercial people as well as a great agricultural people, and we should foster those great interests. We should not with such an odious tax as this ruin our commerce, ruin our agriculture, and ruin all our industrial interests.

I know this tax is said to be small. It is smaller than those the Spaniards imposed, a great deal smaller than those the rulers of Naples imposed; but the wise commercial nations of the earth have long since abandoned all such taxes. Why, sir, if you collect that tax strictly (but that would be impossible) you would get tribute from one single article perhaps twenty times within one week. It is utterly wrong; it is wrong in principle, and will work injuriously to the country. I could not allow it to pass without entering my protest against it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I desire to ask what is the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on striking out "one half" and inserting "one fourth."

Mr. POWELL. I understood that question was decided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa asked for a division, and then the question came up.

Mr. POWELL. I made my remarks against the whole section.

Mr. GRIMES and Mr. CONNESS called for the yeas and nays upon the amendment to the amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. As the yeas and nays are called, I desire to say a word. I do not defend this tax on principle; but if we are to collect it at all, I believe one half of one per cent. is the least sum that it is worth while to collect. This tax will be universally distributed over a vast number of persons, and if we reduce it to one fourth of one per cent. it would then be only one forty-eighth of one per cent. per month, as it is to be collected monthly, and it would be too insignificant to collect. It is deemed best to collect it every month; but a tax of one forty-eighth of one per cent. would be too small and too insignificant to collect. I hope therefore the Senate will try the experiment with a tax of one half of one per cent.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I desire to make an inquiry of the Senator. I understand this section to be the imposition of a tax of one half of one per cent. upon the amount of sales. If there is a sale of $100, the tax upon that would be fifty cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Then I want to know what the Senator means by saying it is a tax of one forty-eighth of one per cent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say that the monthly tax will only be one forty-eighth of the aggregate yearly sales; that is one fourth of one per cent. per month is equivalent to one forty-eighth of one per cent. on the aggregate sales in the year.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Harlan, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Morgan, Powell, Riddle, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Willey, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Clark, Conness, Dixon, Doollittle, Farwell, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Wade, Wilkinson, and Wilson—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Foot, Hale, Harding, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, Saulsbury, and Sprague—9.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the section as reported from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON. Before the vote is taken on that section I wish to say a single word. I am opposed to the tax on sales altogether. I think it is unjust in every way and pernicious; that it will give more trouble to citizens than any other form of taxation you can adopt; and, in my judgment, will be exceedingly obnoxious. It will be obnoxious not only to the man who is engaged in buying and selling, but obnoxious to the producer and manufacturer.

You first provide by this bill that nobody shall be engaged in buying and selling except he takes a license, and now you provide that whoever takes a license and engages under the license in buying and selling is to pay a tax of one half of one per cent. on everything he sells. In the first place, what is the effect of that upon the producer, because this is applicable to articles produced here, to our cereals, tobacco, and everything that grows in the country that gets in the hands of the commission merchant? He cannot carry on his business as a commission merchant without taking out a license, and when he sells it he is to pay the one half of one per cent. What is the effect on the producer? He will say to the producer, "You ask me to buy $10,000 worth of tobacco or corn; I am willing to give you $10,000 for it, provided I can sell it without being subject to a tax; but when I do sell it I am required to pay one half of one per cent. upon the amount of the sale; and I will just deduct that in advance out of the sum that I pay you; in other words, I will pay you $10,000 less one half of one per cent." And so in relation to the manufacturer. The manufacturer is charged now with almost every form of taxation, as is the producer. You tax us all on our incomes, and you tax the men who are engaged in these sales on their income; but when the manufacturer goes to his commission merchant and wants to sell the product of his factory, he gets the same answer from his commission merchant that I suppose would be given, and must be given, by the commission merchant who deals in selling the productions of the country. He will tell him, "I will give you $10,000 for your manufacture willingly, because it is worth that, and I could sell it at a profit that would be amply sufficient to compensate me for the trouble of sale; but here I am liable to a tax of one half of one per cent. upon it; and I will give you the $10,000 less that one half of one per cent."

But over and above that, even supposing the tax was all right in itself, the idea of having an officer of the Government going every month into every house which may be engaged in buying and selling, I think will be exceedingly odious; and although the tax falls, in the first instance, upon the producer or the manufacturer, it eventually falls upon the consumer.

Mr. COWAN. I agree to every word that has fallen from the lips of the Senator from Maryland. I think, if there is anything in the world we can learn from the experience of the past, it is that this tax would be not only odious and mischievous, but actually ruinous to ourselves. I am willing to do anything to raise revenue for the support of the Government in any way that will not insure to ourselves our own destruction and the destruction of our commerce. Sir, what is commerce? It is the transfer from hand to hand of all commodities freely in the community. What do you propose to do here? To catch it precisely at the instant of that transfer, and incumber it, and therefore prevent it; and not to do that fairly, but the further it goes the greater the burden it has to bear.

Mr. President, I do not know but that for the purpose of raising money now at this conjuncture, I would agree to almost anything, but I am unwilling to render myself ridiculous and absurd to no purpose. I am unwilling that we in this, the nineteenth century, in this age of light and knowledge, in this age when we have the experience of the past to guide us, should clothe ourselves in the cast-away garments of bygone generations and attempt to do that which the experience of all nations heretofore has taught us is a fallacy and a delusion.

I have no doubt that for every dollar we should get by this means of taxation we should lose a dozen. I cannot conceive of any scheme which would be better calculated to destroy the commerce of the country than this. Why not? I have said that the further the commodity travels from the producer to the consumer the greater the burden that it bears. Why should that be? Why should the man who procures a commodity after a dozen transfers be taxed twelve times as much as the man who procures it from the producer immediately? How is commerce to endure these burdens? How is it to regulate itself under these inflictions? Why, sir, it is to produce stagnation and death; it is to tie the arteries of commerce; it is to tie its nerves; it is to destroy its motive power and check its vitality; and what then? Repentance will come too late. I hope that this scheme at least, of all the wild, mad schemes that are suggested in this, the hour of our pecuniary trouble, will not be adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The consideration of the bill will be suspended temporarily to enable the Chair to receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPherson, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate to authorize the continuance of the joint committee on the conduct of the war for thirty days after the termination of the present session of Congress, with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending 30th June, 1866; and that it had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. No. 600) for the better organization of the subsistence department.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 800) to establish the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 176) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance to Paul S. Forbes $250,000 additional out of the sum to be paid him under his contract for building a steam screw sloop-of-war.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. COWAN. The message which has just been received from the House informs us that they have concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill. I desire now to submit that report, and I ask that it be concurred in.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to know what that report is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending 30th June, 1866, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their fourth amendment.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the second and third amendments of the Senate.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the sixth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: In line three of said amendment strike out the words "any railroad" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Illinois Central railroad;" and strike out all of said amendment after the word "States" in line five; and that the Senate agree to the same as so modified.

EDGAR COWAN,

HENRY WILSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

THADDEUS STEVENS,

E. B. WASHBURN,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] desires to be heard on this report, and I suggest that it be laid over until he comes in. He is now out of the Chamber.

Mr. COWAN. I am aware that the Senator from Illinois desires to be heard, and I am perfectly willing that he shall be. I desired to make the report at the same time that the bill came from the House.

Mr. POWELL. I have sent for the Senator from Illinois, and I presume he will be here in a moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be passed over informally.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Finance proposing a tax on sales.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. This tax has been spoken of as a light tax; but when it reaches my constituents it will have been imposed two or three times; and every time it is imposed the former tax will be added to the capital upon which it is to be levied and the profit on the goods made by the middleman and the jobber. I do not understand, or I may have misunderstood, the remark made by the chairman of the Committee on Finance just now, that if we reduced this tax to one fourth of one per cent. it would be only one forty-eighth of the amount of the annual sales. I think if you put a tax of one half of one per cent. this month, and a half per cent. next month, and a half per cent. the next month, and continue on to the end of the year, he will have to pay the half per cent. on the whole amount sold during the year.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend must have misunderstood me. I said the tax was a monthly tax of one forty-eighth of the aggregate sales for the year.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. What application had that?

Mr. SHERMAN. Showing that it was a very small tax.

Mr. VAN WINKLE. I think the argument was used by the chairman of the committee to convince the Senator from Iowa that it was an exceedingly light tax and only amounted to one forty-eighth upon the sales of the year. Otherwise I do not see that it had any application.

My great objection to this section and to this mode of taxation is that it taxes every resale. It may be remembered by many Senators that when this question of levying internal duties was first agitated, or about that time, the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York and the Board of Trade of the city of Boston proposed that the whole tax, I believe, should be levied by a tax upon sales. They stated that in that way the tax would be paid primarily by those who were able to advance it, and they resembled it to our former mode of collecting taxes on duties by an impost upon goods imported, so that the consumer had it in his power to pay it or not by taking or rejecting the goods, and that in many instances he scarcely felt it. When I read that proposition I attached a meaning to it, and I do not know whether it was right or wrong; but it is very easy to see that if I had the right view of it, a tax upon sales might be a beneficial tax in the end by saving us from these numerous excises and prevent the tax-gatherer from entering into our houses to watch us and pry upon us, and many other inconveniences that always do attach to such taxes.

But, sir, I understood the proposition made by the Chamber of Commerce of New York and the Board of Trade of Boston (two most respectable bodies, and certainly composed of gentlemen whom we may suppose to be as well acquainted with these subjects as anybody else) to be, that this tax on sales should only be laid upon goods when they were sold from first hand; so that the tax would not be repeated every time the goods changed hands; and I think I can see that the benefits which it was alleged would flow from it might be realized in that way. We should certainly be enabled to collect the taxes easier, and so far as I perceive, it would operate in that gentle way in which the old collection of our duties upon imports did.

It must be observed that the taxes, to which allusion has been made, which were laid on sales in Naples and Spain were respectively of eleven per cent. and fourteen per cent., and that those taxes were laid upon every resale of the goods, and it is probable in the condition of things that existed in those countries many years ago that goods changed hands more frequently than they now do. It is conceded that the effect of the tax then was to break up all their business, to break down their manufactures, and to throw the nations that persisted in it a great ways back in the march of civilization.

Another objection that I have to this section is, that this tax on sales will reach every article manufactured in this country, and, so far as I perceive, will also reach every article imported. This bill proposes to tax every description of manufacture twenty per cent. additional. The article that before paid five cents is required to pay six cents under this bill, and now it is proposed to add another tax of one half of one per cent. on the sale of all these articles. Are gentlemen so clear that many of these articles can bear this additional tax? Are they so clear that they are going to put more money in the Treasury by increasing taxes so rapidly? The chairman of the committee stated that this was in its nature an obnoxious tax; and I agree that if it is to be imposed upon every resale it is certainly an obnoxious tax; but notwithstanding that he considers it an obnoxious tax he says he is willing to try the experiment. I am not. A tax may not be the best tax that can be proposed, and yet we may find it proper to lay it; but if there are such objections to it as would entitle it to be called obnoxious, I think we had better let it alone. The true principle of taxation would be to levy our taxes alone on property; but it has always been held that in a state of war, such as we are now in, other descriptions of taxes may be resorted to; and the income tax is one of them. It is considered, or has been considered heretofore, a war tax; and when the British Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed the present income tax of Great Britain it was at the breaking out of the Crimean war, and it was laid under his express promise that when the war was over the tax would be taken off.

If this tax is to operate, as I suppose it will, as a tax upon every resale I think it will be utterly a very obnoxious tax; and nine tenths, if not ninety-nine hundredths, of my constituents, if they do not have to pay four times, will at least have to pay it three times over.

Mr. CONNESS. All taxes are obnoxious and odious, and taxation is obnoxious and odious in proportion to its extent.

Mr. WILKINSON. Including the whisky tax.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not even except the whisky tax. There are no class of men who cry out so loudly as the men who deal in whisky when we undertake to tax them.

Now, Mr. President, there has been a great deal said of the extent of our taxes; the burden that they are upon the people; and yet it is a fact that there has been no period in the history of this country when the people generally were so well off as they are now; when so much wealth has been made and accumulated in the face of all this taxation. The time may come when we shall be called upon to take off some of these burdens; to lighten the taxes; but in my opinion this is the time for imposing them, if ever such a time is to occur.

Of all taxes I think this is the most equitable. It will work in this way: here, we will say, is a poor man whose entire earnings through the year do not exceed from three hundred to five or six hundred dollars. He cannot purchase more than three or five or six hundred dollars' worth of goods, and his tax is very small; he scarcely feels it. But here is a citizen of wealth and affluence, who lives luxuriously and spends $25,000 a year. He pays a tax proportionably, and can afford to pay it. Here is your corner grocery at which the poor deal, and if the entire yearly business or sales of the man reach ten or twenty thousand dollars he is doing a good business; it is as much as he expects to do; and yet a tax of one half of one per cent. on that is not a great amount of money for him to pay. But here again is Stewart, of New York, who sells over forty millions a year, and within whose door poor persons never enter to deal, for they have no business there. Those who enter there pay a tax; they pay a tithe; and who are more able to pay a tithe than they?

The country, you say, wants money. Of course it does. Is there any way in which it can be more equitably collected than by a tax of this kind? Gentlemen say you impose it over and over again by every sale. That is the nature of nearly all taxation where commodities are changing hands constantly. I apprehend that the country can bear this tax. In my opinion, there is no kind of tax that can be imposed so equitably as this. Let us try to fill the Treasury. Let that be done if possible; and then we shall have an approximation to an equal value between the paper money of our country and gold, the standard value; and then the prices of all commodities will decrease; the cost at which the Government can conduct its affairs will decrease, and we can lighten the burdens of taxation; but I cannot understand, in view of the general prosperity of the country, why there is resistance to a tax of this kind that must necessarily fall most severely upon those who can best afford it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FARWELL. I propose to offer an amendment to the amendment, and I do not propose to say anything in advocacy of it. I have considerable doubt about the propriety of this tax, but the amendment that I propose would make it entirely satisfactory to me, and perhaps the chairman of the committee will accept it. After the word "applicable" in the fifteenth line, I move to insert:

Provided, That all sums received under this section shall be used for retiring from circulation the national currency.

Mr. SHERMAN. That will be inconsistent with the section we adopted yesterday, which requires all this money to go into the national Treasury, to be disbursed on warrant, and would create confusion in the system. I hope it will not be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the amendment of the committee, resulted—yeas 20, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Conness, Doolittle, Farwell, Foster, Harris, Howard, Howe, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Sherman, Stewart, Trumbull, Wilkinson, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Collamer, Cowan, Davis, Grimes, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Riddle, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, and Wright—20.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Carlile, Dixon, Foot, Hale, Harding, McDougall, Nesmith, Richardson, and Salisbury—10.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas are 20 and the nays are 20, and the Chair decides affirmatively.

Mr. SHERMAN. The twelfth section of the bill should be stricken out. At least the committee reported that it should be stricken out; but it is not so printed; it is not included in brackets.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The twelfth section will be stricken out if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance beg leave to withdraw the next two amendments. Mr. JOHNSON. Why?

Mr. SHERMAN. One of them is to provide for a new Auditor. We are satisfied that a new Auditor is not called for at present. If any Senator desires it, the two sections can be read; but I do not think it necessary. They are not very material. We ask leave to withdraw them, or they might be voted down. Perhaps it would be just as well to take the vote and negative them. That would probably make the record better.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Those two sections will be considered as withdrawn, and the next section reported by the committee will be read.

The Secretary read the next amendment, which was to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. —. And he it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, to inquire and report, at the earliest practicable moment, upon the subject of raising, by taxation, such revenue as may be necessary in order to supply the wants of the Government, having regard to, and including, the sources from which such revenue should be drawn, and the best and most efficient mode of raising the same; and that such commission have power to inquire into the manner and efficiency of the present and past methods of collecting the internal revenue, and to take testimony in such manner and under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. And such commissioners shall receive for their services $300 a month for the time necessarily employed, and their necessary traveling expenses.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think the attention of the Senate ought to be called to this section. It is a provision to appoint three commissioners to make a report to Congress about what taxes ought to be levied, to instruct Congress about what taxes ought to be levied, three commissioners at $300 per month each, $900 a month, and the machinery connected with such a commission. It is the same as saying that the officer in charge of the collection of the internal revenue is not fit for his place. We obtain information through the heads of Departments. That is the constitutional mode of getting information before Congress. If the Commissioner having charge of this business is not competent, after having had practical connection with the business during the course of a whole year, to inform us on this subject, the opinion of men who make up speculative opinions simply upon their reasoning, without having practical knowledge of the operation of the law by administering it, will not be very valuable.

Mr. SHERMAN. This is the same question we had up here the other day, and it is regarded by the present Secretary as of the highest importance. I know, from my own experience in connection with this tax bill, that although there is a great deal of wisdom in Congress, yet for the want of information that could be derived from such a commission as this we are not the wisest legislators upon all the details and practical workings of the tax bill. Such commissioners are provided in England and France. In England there is a board of permanent commissioners. The expense is comparatively trifling. These commissioners will no doubt institute examinations in New York, and other places, of the highest importance. It is impossible for the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to devote his time to this class of business. His time is constantly employed in deciding legal questions, and other questions arising in the course of business in his bureau, constraining the law, and it is impossible for him to consider fully the particular rules of trade, the mode and manner of levying taxes, the mode and manner of avoiding deceptions and frauds and evasions of the tax.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is not the board in England composed of a number of officers connected with the administration of the law?

Mr. SHERMAN. I am not sure how it is composed; but in my deliberate judgment such a board of commissioners as this, organized one year ago, would have saved us more than a million dollars. I am not saying anything against the Commissioner. He has enough to do to administer the law. I hope, therefore, that this amendment, which I look upon as more valuable than any tax in the bill, will be adopted. It will cost but little. The President ought to select three of the best men in the United States, the most practical and successful business men in the United States, to perform this duty, and I have no doubt he will do so.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not think it necessary for me to add anything as regards the merit of this proposition. I have no doubt of its value; but I wish to have it amended by saying that they shall report the facts and report a bill.

NEW SERIES.....No. 79.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are obliged to make a report, but can they report a bill in the technical sense?

Mr. COLLAMER. The report can be made in the form of a bill and communicated to us. I move to add the words "and report the facts and a bill in pursuance thereof."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Where will the Senator have his amendment inserted?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not see where it can come in.

Mr. COLLAMER. If there is no other place, I will put it at the end of the section: "and that they report the facts and a bill in pursuance thereof."

Mr. FOSTER. I suggest that the amendment be made after the word "report," in the third line, so as to make it read, "to inquire and report the facts and a bill."

Mr. COLLAMER. That will do.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be put in after the word "report," in the third line.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. I shall vote cheerfully for this committee of three. Twenty minutes ago I should have voted against it; but after the vote of the Senate to tax all sales, I am satisfied some commission of sensible men is necessary on this subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. COWAN. It must be obvious to every reflecting man who for one minute will consider the mode in which we get up a revenue bill here, that nothing better than we produce could be expected. In every other civilized country that I know of, there is a minister whose business it is to frame, fabricate, and put before the legislative assembly, these bills. He is a man supposed to be specifically and particularly acquainted with the subject upon which he acts. That bill is carefully framed and elaborated; it is a whole; it is one entirety; all its parts accord; and it operates as a system; and he demands that that be passed; and if it is not passed he goes out of office. That should be the way here. It should be the business of the Secretary of the Treasury, or somebody under him, to send down his revenue bills here carefully framed and made up; and if the Congress of the United States refuses to pass those bills he should withdraw and retire at once from office, because we cannot expect him to carry on the finances of the Government without giving him that which he desires. But how is it done now? Here are two or three hundred men in this and in the other House, none of whom know much about this subject, and yet all of them know as much as men ordinarily, and it is left to them to concoct a bill; and what have we? Why, such an incongruous monster as this revenue bill, particularly when you attach to it such amendments as we now make, perhaps the world has hardly ever seen. It is exactly what the poet called the "disjecta membra;" that is, the beast with his legs, and arms, and limbs of every kind; lying about in confusion. All that could be avoided, and can be avoided, by this commission; and I have no doubt that instead of saving $1,000,000, we shall gain $50,000,000 by it, if we are willing to accept it in its true spirit and act upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has it been amended in the way suggested by the Senator from Vermont?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not. The Senator from Ohio suggests that the amendment come in at line eight.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the effect the same?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. COWAN. I thought it was to come in after the word "report"—"to report the facts and by bill."

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the following words do not jingle.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was adopted.

The next amendment was to add the following as a new section:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of April next, and during the present war, and for one year thereafter, all acts and parts of acts granting allowances or bounties on the tonnage of vessels engaged in the bank or other cod fisheries be, and the same are hereby, and during the time aforesaid shall have no force or effect.

Mr. POWELL. I move to amend that section by striking out in the second and third lines the words "and during the present war and for one year thereafter," and also to strike out in the sixth and seventh lines the words "and during the time aforesaid shall have no force or effect," and to insert the word "repealed;" so that the section will read:

That from and after the 1st day of April next, all acts and parts of acts granting allowances or bounties on the tonnage of vessels engaged in the bank or other cod fisheries be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. MORRILL. I demand the yeas and nays on that.

Mr. FARWELL. I hope my colleague will not object to the amendment to the amendment. Perhaps the amendment to the amendment may as well be adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays for the present.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected. The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FARWELL. I desire to say a word on this subject. I know it is a very unreasonable hour, and I certainly shall occupy but very little of the time of the Senate upon this question. I am willing to make this proposition to the Senate and to the country: that if the chairman of the Committee on Finance will provide a drawback of the amount of duties paid by these fishermen for the salt to cure their fish, the bounties shall be repealed. I dislike the word bounty. It used to be a pretty good word, but it has been brought to terribly mean uses lately. [Laughter.] I do not wish to have it understood that Massachusetts and Maine have a bounty from anybody. Massachusetts has sand at one end and rocks at the other, and the center is a mixture of the two; but still her people have managed to accumulate a great deal of property without much bounty from anybody. Why, sir, the sands of Cape Cod are to-day producing a crop more valuable than the best lands in Iowa or Illinois, through the industry, ingenuity, and persevering spirit of the educated yeomanry of Massachusetts. They have discovered that the cranberry would grow on those sands, and they are raising a crop more valuable to them and to the country than is produced upon the most fertile soil. They do not need any bounties, and my State does not need any.

But, sir, you have adopted the policy everywhere that you will not tax an interest that you cannot protect. Here you have a reciprocity treaty with Great Britain. You tax none of the products of her fisheries. Not one cent of tax can you lay upon the product of the fisheries of Great Britain; and the British provinces have the fishing grounds right at their door. They get their salt at the lowest possible cost without any duty upon it; but upon the salt which our fishermen use to-day they pay much more in duties to the Government than this bounty amounts to. Will you destroy this interest which is bringing into the country three or four million dollars' worth of food, and most acceptable food, too, to many of us? Mr. President, I am sure you would not like to be deprived of your fish. You would go down and catch them yourself, if you could not get them in any other way. I should, certainly. I say again, will you destroy this interest which is taking up out of the deep four or five million dollars' worth a year and annihilate it, as you must do, so far as it is an American interest, if you adopt this section without amending your revenue laws by either giving them protection or striking off the duties upon the foreign articles they consume?

There are a great many men engaged in this pursuit. If there is any poor class of men in New England it is the fishermen of New England; men who endure everything; men who are engaged this very winter, with the thermometer at zero, along George's bank in more hazard of their lives than they would be in front of the enemy at Petersburg. The loss of life is larger in these fisheries every winter, compared with the number engaged in it, than it is in the Army of the United States; and they get barely a support for their families. Why do they do it? Because, sir, it is an occupation that every man loves. You recollect the story of Franklin, who went out one day and found a man fishing, and asked him what kind of luck he had. He said "Pretty good." "How many have you got?" "I have not got any yet." "But I suppose you have had several good bites." "No," he replied; "I have not had any bites, but I had a glorious nibble a little while ago," [laughter;] and he thought that was pretty good luck. That is the luck of fishermen. As a class, they are poor. There are a great many engaged in it, and a great many interested in it. A great many men have built up establishments for curing these fish, for storing them, and wharves for the accommodation of fishermen, and have built little vessels to carry on this business for the sake of the trade. These men go out and do not make upon an average more than $250 for a year's work. Now it is proposed to take this little pittance which the Government has been giving them from them, and to tax them upon the salt they use, and their necessary outfits; for everything is taxed; cordage, duck, salt, everything they use is taxed at a very high rate; and you propose to make them go down upon the Newfoundland and George's banks and compete with these Nova Scotia fishermen, and let them come into our market and sell upon equal terms with our fishermen. I do not believe the Senate has any idea of doing that.

I know my colleague has discussed this question before in the Senate almost exhaustively, and it has been discussed by other gentlemen, and therefore I do not propose to go into the question in a national aspect. I only wish to state these plain matters of fact. The chairman of the committee knows what the tax on salt is, and he knows, or ought to know, that it takes a bushel of salt to cure a kente of fish; and if one of these vessels gets $300 bounty and has procured but three hundred kentles of fish, she has not made any fare; she has not got anything to divide for the owners; nothing hardly to pay the men; and the duty upon the salt itself, which must be paid in gold, when you reduce it to currency is more than the pittance you have given to divide among these men as a bounty. But, sir, I have said all I choose to say on this subject at this time.

Mr. MORRILL. I regret to be obliged to trouble the Senate at this late hour, but I am not inclined to allow this amendment to pass without some opposition.

I insist, Mr. President, that according to the ordinary principles of legislation, this provision ought not to be on this bill. It is not a question for the Committee on Finance. It is not a question of finance. It is a maxim, I believe, that he is a wise chancellor who magnifies his jurisdiction; and on that principle the Committee on Finance of the Senate will come to be very famous. During the present session there have been three or four bills reported from the Committee on Finance which have very slight reference to the subject of finance. This is one of them. Within a few days, an elaborate bill, touching the whole question of navigation, was reported from the Committee on Finance, a bill having no possible reference whatever to the subject of finance.

Mr. SHERMAN. What bill was that?

Mr. MORRILL. The bill regulating the importation of foreign immigrants.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was referred to the Committee on Finance by a special vote.

Mr. MORRILL. Referred on the special motion of the honorable Senator, the chairman of the committee, and reported back by him.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, it was referred to the Committee on Finance, because I had been the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture that introduced the original bill, and the very moment the chairman of that committee returned from his canvass in Kansas, that moment I ceased to have anything to do with the bill, and he took charge of it. It was a mere matter of personal consideration, because I had introduced the bill to which it was an amendment. I hope the Senator will not charge that sin to the Committee on Finance. I voluntarily assumed it at the moment, and I voluntarily assume it now; but I turned the bill over, the very moment the honorable Senator from Kansas came back, to him.

Mr. MORRILL. And that is precisely what I complain of; that the Committee on Finance will interfere with matters that do not belong to them.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Committee on Finance had not anything to do with it.

Mr. MORRILL. The Committee on Finance did receive the bill and did report upon it. It is a subject of commerce and navigation, over which the Committee on Finance have no control and no jurisdiction. It is this system of legislation that I object to; and what I am arguing about now is obnoxious to this charge.

But, sir, that is not all. At a more recent period, on a mere question of appropriation, the ordinary appropriations made up by the Departments of the Government, to whom the appropriations belong, the Committee on Finance undertook to change the whole policy of this Government in regard to the national defenses, and told the Senate and the country that your national defenses, involving an expenditure of $150,000,000, were useless, and worse than useless.

Now, sir, I stand here to object to the Committee on Finance taking cognizance of subjects that belong elsewhere; and this question falls precisely within that category. This is not a question belonging to the Committee on Finance in any respect whatever. It is a question of national policy. It affects your commercial marine and your Navy, and the element of finance in it is secondary and subordinate. When questions of national policy are to be considered they are to be considered by the appropriate committees; and the Committee on Finance is not to dash in our faces here by a stroke of the pen these policies of the nation which have stood for half a century.

I stand here to object; and I am not to be told when the committee load down their bills with measures which do not belong to them that the time of the session is precious, and that we are not to consume it in the discussion of these measures. If the Committee on Finance desire that their bills should run lightly, they must load them lightly. If they choose to load them with measures which belong elsewhere, which they have not the capacity to consider, which they were not constructed to consider it, does not lie in their mouths to object if Senators who feel charged with the consideration of interests which affect them and their constituents are obliged on these questions, contrary to their inclination, to examine them.

Now, sir, what is the ground upon which the Committee on Finance present this subject to the Senate? It is said they will save to the country some three or four hundred thousand dollars. I believe last year about four hundred thousand dollars was paid to this interest. If this was vital I would not object, or if other interests were discriminated against I would not object; but how is that? In the appropriation bill passed the other day I noticed one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars, more or less, for the surveys of the lakes. Are surveys of the western lakes necessary to the prosecution of this war? I do not stand here to object to them; but I stand here to criticize, and I stand here to point out these invidious discriminations and distinctions made against great interests. One hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars more were appropriated for the coast survey, contradistinguished from the lake surveys. Why is that? I do not object to it. I point it out to show the invidious discrimination that is made against this interest. If it is necessary, if the public exigencies demand this discrimination, why do not the Committee on Finance make thorough work of it? What do you say of the appropriations for the Naval and Military Schools running up to two and three hundred thousand dollars? We are pretty much through with the war, it is supposed; we have pretty thoroughly educated our sailors and soldiers, and why not abolish those schools?

Then, again, in the very bill to which I had occasion to refer a few moments ago, from the Committee on Finance, you will find an appropriation contemplated to be expended in the importation of immigrants from abroad; and if you will look into the bill of last year you will find that this system of importation is to be carried on through agents to be sent to Europe at an expense of God only knows what, to induce, under contracts to be made by the Government agents, the pauper population of Europe to immigrate to this country. I do not know what the appropriation will be this year; but it was $50,000 last year.

On what ground is it that this Committee on Finance find no difficulty in making appropriations to induce foreign immigration into this country, find no difficulty in appropriating money for the survey of the lakes, of which I make no complaint, but find it necessary to strike at this great interest of the country? I say that this discrimination is invidious. In the first place, I object that the whole subject is foreign to this bill. I insist upon it that when a great interest is to be affected, it is not to be dashed at by the Committee on Finance. This is eminently a commercial question, and should be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and have the consideration of a committee, and be reported to the Senate.

Now, how does this question stand? The honorable Senator, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, knows very well that this subject was discussed last year in the Senate, and after a thorough discussion and consideration of the subject, the vote stood, according to my recollection, 26 to 11—26 against and 11 for—and I have no reason to doubt that that is the judgment of the Senate to-day; and I do not know what reason the honorable Senator has to suppose that that is not the judgment of the Senate to-day. And yet, with that record of the Senate, the Committee on Finance feel authorized to bring in a bill to strike down this interest, to suspend it during the war and for one year thereafter.

I trust, therefore, Mr. President, that it will be the sense of the Senate that there is no such exigency in our public affairs that renders it necessary in this way to strike at this great interest, an interest which for eighty years has been the cherished, uniform policy of this Government. I trust that the Senate will believe that it is better it should stand, for the present at least. My colleague alluded to a fact which should be conclusive upon this subject. So long as the reciprocity treaty stands, if you strike down this bounty, you strike down this interest absolutely. It would be ruined past redemption with the discriminations which are against it. I therefore feel it my duty to object. I do not desire to prolong the debate; but I shall be obliged to call the yeas and nays on this subject now; and if the bill should be reported to the Senate with this provision in it, I may have occasion to trouble the Senate longer upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I very rarely take any offense at, or any notice of, remarks made by a Senator in the heat of debate; but I will not submit to the hectoring tone of the Senator from Maine. It is not the way to deal with me. His language was uncounteous, unparliamentary, and unnecessary. It does seem to me that the feeling shown by the Senator from Maine, when I, in the discharge of my duty, am endeavoring to save to the Government $400,000, is not creditable to him. He arraigns me—not the Committee on Finance, because he knows that the Committee on Finance was not responsible—for the conduct of the immigration bill. That was a bill prepared by the Secretary of State, and sent to me, because I had had charge of the bill of which it was an amendment. I introduced it, and I stated to the Senate that the Senator who ought to have charge of the bill was not present in his place, and I asked the Senate whether it would not be better to submit it to the only committee of which I was a member. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] objected; and after the objection was stated, it was referred to the Committee on Finance. We considered it; and the very moment the Senator from Kansas [Mr. LANE] came back, we surrendered to him the care and custody of that bill. The bill did not contain a single feature, a single proposition, that the honorable Senator has stated. Every feature that he alluded to was stricken out of the bill by the committee. There was not a single dollar appropriated in it. There was not a single provision in it about sending men abroad to hire people to come here.

He arraigns us also for reporting the amendment to the fortification bill, because some of the fortifications happened to be in Maine. Did we think of that? Some of the fortifications were in my own section. Did I regard that? The bill was referred to the Committee on Finance, as it always has been. Are we limited in our power to amend that fortification bill? No; and I am astonished that the Senator should introduce that subject here as a matter of accusation; and I will not submit to it. When he did it the other day I did not reply to him, because I thought he was laboring under some heat on account of some fortifications up in Maine. I thought he evinced then a feeling of sectionalism that I never would allow myself to evince. Because we struck out of that bill a few forts up in his region of country he manifested a feeling that I was astonished at. I did not reply to it because I did not wish to show any feeling about it. When that fortification bill was sent to us we had the right to reduce it, to refuse it if we chose, subject to the will of the Senate. We did reduce it. It is true we reduced it in a form that was not sanctioned by the Senate. I assented to the amendment proposed substantially by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] although I preferred that of the Committee on Finance. And yet we are to be assailed and the imputation is to be cast that we are influenced by sectional motives and sectional prejudices because we amended the fortification bill! It is absurd.

This bill, the Senator says, ought to have come from the Committee on Commerce. I will state this fact, that the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. POWELL,] for two sessions introduced a bill, standing by itself, on this very subject, and had it referred to the Committee on Commerce, and that committee neglected and failed to report it back, either adversely or favorably. And now, when we are levying taxes upon the food of the living and the shrouds of the dead, when we are overlooking this broad country of ours to select objects of taxation, the honorable Senator comes here and arraigns me because I wish to suspend only for a year or two a bounty that is indefensible in principle; which the very fishermen of Massachusetts have abandoned and pray their Representatives to surrender; which the Senator from Maine [Mr. FARWELL] says he is willing to abandon if we will give him what I am disposed to give him, a drawback on salt until the reciprocity treaty is abolished. Are we, who have simply performed a conscientious duty to our country, to be arraigned thus?

I beg pardon of the Senate for showing so much feeling; and I would not do it but that this is the second time that the Senator from Maine has arraigned the committee, or rather me, its chairman, for doing our conscientious duty. Why, Mr. President, I am not to be hectoring, or bothered, or pestered in this way; and I did not show any feeling before, although I felt it at the time as unjust and improper.

Now, sir, this question is brought before the Senate. It is properly brought here; and I believe now, and I say it, that if there was any such indefensible bounty paid in the State of Ohio I would surrender it with the greatest freedom. The Senator complains that we did not strike out the appropriation for the survey of the lakes. Not a dollar of that is expended within five hundred miles of the State of Ohio. All those lake surveys are on Lake Michigan, Lake Superior, and in the upper region; and why are those appropriations made? Because certain military officers have been employed for years in making them, and it was not deemed wise to discontinue them. In regard to the coast surveys they have been continued for year in and year out. At one time we proposed to discontinue both the lake surveys and the coast surveys, but a representation was made to us from the Coast Survey Bureau that to discontinue the surveys and break up these organizations would be probably bad economy; that it would probably cost more to commence the surveys again, and all the process of triangulation, or some technical name, would be lost; and thereupon it would be wiser to continue them and to use the coast survey maps in our military operations. When that argument was presented we at once abandoned the proposed reduction on this item of appropriation and gave it up.

Mr. President, I do not wish to continue this unpleasant discussion. I certainly have no hostility to the Senator from Maine, and I was astonished that he exhibited so much feeling on this subject; and certainly I have no hostility to the gallant State he represents. And here I will challenge any Senator present to show that I have in word or speech uttered a single sentiment or done a single act against any State of this Union because it was not my own State. I believe I have never shown any sectional feeling in legislation. If I have I ought to be rebuked for it; but I do not remember in any case that I have evinced any such feeling. If I have I hope the Senator will correct me at all times. I look upon this country of ours and all parts of it as one and the same, and I have the same affection for it; and certainly this attack upon the fishing bounties is not from any local opposition to the State of Maine or to the country of New England, in whose bosom rest all my ancestors for more than two hundred years.

Mr. MORRILL. What I complain of, what I have a right to complain of, and what I mean to complain of, and what I intend the Senator shall understand I make as a matter of complaint is, that he has pursued this subject with a hostility. Last year he gratuitously gave notice that he would move it on the appropriation bill if nobody else did. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. POWELL] relieved him; and therefore he escaped that. It was moved and it was discussed; he had his hour in court and he was heard; and the judgment of the Senate was against him; and he avails himself of his chairmanship of the committee again to thrust it in the face of the Senate, and I say it is unauthorized.

Mr. SHERMAN. I say the statement of the Senator is not true. The report is sanctioned by every member of the Committee on Finance, with one possible exception; and the Senator shall not say of me what is not true.

Mr. MORRILL. It is here, and the Senator is chairman of the committee, and he has manifested this hostility from the beginning.

Mr. CLARK. I was not in the committee, but I was against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. One member was not there.

Mr. MORRILL. That I maintain and that I assert, and that is evident upon the record, and he may escape from it as he can.

Now, sir, it is said I do not know what I am speaking about. I am talking about the law in regard to immigration into this country of European paupers; to get up a grand system by which you are to go abroad and hunt through the alleys and purlieus of European cities and bring into this country pauper labor. It is said that I do not understand that subject. I think I do; and I think I did not misrepresent the Senator either when I was up before. The Senator from Ohio has the enviable distinction of having introduced and inaugurated that system. I noticed it when it was introduced last year, and called his attention to it, and told him I doubted the wisdom of it. Now, what is it? I did not misstate it or overstate it. Let us look at it. The bill of last year, to which I referred as containing the appropriation and other things, provides, in the first place, for a Commissioner of Immigration to reside at New York, and he is to have "three clerks of such class as the Secretary of State may indicate;" and what are they to do? They are to constitute a bureau, and their business is to get up some system for importing immigrants from Europe into this country. I want to read the second section of that bill, and see whether I am mistaken about it or not:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That all contracts that shall be made by immigrants to the United States in foreign countries, in conformity to regulations that may be established by the said Commissioner, whereby immigrants shall pledge the wages of their labor for a term not exceeding twelve months, to repay the expenses of their immigration, shall be held to be valid in law, and may be enforced in the courts of the United States, or of the several States and Territories; and such advances, if so stipulated in the contract, and the contract be recorded in the recorder's office in the county where the immigrant shall settle, shall operate as a lien upon any land thereafter acquired by the immigrant, whether under the homestead law, when the title is consummated, or on property otherwise acquired, until liquidated by the immigrant; but nothing herein contained shall be deemed to authorize any contract contravening the Constitution of the United States, or creating in any way the relation of slavery or servitude."

Now, the scope of this bill is this: it inaugurates a system of importation of foreign paupers into this country, and it does it under the authority and at the expense of the Government of the United States; and it contemplates sending agents abroad to make contracts with these men by which they are to agree to pay the expenses of their importation, and they are to mortgage themselves soul and body, and all they have and hope to have, only it is provided it shall not be regarded as slavery. That is the alleviation of it; and this is to be done at the expense of the Government of the United States in a time of war!

The honorable Senator thinks it very offensive that I brought this up. I referred to it as an illustration that, while the Committee on Finance deemed it expedient to strike a great interest of the country to save money, they are getting up schemes for the importation of foreign paupers into this country at an expense no one can tell what. Therefore I did not speak without the book, and I did not misrepresent the record either. This year a most elaborate amendment of this bill is introduced, and it provides for an inspection of the revenue laws, and it puts this Commissioner of Immigration, joined to the Commissioner of Immigration for the State of New York, on a par, so far as the inspection of vessels at that port is concerned, with the collector of customs.

But I have no occasion to discuss that. I alluded to it in no offensive sense personally toward the chairman of the Committee on Finance; but I alluded to these facts as matters of history, as matters of legislation, to show the manifest injustice of this discrimination against a great interest which I cherish and which my people cherish. And when the honorable Senator tells me that I do not know what I represent; that the fishermen of Maine do not want this interest, and it is not essential to them—

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not say that.

Mr. MORRILL. I understood the honorable Senator to say the fishermen did not want the bounty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I said that I had seen in the papers the fishermen of a portion of Massachusetts had so expressed themselves.

Mr. MORRILL. That is a very remarkable discrimination; the fishermen of Maine want it, and the fishermen of Massachusetts do not want it! The truth is, Mr. President, that this interest is a vital interest in many respects. I am not going to argue it. I said last year all that I desired to say on the general subject. I confess, however, to no little feeling in regard to it. This proposition had a fair hearing, and had its day in court last year, and the judgment of the Senate was decidedly against it. After that I confess to some little feeling when I saw it thrust in our faces here at this late day in the session, and that, too, on the tax bill, when there is little opportunity without an unreasonable trespass upon the time of the Senate to discuss it.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend this amendment by striking out the words "from and after the 1st day of April next and," and inserting after "thereafter" in the third line the words "from and after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain;" so that, if amended in this way, it will read:

That during the present war, and for one year thereafter, from and after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, all acts and parts of acts granting allowances or bounties on the tonnage of vessels engaged in the bank or other cod fisheries, during the time aforesaid, shall have no force or effect.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask at what time the treaty will terminate.

Mr. SUMNER. A year from the 15th of March.

Mr. FARWELL. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] that the bounty under his amendment will run for one year, until the termination of the reciprocity treaty, and Congress will be in session in the mean time.

Mr. COWAN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he strike out more of the previous part of the section; so as to make it read "that from and after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty all acts," &c.

Mr. WILSON. That goes further than the proposition of the committee.

Mr. COWAN. You may put a limit on it.

Mr. WILSON. The proposition itself is that the suspension shall go into effect on the 1st day of April next and continue during the present war and one year thereafter. The objection made is that it is fatal to that interest while the reciprocity treaty lasts. My object is not to affect the time during which the suspension shall run, that is, during the war and for one year thereafter, but to provide that the section shall not go into effect until the reciprocity treaty is abrogated, so that we shall not have that disadvantage to contend with.

Mr. COWAN. You can express that in this wise, "that from and after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, and during the present war, and for one year thereafter," &c.

Mr. WILSON. I am willing to have it go in that form, and I will so modify it.

Mr. COWAN. That will make it English, at any rate.

Mr. BROWN. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that he had better modify it so as to abolish the bounty altogether after the notice takes effect for the abrogation of the treaty. If I understand the argument on which it is predicated and sustained now, it is that until the abrogation takes effect it would be unjust to repeal this bounty. If, therefore, it does not take effect until that time, the argument which sustains the bounty falls. I am opposed to the bounty altogether, and I think when gentlemen who are deeply interested in it say they are willing to give it up if they can get rid of the bad effects of the reciprocity treaty, they admit the whole argument against it, and therefore it should not be limited to one year after the war ceases, but should go altogether.

Mr. FARWELL. If you abolish this bounty while the reciprocity treaty lasts, the effect will be most disastrous. The fact is that the reciprocity treaty prevents legislation. The reciprocity treaty falls in March of next year, I believe. Consequently, if there was no legislation the fishermen would be in the same condition they are now, paying this high duty on their salt, and having no protection against the competition of the foreign article. I know very well what the feeling is in Maine, and I know what it is in Massachusetts. In the place of this bounty which has been thrown in their faces as a gratuity for years and years, here on this floor, they would much prefer to see such legislation as is had in regard to every other interest in this country. You would not think of taxing all the rags, the chemicals, and everything that comes from abroad and is used by our paper manufacturers, and then let foreign paper in free of duty. You would not think of doing such a thing. Neither should you tax at high rates the salt, the cordage, the hemp, and everything from abroad that is used by this trade, and then let the competing articles—fish, oil, and everything of that sort—come into the United States free of duty, as is the case under the reciprocity treaty. Therefore, I know the legislation of Congress would never be in that line, but I suggest that it will be necessary to have legislation. I suggest to the chairman to let the whole thing go over until next year. You will find no members here from Maine, or Massachusetts, or anywhere else in New England, opposing the repeal when you are ready to give what any gentleman is willing to say is fair legislation on the subject, and certainly it will not forward anything to say now that it shall be repealed a year hence after the reciprocity treaty is dead. Just let it lie until the reciprocity treaty is out of the way, and then adopt the proper legislation, and I shall certainly be glad. I do not want anybody to say that a bounty is given to my people, or my State, or even to New England, for I once was part of Massachusetts myself. I hope the chairman will consent to withdraw the whole thing.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to. Mr. SHERMAN. The word "suspended," in the sixth line, ought to be inserted, so as to read "are hereby suspended." It is evidently omitted in the print.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. The effect of the amendment now is to make this suspension of the bounties operate from the 15th of March, 1866, instead of the 1st of April, 1865, during the war, and for one year thereafter.

Mr. FARWELL. What necessity is there for saying anything about the war and one year thereafter when nothing will be done for a year at any rate?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it much better to say that from and after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty all acts and parts of acts allowing the bounties shall be repealed.

Mr. FARWELL. I suggest the difficulty I stated before; if we should not make any legislation next year, by that time the repeal would be ruinous.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is not a particle of doubt that when the treaty with Great Britain is abrogated, the ordinary duty will be given in favor of our own fish and in favor of our own productions against the Canadian articles. That is all the Senator desires, as I understand.

Mr. FARWELL. I suggest whether it would not be a very good time when that legislation is made, to make it part of the same act which repeals the bounty. Why should we haggle over it here at the very last hours of this session when there will be plenty of time to mature the whole matter next year?

Mr. SUMNER. Have not these very questions that have been presented brought us to an essential difficulty? Can we justly deal with the question now?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think so.

Mr. SUMNER. Excuse me. The Senate has already voted to postpone the action of this proposition till after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, which is one year from the 15th of March. Congress is to meet between now and then. Why not let the whole question go over to the next Congress, which will probably have to consider another reciprocity treaty or a modification of the present one, and let this be treated at the same time in connection with the kindred matter?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think since we have it up we had better dispose of it. The Senator from Maine says I persist in this matter. I do not know that I ever introduced this subject but once in the Senate; but since it is here now I think we had better end it and not have the controversy up at the next session. My impression is that since we have postponed the operation of the provision we ought to repeal the fishing bounties, leaving future legislation to come afterward; and I submit an amendment to the amendment, that after the abrogation of the treaty those bounties shall be repealed; and I think that would be the better way.

Mr. SUMNER. But you do not act definitely by your proposition as you have it now, and you have a session of Congress that is to meet before the proposition can go into effect. Why not, then, let the whole matter go over to the next Congress? Is not that the most practicable? Why load this bill down with a question which the next Congress can act upon in a different sense from yourselves?

Mr. CONNESS. I do not see that anything is gained by it.

Mr. SHERMAN. My impression is we had better leave it here, so that another reciprocity treaty may be made in view of the fact that the bounties are repealed. Since we have yielded to the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] and postponed the operation of the suspension for one year, I think we ought not to make that a reason why we should abandon the proposition. It does not seem to me exactly right. On a statement made by him that the reciprocity treaty might work to the injury of the interest referred to we have postponed the operation of the act until that reciprocity treaty is repealed. That yielding on our part ought not to be made the argument to induce us to abandon the proposition.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator from Ohio complains that my colleague has introduced into the provision a postponement till after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty, and that we now do not accept that as a definitive settlement; but does not the Senator from Ohio see that the very fact that the Senator has thought it expedient to postpone the operation of this provision till after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty is the best evidence in the world that this is not the time to act on the question? The whole proposition is premature. It is another case of leaping before you come to the stile.

Mr. DAVIS. That is very wrong.

Mr. SUMNER. Of course it is very wrong; and therefore I suggest that I hope the Senate will not do it.

Mr. FARWELL. It is better for another reason. If this amendment goes to the House of Representatives it will cause some discussion. There will certainly be time enough at the next Congress, because there will not be any 4th of March to close the next session peremptorily.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I never yet have known the time come to repeal these fishing bounties, and I believe the question has been up every session I have been here, and it has been put off on one pretense or another session after session. I do not think we shall ever get rid of it until we repeal fishing bounties squarely. I think it is time the whole thing was repealed. So far as salt is concerned, I suppose we use more salt in a week in my State in salting beef that goes abroad than is used to salt all these fish for a year. I should like to have a distinct vote upon repealing the fishing bounties without any of these pretenses of after the war, or when some other treaty is made. I look upon them all as subterfuges to hold on to the fishing bounties, and I think in this time of war, when we want all the money we can get, it is no time to be paying bounties to the fishermen. I should be very glad myself if we could get a direct vote on repealing the fishing bounties.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to strike out the words "and during the present war, and for one year thereafter," and in lieu of the word "suspended," to insert the word "repealed," so as to read, "that from and after the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain, all acts and parts of acts granting allowances or bounties on the tonnage of vessels engaged in the bank or other cod fisheries be, and the same are hereby, repealed." That will make the matter plain, and then a treaty may be made in view of that tax and legislation.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the chairman of the committee will not press that amendment. I think he had better let the section stand as it now does, with the amendment that has been adopted. The reciprocity treaty will expire one year from the middle of this March. We shall meet in December next, and it may not be until the close of the session that we shall take any legislation or do what we may desire to do, and I think we had better just let it pass in the form the committee have reported it with the time this amendment fixes after the abrogation of that treaty. I think then all the practical result the Senator desires he will achieve in that form.

Mr. McDUGALL. With regard to this matter of the fishing bounties, it cannot be supposed that, so far as their practical application is concerned, I should be conversant with them, for the reason that I never lived on the Atlantic, and I now live on the far-off coast of the Pacific, where we ask no fishing bounty. I long since heard the cause why these bounties were first allowed, and how they have been justified; and having been somewhat of a traveler upon the seas I have felt the force of the justification, and having seen what our men of the sea were capable of by their training along our northeastern coast, I have felt that the policy of the legislation was sound. We are not now lords of the sea, although we came very near being so. I think we are not so because of a false policy. We could have been if we had allowed the men who understand the seas of our northeastern coast to go and run down the Alabama and run down the Florida and drive all the pirates from the ocean. We would now be masters of the seas if we had allowed them to do it as Congress provided, but as the Administration did not permit.

Sir, I believe these fisheries are the cradle of sailors. You may talk of soldiers as you please, but there are no such people as the men who dare the wave, the storm, and the tempest. They are trained better there than elsewhere, and that is the reason why the policy of this legislation is sound. It is not a fishing bounty properly speaking, although it is so denominated. It is to furnish a cradle for sailors, men who learn to understand and dare the waves, handle vessels, manage the tiller, and sheer with the wind, know where it comes from and know how to meet it.

I have always thought from my first calm reflection on the subject that this legislation was sound as a matter of public policy for the purpose of maintaining a body of men who at signal call would answer for maintaining our reputation among the nations of the world. We have two oceans on our borders, we have a great sea on the south, and we have all the lakes besides, making almost our boundary. They cultivate a class of men who understand navigation and the handling of vessels, and what is more, who have the particular quality that is developed by education at sea, that is that high quality of courage which belongs to the sailor particularly. To encourage that is one of the highest and most important prerogatives that can be exercised by us in the discharge of our part of the business of the Government.

We need that class of men; we shall need them more when this war is over; and I believe in continuing the policy of enabling our fishing fleet to maintain themselves, and keeping them up and protecting them, not as a matter of bounty, but just as I would have the School at Annapolis and the School at West Point. Although the fishermen do not wear fine jackets and are not called middies or cadets, this is the school of seamen, better seamen than they breed in any of your schools with mathematical teachers and instructors in various departments of science.

I myself have been and am in favor of these fishing bounties, so called, per se, as a matter of sound national policy, and I regret that gentlemen from the West, generally those from the interior part of the country, have such a disposition to make war on them. I think it is an old hackneyed question among politicians. A man who lived on the Wabash, or the Illinois, or the Miami, thought it was a very good way of talking for him to say, "Here these fellows got a law giving them fishing bounties; New England has done so and so;" and it has been made a question against New England. I am not a New England man nor am I partial to New England, but I say these bounties were not given to New England. This seems, however, to have become a popular question now in certain portions of the country, and every year a speech against the fishing bounties is repeated from Ohio, from Indiana, from Kentucky, none of these persons regarding the true reason why these bounties were conceded, the true philosophical and governmental reason why they were first established. I think they were right. I think they should be maintained, and I am opposed to the whole proposition of discontinuing them.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio to the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I have paired off with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMS.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Doolittle, Harlan, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wright—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Farwell, Foster, Hale, Johnson, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Ramsey, Stewart, Sumner, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Carlile, Collamer, Dixon, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Harris, Howe, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Saulsbury, Sprague, Ten Eyck, and Wade—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the question recurred on the amendment as amended.

Mr. FARWELL. I hope the Senate will not adopt the amendment, and I believe that were it not for the little feeling got up between the chairman of the Finance Committee and my colleague the chairman would advise its withdrawal at present. Next year this whole question must come up; there will be a new reciprocity treaty, or else there will be legislation in regard to all these subjects. The chairman stated in the Senate in the early part of this session that there was a million dollars' worth of lumber produced in this country which we could not tax, from the fact that the reciprocity treaty allowed lumber to come in from the British provinces without taxation. That will have to be provided for. This is a subject of the same kind. Why not say that after the reciprocity treaty expires there shall be a duty on lumber? I say there must be legislation on this whole subject; it will have to be arranged, and this is one of the matters that can then be arranged very well.

I know that Senators who understand this question do not wish to destroy this interest, in which there are two hundred thousand tons of little vessels engaged. Those vessels belong to poor men, scattered along the coast on the rocky points, where nothing can grow. They have perhaps a little patch, big enough for a garden, which their wives and children cultivate while they are away on the ocean, catching those fish, in the summer. It is not the intention of Senators to destroy this interest, to drive these men from their homes, by such legislation as shall prevent them from making the scanty living which they now get for their wives and families. Already the fishermen of the provinces bring into our market at least half as many fish as we catch ourselves and sell them every year. I ask you not to legislate so as to destroy these men and this interest, which you will do if you repeal this bounty without providing some protection to them, by either taking off the duty on salt or putting a duty on the product, the fish which the Nova Scotians bring in. I have been told by intelligent men, fishermen, that the duty which they paid upon salt this year was a great deal more than their bounty. They cannot go into Nova Scotia and buy it, because they have to take their salt on board and have their vessels inspected before they go away, and they have to make oath that the duty on every bushel of salt they have used in curing fish has been paid on it before they can get the bounty.

I know it is not the intention of the Senators here to destroy them; but what object in the world can there be in legislating at this time? It does not save any money to the Treasury this year. Congress will be in session again next year and will have abundance of time to consider the subject in all its aspects, and to make such legislation as is required to adjust the thing equitably, to consider the amount of duty that should be put upon the fish if that should be the course taken, and I think it will be best to put a little duty on the fish, sufficient to give our fishermen the necessary protection, so that they can pay the duty on their salt. If you should take off the bounty, I do not think it would starve the fishermen entirely. They might go down to the provinces and buy their salt, and you would gain nothing by the operation. Probably many of them would be obliged to you for that. They have got a class of vessels that are fit for nothing else. They are little narrow-shaped vessels built expressly for this business, entirely unsuitable to the coasting trade or any other business except the fishing business, and the effect of this legislation which it is here proposed to adopt, if carried out without other legislation, would be merely to transfer all the trade from the United States down to the British provinces. The fisherman would take his crew on board and his ballast in and go right down to Nova Scotia and buy his salt, and have his sails made there and buy there what cordage he wants, and buy his tea, coffee, and sugar there without any duty, as he has a right to do for consumption on board his vessel; and so the Government would actually be the loser by it.

There seems to be a great desire on the part of some gentlemen to make this repeal at this time. When the Senator from Illinois said this was a "pretense" I felt hurt. I did not get up to reply to him, but I felt hurt that the Senator should say that I was here under a pretense. I never act under pretenses. If there is anything that I pride myself on, it is that when you see me outside you see me all through. I would not for all the fishing bounty that has ever been paid to our fishermen stand up here and advocate a thing under a pretense. Nothing but a sense of right or wrong would induce me to state a thing to the Senate.

I suggested to the Senate that this whole matter be allowed to lay over. I am as much in favor of repealing this bounty as any Senator in this Chamber. I want to see it repealed. I have felt annoyed and humiliated for years when I have read the debates of this Chamber and seen New England sneered at because she was getting a bounty! I do not want any bounty, but I plead for these poor men who have invested under the acts of Congress with the expectation of having some protection to their interests in some way. Do not destroy them and cut them up root and branch by your legislation. You would not for a moment think of taxing any manufactured article, and then allow the foreign article made in a country where labor is cheaper than in this to come in free. In England salt grows in the ground; they dig it out of the ground and they get it there for four shillings a pound, four shillings for thirty bushels, and our fishermen are paying seven dollars for a hoghead of eight bushels of salt to cure their fish. Does any Senator tell me that these men can pay seven dollars for eight bushels of salt, go down to the fishing grounds, cure their fish and salt them, and bring them into the market side by side with the fishermen of the British provinces who get their salt for twenty-five or thirty cents a bushel, and who get their tea and coffee and their cordage untaxed? It cannot be.

I know Senators do not mean to adopt such legislation. Then why not let the whole subject go over and be arranged hereafter? It will be a very good time for it when the question of re-arranging the question of the reciprocity treaty shall come up. Then we can consider the propriety of giving protection not only to this article but many other articles that are manufactured in the British provinces and which ought to be taxed in order to protect our own people. It will help to facilitate that adjustment, perhaps, if we leave this question to be settled then. I trust the Senate will let it go over till next year. Nothing will be forwarded by making this repeal now. Every Senator can see that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let us vote.

Mr. FARWELL. I am ready to vote. I do not like to talk; it is the last thing I like to do. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire simply to say that I certainly did not mean any reflection on my friend from Maine. I do not think I used the word "pretense;" I spoke of "subterfuge."

Mr. FARWELL. Is that a better word?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I had reference to the moving of these amendments. I supposed they were amendments designed to defeat the measure. I did not speak of them as pretenses or subterfuges of the individuals. I only had reference to the parliamentary mode of proceeding, that when members are opposed to a particular measure they resort to motions and amendments to save as much as they can and to prevent action. I did not mean it in any personal sense.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 17, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Chandler, Cowan, Davis, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Lane of Indiana, Powell, Riddle, Sherman, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wright—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Clark, Conness, Farwell, Foster, Hale, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Morrill, Nye, Ramsey, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Canfield, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Foot, Grimes, Harding, Harlan, Harris, Howe, Johnson, Nesmith, Pomeroy, Richardson, Saulsbury, Ten Eyck, and Wade—17.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is but one more amendment. The last amendment to the bill is disposed of already by the action on the fifth section. I hope the vote may be taken on the postage question, and either voted in or out.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On that I wish to ask the chairman just one question—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is to adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The question I ask of the chairman is whether the language of the section in regard to postage is the language of the old law?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President—

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the section be read.

The Secretary read the next amendment, which was to insert as a new section:

SEC. —, And be it further enacted, That, in lieu of the present rates of postage on letters, there shall be charged, from and after the 1st day of July next, for every single letter in manuscript, or paper of any kind in which information shall be asked for or communicated in writing or by signs or marks, conveyed in the mails, five cents; and for a double or other multiple letter there shall be charged an increased rate according to the present rates, five cents being computed the unit instead of three cents.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now I can answer the question of the Senator from Indiana. The only change is increasing the rate of postage from three to five cents. The language is precisely the same.

Mr. POWELL. I have an amendment to the amendment to add:

And that from and after the 1st day of June, 1865, all acts or parts of acts granting or allowing the franking privilege be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The question being put, there were, on a division—yeas 16, nays 15.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 1, 1865.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHARLES A. PITCHER.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 338) entitled "An act for the relief of Charles A. Pitcher."

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

Mr. HALE. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of discharging the Committee of the Whole from the consideration of the bill.

The motion was not agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF JOINT RULES.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Cobb, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution, in which they requested the concurrence of the House:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the 16th and 17th joint rules of the two Houses be suspended during the remainder of the present session.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HALE. Let those rules be read.

Mr. STEVENS. This is the resolution which is always passed at the end of the session.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the 16th and 17th joint rules.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"16. No bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the three last days of the session.

"17. No bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States for his approbation on the last day of the session."

The SPEAKER. These rules are always suspended at this stage of the session. The Chair thinks that they might as well be abolished.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was concurred in.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on bill H. R. No. 795, amendatory of certain acts imposing duties upon foreign importations.

Mr. ASHLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. ASHLEY. I move that this evening, between seven and eight o'clock, bills on the Speaker's table be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

Mr. MORRILL. Pending the motion I have already made, on conference with gentlemen on both sides of the House, learning that there is no disposition further to discuss the tariff bill except on the part of two or three gentlemen, I ask by unanimous consent that the debate shall be limited to five minutes each to the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. WARD. I hope the gentleman will give me five minutes.

Mr. PIKE. Does the gentleman propose to limit the debate to ten minutes on the whole bill?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir; on the whole bill, after the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall resume its consideration.

Mr. PIKE. I want to be heard for five minutes on the next section.

Mr. DAWES. Before the gentleman makes his motion I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House to have an evening session for the purpose of considering the election cases.

The SPEAKER. That can be made pending a motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAWES. I do not intend to occupy more than an hour or an hour and a half.

Mr. STEVENS. We have some appropriation bills yet to dispose of, and unless we pass them to-day I do not know how they can be considered in the Senate. If we have an evening session it ought to be to consider the appropriation bills.

Mr. DAWES. I am willing to leave the matter to the House. I accept the condition of things as I find it. I only desire to discharge my duties to the claimants. If the House thinks that other business is of more consequence, I will accept the vote as an indication of that fact. I wish myself simply and solely to present those cases fairly to the House, and have its action in regard to them.

The SPEAKER. Questions in regard to the business of the House must be decided without debate.

Mr. DAWES. I move that two hours of this evening's session shall be set apart for action on the Louisiana election cases.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that all debate on the tariff bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be closed in thirty minutes, to be divided into ten minutes on each section.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask now that the vote be taken on the motion to go into committee.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LITTLEJOHN in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the TARIFF BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be on striking out the words "On iron bars for railroads or inclined planes, fifteen cents per one hundred pounds."

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word or two on this motion in answer to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Davis,] and other gentlemen who discussed this subject yesterday previous to the adjournment. First, let me say to the gentleman from New York that the inferences he drew from the secret circular signed by the representatives of English manufacturers of railroad iron and circulated among the members of Congress were entirely incorrect and delusive.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Inasmuch as the gentleman has referred to a secret circular, I desire to say that I never saw it till this morning.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I meant no disparagement of the gentleman from New York. I know that a circular of that kind has been circulated among the members of this House, and that the gentleman's statements and arguments were so nearly identical with those of that circular that I was led to the inference that he drew his information from that source. I desire to say, Mr. Chairman, that so far from the requirements and consumption of railroad iron in this country being beyond the ability of production here, that many mills are in want of orders, and from indications will before the close of the year stand idle. The average annual consumption of railway iron in this country for the last ten years has been only one hundred and twenty thousand tons. The product last year of the rolling-mills of the country was three hundred thousand tons, and their capacity this year, as reported from the proprietors of the mills, is over five hundred thousand tons. The capacity of our mills is therefore far beyond the consumption of the country. So much for this argument of the gentleman.

Now, then, in answer to my very enthusiastic free-trade friend from Ohio, whom I do not now see in his seat, [Mr. Cox,] I desire to say that he is making a mistake if he supposes that he is only assailing injuriously the State of Pennsylvania in his position upon this great interest. I desire him to understand that in other States of our Union the iron interest has become or is fast becoming an important one. His own State of Ohio stands prominent in this class; and there are furnaces to-day standing idle there because of the present depression in the prices of pig iron. The fires of other furnaces will soon go out under the system of legislation advocated by him. It is not Pennsylvania alone that demands consideration for this great branch of national business.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. GRISWOLD. The gentleman will have an opportunity when I get through. My time will not permit me to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. The gentleman misrepresents me.

Mr. GRISWOLD. In reference to the position of the gentleman from Iowa, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. Kasson,] I desire to express my astonishment. That gentleman is usually clear and comprehensive in his views; and I repeat my amazement that upon a question of this kind, so important in its bearings upon a great interest of the country, he should permit himself to take a view so entirely narrow and inconsistent. Does the gentleman suppose that by striking down this great branch of the iron interests of the country he will promote the welfare of the great West which he represents? Does he think their ruins will prove an adequate foundation on which to build the great railway avenues of communication throughout the West, of which he says they stand in so much need? Does he believe the policy he now advocates will tend to develop the resources and extend the interests of the great West which he represents here?

The committee of which he is so prominent a member (Ways and Means) provided, at the last session of Congress, for a direct internal revenue of about seven dollars per ton of rails. They added other taxes which would indirectly increase the cost to the producer of rails in this country three dollars additional per ton, making in all ten dollars per ton, thus providing for the contribution of at least $5,000,000 per annum to the Treasury of the country. At the same session the foreign duty on this product was reduced from $13 50 to $13 40 per ton, thus legislating a difference of ten dollars per ton in favor of the foreign producer. Under these laws the only protection which the American producer now has against the cheap labor of foreign manufactures is three dollars per ton.

Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa that he cannot extract from this great interest the large contribution to the Treasury of the country which he anticipates if the policy of our legislation shall be such as he advocates on this question. He will be able to deduct no new moral by killing the goose from which he anticipates his golden eggs.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman from New York [Mr. Griswold] talks about striking down the iron interest. Why, the iron interest is the most prosperous in the country. It is coining money absolutely faster than the Mint ever coined it, or any other interest. No interest is making money as the iron interest is this very day and hour. It is not Pennsylvania alone that is interested, but it is my own State also. I represent constituents who are making annually $250,000 and $500,000 out of the iron mines of Pennsylvania, the interest being mainly owned in New York. Strike down an interest like that, an interest before all others which exist in this country! I think sometimes I have returned to the barbarous ages instead of being in an American assembly; that I am in a Chinese body of deliberation, when I hear of a prohibition upon railroad iron, or of any other iron. This never was an American system, but a Chinese system. As an ancient Whig, as a relic of the past, I protest against the doctrine of a prohibitory tariff, and I never advocated it. All that we asked was that protection to American industry which was incidental and never prohibitory. But the proposition here is a prohibitory one. That is not an American system, I repeat; it is a Chinese system which is now proposed to be introduced to the people of this country.

But there are other interests in this country beside iron, such as ships, commerce, and navigation. I plead for the sailor, for the merchant, for the flag they carry over the whole earth. Commerce has been mainly swept away, in a very great degree, by this war, and by an almost prohibitory tariff. There are few or no sailors but those on board of transports of war. And now here is a proposition, when the iron-mongers are absolutely coining money, to add three dollars additional protection. And in the names of the merchants upon the coast, in the names of the sailors who are hereafter to live by the freighting business, of iron as well as many other things, I call the attention of the House to that multitudinous class, and ask them to forget the oligarchy of the iron aristocracy who are this day coining money as no other interest in the country ever coined it.

Mr. STEVENS. That was not the voice that issued from a Whig gentleman of fifteen years. Then he stood with Henry Clay and the rest of us for protecting American industry against the pauper labor of Europe. But like many others, his conversion from one point to Locofocoism has involved his conversion to all of them; they have been carried over into the ranks of our old opponents.

I was not at all astonished yesterday at the doctrines promulgated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] who has always been a frank and free advocate of free trade. His course, therefore, was consistent and manly, however erroneous those on this side of the House may consider it. But I was a little surprised to hear my friend from Iowa [Mr. Kasson] who is on the Committee of Ways and Means, advocate free trade. But I was very much astonished at the course of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] who went, it seems to me, beyond John C. Calhoun himself, and that, too, without knowing all the facts about which he was talking.

I know that last year we added seven dollars a ton to the internal duty upon railroad iron, and as we did in all other cases, we in the committee reported a compensating duty upon the foreign article. But while it was adopted on every other article, we refused the twenty cents a hundred pounds which had been reported as a compensation upon railroad iron. What was the result? The result was that although before that our mills had commenced to be prosperous, and those who had large stocks on hand when the price was raised made large sums, yet the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] is mistaken as to their now making money; for, on the other hand, they are now stopping operations, and the result was that one hundred and twenty-odd thousand tons of railroad iron were imported last year, requiring as they did over two hundred and fifty thousand tons of pig metal. Thus it took from our manufacturers the manufacture of two hundred and fifty thousand tons of pig metal and gave it to the manufacturers of Europe; and while our pig iron, under the excited gold market, was selling at seventy-five dollars a ton, it is now less than twenty-five dollars a ton, causing an actual loss of four or five dollars a ton upon the present cost of manufacture. Although for some one single year they may have made large amounts, yet when you take any large capitalist in the iron business for ten years, it will be found that he has not made three per cent. interest upon his capital.

Now, in regard to the facts of my friend from New York, [Mr. Brooks,] He speaks of its requiring three hundred thousand tons of railroad iron for the roads in the country. Now, the full estimate, made from actual data, by statisticians from all parts of the Union, never has carried it beyond one hundred and twenty-five thousand tons. Last year our mills had increased to a capacity of three hundred thousand tons; and this day I can show, from figures stating the capacity of every rolling-mill in the country, that the capacity of all the rolling-mills in the United States is six hundred and twenty-two thousand tons, and the whole requisition of the country is not over three hundred and forty or three hundred and fifty thousand tons. In addition to that I know the fact that three or four mills within my knowledge, one of them so large as to cover almost ten acres of ground, one half of whose furnaces are now going out of blast.

Mr. COX. I ask the consent of the committee to make a statement of fact.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee cannot give consent; they are acting under order of the House.

Mr. COX called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and STEVENS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 69.

So the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The fourth section was read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That section fifteen of an act entitled "An act increasing, temporarily, the duties on imports, and for other purposes," approved July 14, 1862, be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to impose a tax or tonnage duty of thirty cents per ton in lieu of "ten cents," as therein mentioned.

Mr. PIKE. I move to amend by adding to this section the following:

Provided, That the receipts of vessels paying tonnage duty shall not be subject to the tax provided in section one hundred and three of "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay the interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864.

I know that the Committee of Ways and Means are not disposed to add to the burdens already borne by the tonnage of this country. There is this peculiarity about tonnage: the man who builds a vessel pays largely of the tariff duties upon the materials that enter into its formation—the iron, the copper, and other materials. In addition to this, which is computed to amount to $9,000 in gold upon every thousand-ton ship, the ship-builder is obliged to pay a manufacturer's tax like other manufacturers of the country.

Mr. STEVENS. The Committee of Ways and Means are not opposed to this proposition; but it ought probably to be inserted in the internal revenue bill. I do not see, however, that the adoption of the amendment will do much harm. We do not intend, therefore, to oppose it.

Mr. PIKE. If the Committee of Ways and Means do not intend to oppose it, let it be adopted, and let the matter go to a committee of conference.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, and I do so simply for the purpose of making a remark on another section of the bill. I yesterday stated the grounds of my opposition to the provision of the tariff bill in respect to duties on railroad iron; and I founded my remarks upon what I supposed to be the actual condition of the iron market at this time. I have since learned, on an investigation of the subject, that iron rails, instead of being held, as I supposed, at $165 per ton, are reduced in the market to $115 per ton, and that sales are offered even at a lower price. In the opposition which I made to the provision my object was not to inflict any injury whatever upon the manufacturers of my country. I desire to give them every protection which their interests and the interests of this country demand, and which shall be justified by the condition of the country. I believe it to be our duty to adjust our internal revenue and our foreign tariff in such a manner as to give the greatest possible amount of protection and revenue to the country. I desire to say that, with my present views, enlightened as I have been by the investigations to which I have referred, I shall sustain the proposition of the committee.

The amendment of Mr. PIKE was agreed to.

The fifth section was read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the term statutory, as used in the laws now in force imposing duties on foreign importations, shall be understood to include professional productions of a statutory or of a sculptor only.

Mr. KERNAN. I desire some explanation of this section. I should like to know what this unprofessional statutory is. Has this provision reference to those people who import leaden statues of Liberty, &c.?

Mr. MORRILL. I may state, in brief, that it has been found that parties have in many cases evaded the payment of duties by importing articles in the form of statutory, when they could not legitimately rank as such. In some instances lead has been thus imported to a large extent. We had a law by which statutory was admitted free; and statutes of the "Father of his Country" and of the "Author of the Declaration of Independence" were brought over in that way. I believe that the gentleman is answered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to know from the gentleman from Vermont whether this does not refer to one particular firm. I want to know whether this does not refer to Phelps, Dodge & Co., and that firm alone.

Mr. STEVENS. When statutory was admitted free we had statues of Webster and Clay and others in copper and lead imported, and so soon as they were landed and taken out of the custom-house they were melted down. It was a fraud upon the revenue.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What firm did that?

Mr. STEVENS. Phelps, Dodge & Co.

Mr. WARD. I desire to move a new section, and I think it will be appropriate here. It is as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, directed to refund to the proper party or parties the tax of forty cents per gallon collected upon all spirits imported prior to the 7th day of March, 1864, under and in pursuance of section seven of an act entitled "An act to increase the internal revenue and for other purposes," approved March 7, 1864.

Mr. MORRILL. I rise to a point of order. This is a revenue bill, and the amendment makes an appropriation, and is, therefore, not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order is well taken. This is a proper amendment, not to this, but to the internal revenue bill.

The Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where there is or shall be imposed any ad valorem rate of duty on any goods, wares, or merchandise, imported into the United States, and in all cases where the duty imposed by law shall be regulated by, or directed to be estimated or based upon, the value of the square yard, or of any specified quantity or parcel of such goods, wares, or merchandise, it shall be the duty of the collector within whose district the same shall be imported or entered, to cause the actual market value or wholesale price thereof, at the period of the exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same shall have been imported into the United States, to be ascertained, and such ascertained value shall be considered the value upon which duty shall be assessed. That it shall be lawful for the owner, consignee, or agent of any goods, wares, or merchandise, which shall have been actually purchased or procured otherwise than by purchase, at the time and not afterward, when he shall produce his original invoice or invoices to the collector, and make and verify his written entry of his goods, wares, or merchandise, as provided by section thirty-six, of the act of March 2, 1799, entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," to make such addition in the entry to the cost or value given in the invoice as in his opinion may raise the same to the actual market value or wholesale price of such goods, wares, or merchandise, at the period of exportation to the United States, in the principal markets of the country from which the same shall have been imported, and it shall be the duty of the collector within whose district the same may be imported or entered to cause such actual market value or wholesale price to be ascertained in accordance with the provisions of existing laws, and if such ascertained value shall exceed by ten per cent. or more the value so declared in the entry, then, in addition to the duties imposed by law on the same, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of twenty per cent. ad valorem, on such ascertained value: Provided, That the duty shall not be assessed upon an amount less than the invoice or entered value, any act of Congress to the contrary notwithstanding: And provided further, That the sections twenty-third and twenty-fourth, of the act approved June 30, 1864, entitled "An act to increase duties on imports, and for other purposes," and all acts and parts of acts requiring duties to be assessed upon commissions, brokerage, costs of transportation, shipment, transhipment, and other like costs and charges incurred in placing any goods, wares, or merchandise on shipboard, and all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this section, are hereby repealed.

Mr. COX. I move to add to that the following:

Provided, That the specific duty now assessed on tea and coffee be repealed, and an ad valorem duty be levied on tea of fifty per cent. and on coffee of twenty per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I understand from the point of order made by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] that this was intended as a revenue measure. The amendment I have just offered, in my judgment, will not change the revenue so far as these two articles of tea and coffee are concerned. I believe, however, that if this really were a revenue bill, the amendment submitted by me in reference to railroad iron would have been adopted. But the gentleman from Vermont, and especially the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I think, regard this not so much as a revenue bill as to protect the manufacture of iron. That is the basis of all their arguments.

I have not proposed any amendment to the tariff bill looking to the depletion of the Treasury. The rejection of my amendment, and gentlemen have boldly proclaimed it, will have the effect to prohibit foreign importation. If this had a proper title it should be this: A bill to prevent revenue to the Government.

The gentleman said that in spite of high protection to railroad iron by the present tariff there were one hundred and twenty thousand tons imported into the country during the last year. A most horrible condition of things! As if we get more revenue the less importation we have. According to that argument, when we have stopped importation we will get the greatest revenue.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the gentleman whether we have not derived under the present tariff a greater amount of revenue than under any since the foundation of the Government?

Mr. COX. The gentleman said that he expected to get $100,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL. We received $102,000,000.

Mr. COX. I understand only $70,000,000, according to the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury. Even if this be a revenue measure, I do not think that my amendment in reference to tea and coffee will affect the revenue. As teas vary in price from say seventy-five cents to two dollars, the average is perhaps about one dollar per pound. This is, on a gold basis, fifty per cent. ad valorem upon every pound of tea costing only a dollar. I propose to amend by making all specific duties on tea, whatever the price, ad valorem. What will be the effect? The operation would be to relieve all who buy the cheaper teas, and put the tax on the rich men who buy dear teas. And why should not the man who indulges in the luxury of tea worth two dollars a pound pay the higher tax, twice as much as the poor man pays who buys tea worth only seventy-five cents or one dollar a pound? The great consumption of tea and coffee is by the poorer classes, who have large families and more children; and therefore, if gentlemen are friends of the masses of the people they will favor this ad valorem principle in opposition to the specific tax.

How is it as to coffee? The same arguments will apply. The tariff is now five cents a pound in gold, or ten cents in paper. That will be equivalent to fifty per cent. ad valorem. This amendment will relieve all who buy cheap coffee at forty cents a pound, and lay it upon the men who buy coffee worth sixty or seventy cents. It is just and fair that there should be an ad valorem tax upon all articles which vary in price. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has adopted almost exactly the same principle in respect to sugar. He does not lay the same specific tax upon sugar. He has a variety of taxes on that article, varying from three to five cents per pound. The tax varies with the quality of the sugar. Why not lay a tax on tea and coffee on the same principle? Why not favor the poor man, when you do no injustice to the rich man? At least do not discriminate in favor of the men who have money to buy the higher qualities of teas, and discriminate against the poorer classes of community by making them pay the same tax per pound that the rich man does.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question recurring on the amendment of Mr. Cox,

Mr. COX called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL and Cox were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 70.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY. I offer the following proviso, to come in at the end of the section:

Provided, That the duty on the cloth now in the custom-house in New York, and donated to and imported last fall for clothing for the Sisters of Charity in the United States is hereby remitted, and the same shall be admitted free from duty.

I will briefly explain the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MALLORY. I hope by unanimous consent I shall be permitted to make a few remarks in favor of the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is acting under an order of the House that there should be no debate after the expiration of thirty minutes. That time has expired;

Mr. MORRILL. I make a point of order on that amendment. It is not germane to this bill, it being in the nature of an appropriation. A remission of duties.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MALLORY. I demand tellers on my amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MALLORY, and KELLOGG of Michigan, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 61.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. CORN, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, an act (H. R. No. 763) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri river to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1863, and to amend an act amendatory thereof, approved July 2, 1864.

TARIFF BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I move to amend by adding the following as a new section, to come in after the sixth section:

And be it further enacted, That in all cases since the 1st day of July, 1863, where the United States have been purchaser by contract made prior to the passage of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to increase temporarily the duties on imports," approved April 29, 1864, increasing the import duty on articles embraced in such contract, and delivered prior to the passage of said joint resolution, the appropriate heads of the Department and accounting officers shall be authorized, at their discretion, to settle and adjust such contract up to the passage of said joint resolution, according to the contract prices specified therein; and on such portion of the imported articles as may have been delivered and purchased subsequent to the passage of said joint resolution there shall be allowed an additional sum equal to the increased duty on such articles.

Mr. MORRILL. I make the point of order that this amendment is not germane to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. LITTLEJOHN.) The Chair must overrule the point of order.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I ask consent merely to explain the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Consent cannot be given in committee; the committee are acting under the order of the House.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I will say to gentlemen that this is a very honest amendment.

The amendment of Mr. WOODBRIDGE was not adopted.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to offer two sections to come in after the seventh section, which have received the assent of gentlemen on various sides of the House.

The sections were read, as follows:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That so much of sections thirty-nine, forty, forty-one, forty-two, forty-three, and forty-four of the act entitled "An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage," approved March 2, 1793, as require the branding or marking and certifying of casks, chests, vessels, and cases containing distilled spirits or teas, be and the same is hereby revived, to be executed under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to increase to any sum not exceeding $1,500 the salary or compensation of any deputy collector of customs whose compensation is now limited by law to a lower sum.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. The seventh section of this bill is intended to secure freedom for exports. I wish to move an amendment which is in furtherance of that object, and which I have been directed to report by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but which there will be probably no opportunity to consider at the present session unless it shall be considered at the present time. I move to insert the following as additional sections, to come in after the seventh section.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That the arms and munitions of war seized in or near San Francisco on or about the 19th day of August, 1864, under special order No. 174, and deposited in Benicia arsenal, (described in the report of J. S. Mason, acting assistant provost marshal of California, to R. C. Drury, assistant adjutant general, dated November 28, 1864,) be forthwith delivered, by any officer having the same in custody, to the owner or owners thereof, or their agents, to be exported under the laws of the United States as they may see fit.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That any collector, or other officer, at any port from which vessels may by law clear for any foreign port, refusing a clearance to any vessel or cargo entitled thereto by the laws on that behalf enacted, under or by reason of any order of any officer, military or civil, of the United States forbidding the exportation of any arms, munitions of war, guano, or other merchandise, the exportation whereof is not prohibited by act of Congress, shall be liable to forfeit and pay to the party injured by such refusal twice the value of the property so unlawfully detained, to be recovered in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of the cause.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That any arms, munitions of war, guano, or other merchandise seized for violation of any statute of the United States in any State or district wherein the United States courts are open, by any officer, civil or military, or by any person acting for or on behalf of the United States, shall not be detained in any military or private custody, but shall be forthwith delivered into the custody of the marshal of the United States for the district where the seizure may be made, and submitted to the district court of the United States for the district where the said seizure was made, to be proceeded against according to law; and any officer, civil or military, making any such seizure and failing to deliver the property to the marshal as aforesaid, or failing to submit the same to the district court for adjudication as aforesaid; or any marshal of the United States making such seizure and failing to submit the same to the district court for adjudication, or failing or refusing to obey the judgment of the court for the delivery of such property according to the decree or judgment of the court, shall be liable to pay the party entitled to such property double the value thereof, to be recovered by action in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of the same.

Sec. —. And be it further enacted, That any officer of the United States, civil or military, who shall prevent any person from leaving the United States, by land or sea, or shall demand or require any passport or other license as a condition of permitting any person leaving the United States, by land or sea, unless the person so prevented shall be liable to arrest, and be actually arrested by due process of law, for crime, or shall be in the military or naval service of the United States, or shall be arrested by the order of the President, under and according to the act of Congress authorizing the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, in the cases and subject to the conditions therein mentioned, or is engaged in rebellion against the United States, shall forfeit and pay to the party so detained not less than $500 nor more than $5,000, to be recovered by action in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of the cause.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will merely say a word in explanation of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman from Maryland that no debate is in order at this stage.

Mr. COX. Would it not be in order to rescind that most ungracious rule calling off debate on amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole can make no rules for itself.

Mr. COX. I move that the committee rise with the view to rescind that order. If we have amendments offered to this bill we must debate them.

On the motion that the committee rise, there were, on a division—ayes 51, noes 46.

Mr. MORRILL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORRILL and Cox were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 53, noes 57.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I raise the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] is not germane to the bill under consideration.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. It is germane to the seventh section of the bill, which is designed to secure freedom of exports.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again read the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. COX. If it be in order, I would suggest for the information of the Chair that the amendment has reference to the custom-house; and certainly it is germane to section seven.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has decided the point of order, and knows no mode of overruling that decision except by an appeal from the decision.

Mr. COX. I appeal from the decision of the Chair with the view to say one word.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the appeal is not in order.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my appeal.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to amend by inserting the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the duty on the cloth donated to, and imported last fall for clothing for, the Sisters of Charity in the United States, is hereby remitted, and the same shall be admitted free from duty.

Mr. MORRILL. I raise the point of order that we have already acted on this proposition.

Mr. MALLORY. This is not the same amendment as that on which we acted.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. MALLORY. Cannot I say something in favor of that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. MALLORY. It is a good charity, and I hope that the amendment will be agreed to.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 57.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. I will, if permitted, withdraw my point of order to the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late.

Mr. MORRILL moved that the committee rise and report the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LITTLEJOHN reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration House bill No. 795, amendatory of certain acts imposing duties upon foreign importations, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments.

Mr. MORRILL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman to permit me to have a vote on my amendment in reference to tea and coffee.

Mr. MORRILL. I cannot yield for that purpose.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were concurred in.

Mr. COX moved that the bill be laid on the table, and demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 85, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chandler, Cox, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Gider, Hall, Herriek, Hotman, Hutchins, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marey, Middleton, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Perry, Prayn, Rogers, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Townsend, Voorhees, Ward, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, and Benjamin Wood—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ancona, Ashley, Bailey, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Littlejohn, Loan, Marvin, McAllister, McBride, McCling, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomroy, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Scott, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Stevens, Sutes, Strouse, Thayer, Thomas, Upson, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Wheeler, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—85.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Arnold, Blaine, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Coffroth, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Denison, Donnelly, Briggs, Garfield, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Hulburd, William Johnson, Julian, Kasson, Knox, Lazear, Longyear, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, James R. Morris, Odell, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Stuart, Sweat, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Wadsworth, Winfield, Fernando Wood, Worthington, and Yeaman—54.

So the bill was not laid on the table.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POSTAL LAWS.

Mr. COLE, of California. I submit the following privileged report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 230) relating to the postal laws, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their amendment striking out the first section of the bill and agree to the same, with the following amendments: strike out of the sixth line the words "either wholly" and insert "on which the passage is;" strike out of the sixth and seventh lines the following words: "or short paid to the extent of more than a single rate of postage;" strike out of the ninth, tenth, and eleventh lines the following words: "with the stamps uncanceled, and notice of the amount of deficient postage thereon;" strike out of the fifteenth and sixteenth lines the words following, to wit: "which are short paid a single rate of postage only;" and strike out of the seventeenth line the word "single."

That the House recede from their third, fourth, and fifth amendments to said bill.

J. COLLAMER,
W. WRIGHT,
JOHN CONNESS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
C. COLE,
J. M. ASHLEY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PRUYN. I would inquire of the gentleman from California whether this report proposes to change the single rate of postage from three to five cents.

Mr. COLE, of California. No, sir.

Mr. BROOKS. Will the gentleman explain the first amendment?

Mr. ASHLEY. The amendment which the House insisted on was that where a letter was deposited in the office without any prepayment whatever it should be returned to the writer if he could be known without opening the letter; if it could not be so ascertained, then that the letter should be opened and then returned. If the letter was put into the office and part postage paid thereon, then it should be sent, and the remaining unpaid postage should be charged and collected when delivered.

Mr. BROOKS. The point I make is that this allows the postmaster to open letters. That ought not to be done, but the letters should be sent to the dead-letter office.

Mr. ASHLEY. The letters would be opened the same in the dead-letter office.

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, but under secret responsibility.

Mr. KASSON. Do I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that postmasters at the mailing office may open the letters?

Mr. ASHLEY. Yes, in case only the postage is not prepaid; but when the postage is paid only in part the letter shall be sent forward to its destination.

Mr. KASSON. Let me say that this is a power so delicate in its character, so important at times in its consequences, that there is no place but the highest, namely, the last resort here in Washington, where in my judgment that power should be exercised. And here it is opened only for the purpose of discovering whether or not there be valuables in it, and whether there is anything in it of such a nature as to require that it should be returned to the writer. But for the paltry consideration of three cents unpaid, often the result of accident, to allow such letters to be opened at the mailing office by any clerk, or by the postmaster himself, would be the most dangerous innovation ever perpetrated under the post office laws. I hope that under no circumstances the House will consent to the power of opening sealed letters. It would be enormously dangerous.

Mr. COLE, of California. This provision applies only to those cases where no postage is paid on the letters, and where the writers are not known. Its object is to relieve the dead-letter office from its great burdens.

Mr. KASSON. The returns of the dead-letter office show that letters on which no postage is paid are often the most important letters, sent by insurance companies and banks; and these, from the accident of not prepaying the postage, would be opened at the mailing office, and scattered, you know not where.

Mr. COLE, of California. The provision gives to postmasters alone the power of opening letters in cases where no postage is paid, and the name of the writer cannot be ascertained without opening the letter. Where any postage is paid the letters are to be forwarded to their destination, and the amount unpaid is charged and collected of the parties receiving them.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to state to the committee that this subject was deliberately considered by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and they were unanimously of opinion that no power ought to be granted to postmasters or to deputies to open letters which were not prepaid or on which sufficient had not been paid. There ought to be no exception to the rule, and I hope the House will vote down this part of the report. It is a dangerous power to put into the hands of postmasters or clerks. I trust we shall have a united vote against it here, as there was in the committee.

Mr. COLE, of California. The gentleman will see that it will be a very great accommodation to persons who drop letters in the post office casually, without prepayment of postage, to have them treated in this manner, rather than have them sent to the dead-letter office. The postmaster is allowed to open a letter for the purpose of ascertaining who wrote the letter, and to whom it should be returned. If, however, the writer is known, the letter is to be returned unopened.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. How can that be ascertained without opening the letter?

Mr. ASHLEY. We all know that in large places business firms have their cards printed or stamped upon their envelopes; and where that is not done the handwriting of business firms is frequently known. But such is not the case where stray letters are deposited by ignorant persons.

Mr. BROOKS. They are as sacred as any.

Mr. KASSON. The existing law makes it a highly penal offense for anybody, except the person to whom it is sent, to open any letter. Even if you find a letter in the street and open it you subject yourself to punishment, and now you allow the postmasters and clerks in all the post offices in the United States, twenty-eight or thirty thousand of them, to open letters and violate a general principle. I am afraid a temptation will be opened to those men to go further and to open letters which they have no right to open, under this modification of the law. Do not break the seal in any case or allow it to be broken, and then you are saved from thefts and violations of law.

Mr. ASHLEY. The gentleman who heads the Post Office Committee in the other branch of Congress has had more experience than any member upon this floor, having been Postmaster General, and for a long time chairman of the Senate committee. That committee were unanimous in believing that it was safe to allow the postmaster in any locality to open those letters only that are not prepaid, and thus not only save time, which the parties writing the letters would be very thankful to have saved, if, by any carelessness or neglect they had dropped such letters, but it will reduce the labor now heaped upon the dead-letter office here. I think the House ought to adopt the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. COLE, of California. I think this matter has been pretty thoroughly discussed, and I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was taken; and the report of the committee of conference was disagreed to.

Mr. FINCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was disagreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COLE, of California. I move that a new committee of conference be appointed.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed Messrs. COLE of California, BROOKS, and ASHLEY, the committee on the part of the House.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 169) to provide for the publication of a full Army Register; when the Speaker signed the same.

REFUGEE INDIANS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior transmitting the accounts for the fourth quarter of 1864 of the superintendent and agents in charge of refugee Indians; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

ENLISTMENT OF REBEL PRISONERS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War in answer to the resolution of the House respecting the enlistment of rebel prisoners; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

TRADE WITH REBEL STATES.

Mr. STEVENS obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to yield to me.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that the gentleman desires to make a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir; it is a report which the Committee on Commerce had leave to make at any time.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I hope the gentleman will wait until we get through with the next appropriation bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I gave way yesterday to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. MORRILL,] with the understanding that I should be permitted to make this report when the tariff bill was disposed of. That was the understanding I had with the gentleman from Vermont.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Illinois gave way yesterday to the gentleman from Vermont with the understanding that after the tariff bill was disposed of he should be allowed to make the report.

Mr. STEVENS. Then, of course, I must yield to him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce of the Senate and the Committee on Commerce of the House, which have been made a joint committee for this purpose, to make a report and to report a bill for action at this time. I may say that it is the unanimous report of both of those committees. I will ask, in the first place, that the bill may be read, and then the report.

The bill to repeal the eighth section of an act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between the loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July 2, 1864, was read a first and second time.

The bill repeals the eighth section of the act recited in the title, provided that such repeal shall not affect any contracts and sales provided for by the section where actual delivery of products has been made.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask now for the reading of the report of the joint committee.

The report was read.

Mr. BROOKS. This is an extraordinary exposure, and one calculated to excite great attention. What remedy does the gentleman propose?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The committee propose to repeal the eighth section of the law under which these abuses have grown up.

Mr. BROOKS. Does not the gentleman propose to go further? Here are persons who have violated the laws of the United States in holding correspondence with rebels.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman will observe that this is merely a preliminary and partial report. The committee deemed it important that this report should be made and action had upon it. After action shall have been had I am directed by the committee to report a joint resolution to still further extend the examination so that there may be a further report.

Mr. BROOKS. I was about to remark that if any of us in civil life were to send a letter or hold any correspondence with anybody in the South, we should be subjected to very severe penalties. I have not dared to write a letter to any one there since the beginning of this war.

Mr. CHANLER. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] if he proposes, by rescinding the section of the law to which he refers, to practically remove all means of punishment under that law for the offenses committed as related in this report.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Of course not. It does not affect the offenses already committed under that section.

Mr. CHANLER. If the gentleman's object is the punishment of these offenses, of course there will be no opposition to it. There has been no ignorance as to the facts stated in this report for more than two months past, though no action has been taken. I do not rise to oppose it, of course. I am disposed to see the proposition now submitted carried out, and carried out effectually.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would like to have the section read which it is proposed to repeal.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will send it to the Clerk's desk. It is a portion of the act entitled "An act in addition to the several acts concerning commercial intercourse between loyal and insurrectionary States, and to provide for the collection of captured and abandoned property, and the prevention of frauds in States declared in insurrection," approved July 2, 1864.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, to authorize agents to purchase for the United States any products of States declared in insurrection, at such places therein as shall be designated by him, at such prices as shall be agreed on with the seller, not exceeding the market value thereof at the place of delivery, nor exceeding three fourths of the market value thereof in the city of New York at the latest quotations known to the agent purchasing: Provided, That no part of the purchase-money for any products so purchased shall be paid, or agreed to be paid, out of any other fund than that arising from property sold as captured or abandoned, or purchased and sold under the provisions of this act. All property so purchased shall be forwarded for sale at such place or places as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the moneys arising therefrom, after payment of the purchase-money and all other expenses connected therewith, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and the accounts of all moneys so received and paid shall be rendered to, and audited by, the proper accounting officers of the Treasury."

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

It was so ordered; and being engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I am also instructed further to report the following joint resolution in connection with this matter. I will state that the House can do as they please with it. The committee have directed me to report it in order to enable them to go forward with this investigation and finish it up. I will ask to have the resolution read, and then the House can do as they please with it.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Be it resolved, &c., That the Committee on Commerce on the part of the Senate, and the Committee on Commerce on the part of the House, acting as a joint committee in the Thirty-Eighth Congress, for the investigation of trade with the rebellious States, by virtue of the resolutions of the House of Representatives and the concurrent resolution of the Senate and House, be continued after the 4th day of March, 1865, for the purpose of closing their investigation and making their report; and the report when completed, together with the evidence taken, and the report when completed, be printed; and the same be printed; and the chairman of either of the said committees shall have power to issue subpoenas and compel the attendance of witnesses, in the same manner as the Speaker of the House or President of the Senate.

The joint resolution was read the first and second time; ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In connection with this same subject, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the report and testimony taken and to be taken by the joint Committee on Commerce be printed.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANLER. I move that forty thousand extra copies be printed.

The motion was referred to the Committee on Printing, under the law.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the annual report of the Smithsonian Institution for 1864.

Mr. COX. In connection with this subject, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That five thousand additional copies of the report of the Smithsonian Institution for 1864 be printed, three thousand copies for the use of the House, and two thousand copies for the use of the Smithsonian Institution.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Printing, under the law.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Printing, immediately reported back the foregoing resolution with a recommendation that it do pass.

The resolution was agreed to.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, for the purpose of going into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 786) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PIKE in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of bill H. R. No. 786, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the first reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and the bill will be read by clauses for amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to amend by inserting after line eighty-four the following:

For a survey of and buoyings at Seekout river, from Pawtucket to India Point, in Providence, $1,000.

Mr. Chairman, this is the revival of an appropriation made in the Thirty-Sixth Congress, which was never used. The same reasons that induced the appropriation in the first place are in its favor now.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JENCKES. I move to amend by inserting after the amendment just adopted the following:

For improving the navigation of Providence river from Fox Point wharf to the Crook, so called, $20,000.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I observe in the bill the following item:

For protecting the foundation on which Waugoshance light-house is constructed, $90,000.

I desire to inquire what is the necessity of this large appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. We examined into the matter and found, by the representation of the parties having charge of this work, that unless this appropriation should be granted the whole light-house and all the improvements would go into the ocean. We thought it better that they should be saved.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rose only for the purpose of making the inquiry. The amount appeared to me very large.

Mr. STEVENS. So it appeared to us; and therefore, before reporting the appropriation, we applied to the proper officers for information.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by adding at the end of line one hundred the following:

For improving the harbor of Ashtabula on Lake Erie, $10,000.

This is a very important harbor, and is made far more so by the railroad leading to it, which is now nearly completed. It is very important to the coal-mining and the iron interests that this small appropriation should be made.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that this is not the proper place to insert appropriations for improvements of that kind, which have not received the consideration of the committee. We have harbor bills in which such an appropriation might be proper.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move to amend by inserting after line one hundred and fifty the following:

For laying the gas-pipe, erecting lamp-posts and lamps, and lighting Franklin square, $6,000.

This is a very important square. The inhabitants of this city have petitioned for an appropriation of this kind, and I think that their application should be granted. This square was granted by the city upon the condition that it should be kept lighted.

Mr. KASSON. There is, in a subsequent portion of the bill, an appropriation of two thousand and some hundred dollars for Franklin square.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. That is the usual appropriation.

Mr. KASSON. This appropriation, which the gentleman now proposes, was asked of the committee, and we thought it best to postpone making the appropriation for another year, as it was postponed a year ago. The improvement, although desirable in itself, ought to be postponed.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I will ask the gentleman whether he understands the conditions upon which that square was granted.

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. We investigated all that.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For refurnishing, repairing, and fitting up the President's house for the next presidential term, $30,000.

Mr. KERNAN. I should like to have some explanation of that. I am informed that $40,000 have been expended in furnishing the President's house during the past four years.

Mr. STEVENS. The usual appropriation heretofore has been $20,000. That was the amount appropriated at the incoming of this Administration; but the Executive mansion is in such a bad condition that it was deemed necessary to report an increase to the appropriation. We believe that this amount of $30,000 is necessary to make the Executive mansion habitable.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For repairing, reglazing, repainting, and putting in thorough order the green-houses at the President's, $5,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to reduce that appropriation to $2,000. My purpose is to call attention to the manner in which these appropriations have swelled in amount. I have them before me. They are as follows: for annual repairs of the President's house and furniture, improvement of grounds, purchase of plants for garden, and contingent expenses incident thereto, $6,000; for fuel, in part, for the President's house, $5,000; for under-draining the President's garden and Capitol grounds, $1,000; for refurnishing, repairing, and fitting up the President's house for the next presidential term, $30,000; for repairing, reglazing, repainting, and putting in thorough order the green-houses at the President's, $5,000; for painting the President's house inside and out, and the iron fences contiguous thereto, $8,000; for carrying the Potomac water into that portion of the President's house occupied for offices, and all the necessary fixtures, $3,000; making in all $58,000. We have in this one bill appropriated for the President's house and grounds the very handsome sum of $58,000. I hold in my hands the appropriations for this purpose during the corrupt and dishonest Administration that immediately preceded that of Mr. Buchanan. There were two appropriations, one of $14,000 and another of $6,000, making in all $20,000, for the purpose of furnishing and refitting the President's house.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman will look into the deficiency bill for that year he will find another appropriation for $8,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I examined the whole subject at the time, and I am pretty certain about the figures I have stated. And I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that $20,000 was appropriated at the outgoing of a very extravagant Administration and upon the incoming of a very extravagant Administration, the corruption and dishonesty of which had more to do with bringing the present party into power than anything else; and that that $20,000 has swelled up to $58,000 in the present bill. It is an appropriation unprecedented in the history of the country.

I now withdraw my amendment, for I do not expect that any attempt to diminish these appropriations will meet with the approval of gentlemen who control the action of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I intend to astonish the gentleman from Indiana by saying that his amendment is a very proper one, and that I will vote for it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I renew it.

The amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read, as follows:

To meet the expenditure made by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in illuminating the Capitol and the Government portion of the City Hall, $300, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. DRIGGS. I understand that all the candles used had been purchased and paid for before this illumination took place, and that all the labor was performed by the employes of the Capitol; and I do not see, therefore, any reason for this appropriation. I move that it be stricken out.

Mr. STEVENS. To be sure the candles were upon hand and they have not been charged for; but the fixtures had to be provided for putting the candles up, and this appropriation is to pay for them, as well as for other incidental expenses. I move to reduce the appropriation to $250.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. Driggs's motion to strike out was then agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For replacing all the worn-out and worthless hydrants on Pennsylvania avenue with hydrants known as the "McClellan hydrant," $25,000.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to strike the appropriation out.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 33; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. HOLMAN and HOOPER.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 43.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Maine, moved to insert the following:

For making a permanent roadway from the north portion of the President's house to the new stable, $2,000.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read the following clause:

For publishing the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences, $6,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. I must raise a point of order on that clause in the bill. It is a very clear case, as there is no law authorizing the publication of the report of the National Academy. This is the first time this has been sought to be done. There never has been any law authorizing it.

Mr. STEVENS. This appropriation is in furtherance of one of the branches of the Government and hence it comes under the rule.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose the same might be said with reference to the common-school system of the country or of any State in the Union. It is not a branch of the Government, and it has nothing to do with the Government. It is a private corporation.

Mr. PRUYN. By the terms of the act incorporating the National Academy of Sciences, it is made the duty of that Academy, without charge to the Government, to investigate all questions of a scientific character which may be referred to it by the officers of the Government, on such advice as the Academy is supposed to be able to give. I suppose that is what is meant by the obligation of Congress to pay the expenses of publishing its annual report. It is put on the ground that it has performed services for the Government, and is in reality a Government institution.

Mr. HOLMAN. That would not make the Government liable for its support.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PRUYN. I would ask that the item be passed over until we can ascertain whether there is any provision in the law authorizing the publication.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would prefer to have it decided now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides against it, because there is no law authorizing any such publication.

Mr. PRUYN. We might, if this could be passed over, find a reason for it in the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no such provision in the law. That law has been passed since both the gentleman and myself have been in Congress.

Mr. PRUYN. It has not been passed since I have been here.

Mr. KASSON. They have made such reports, and some have been printed. But I am perfectly content to leave it until we can see whether the appropriation is in accordance with the law.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order on the statement of facts made, and rules the clause out.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move to amend by inserting after line three hundred and thirty-five the following:

For the improvement of the public grounds in the city of Washington, to be expended under the direction of the Commissioner of Public Buildings in the execution of such plan or plans as were made by A. J. Downing, with the approbation of the President of the United States, and in continuance of the same, with such alterations and amendments as the changes which have since occurred may suggest, $10,000.

I offer this amendment by the direction of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and they deem it very important that it should pass. There is no system at all by which these grounds are managed and improved. We consider it especially necessary that the intention of Congress, when they made the appropriation for employing Mr. Downing to improve these grounds and beautify them, should be carried out, and that we should have some comprehensive plan to proceed by. A gentleman who made the plans for the parks in New York and Brooklyn came before the committee, and it was made evident to us that it was necessary to have some general plan by which these grounds should be improved as was originally designed. I trust that as long as this capital is to be the capital of the nation we shall do what we ought to do, bearing always in mind the heavy pecuniary obligations that are upon us, to put and keep these grounds in a proper condition. And in order to do that we must have some plan to proceed upon. I trust the recommendation of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds will be complied with.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not know what public grounds the gentleman refers to.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I mean all the public grounds. I want also something to be done with this canal; something to improve the sanitary condition of the city.

Mr. STEVENS. The architect of the Capitol has made a long report upon this subject, and has told us what he thought ought to be done; but he thinks it can be postponed a little. I think there is no necessity for making an appropriation now. Now I know that the original plan contemplates a very large expenditure eventually, and the gentleman who now has the management of this whole matter can be relied upon. To employ a new man to lay out and expend this money now is wrong. There is an appropriation already in the bill for these grounds, and I cannot see the necessity for this amendment, and I am opposed to the improvement in the way now recommended, though it may be necessary eventually.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I do not understand that any report has been made comprehending what was intended by the original action of Congress, which was not carried out in consequence of the death of Mr. Downing. I know that it was a great mistake that I did not go before the Committee of Ways and Means and urge this proposition there. I understand very well the importance of having everything stamped with the approval of that committee that is to be entertained by this House. I understand that all the other committees should go and bow down before them and present their propositions to them. But notwithstanding that our committee may not have the same weight as the committee of Ways and Means, I beg leave to state my opinions here, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is very kind and courteous in listening to them. I trust the House will consider this matter and grant this small appropriation for a matter which we deem, with all due deference to the Committee of Ways and Means, of some little importance.

Mr. STEVENS. Do I understand that a new officer is to be appointed to do this work?

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I understand that some suitable person is to be appointed.

Mr. STEVENS. Then the object is to employ another officer for the purpose of making this estimate and this plan which has already been attempted by Mr. Walter, and others. I do not wish to say anything against the scheme of the gentleman, who has no doubt examined into this matter, but I think that just now there is no necessity for this appropriation. I think we had better postpone it for the present.

The question was taken on Mr. Rice's amendment, and it was disagreed to—ayes nineteen, noes not counted.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I will offer one more amendment, and it is as follows:

The salary of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, from July 1, 1864, shall be $3,000 per annum, and the sum of $2,000 is hereby appropriated to pay the arrearage of the same for the present fiscal year and the increase of the same for the next fiscal year.

I am as much opposed to the increase of salaries as any man in this House, and I have voted against them almost invariably; still I do believe that from the duties devolved upon this officer, their great variety, and his constant employment under them, his salary should be raised to that of a bureau officer. This proposition is merely that his salary shall be brought up to that of the gentlemen who are at the head of bureaus in the Departments. In order that the House may understand what are the duties of this Commissioner, I send up a paper to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Duties of Commissioner of Public Buildings.

It is the duty of the Commissioner—

To see that all moneys appropriated for the public buildings and grounds are properly expended, and to keep all the accounts and vouchers relative thereto, and to superintend all the work.

To take special charge and care of the Capitol and President's house, and see that they are kept in order.

To appoint and oversee the police, laborers, watchmen, &c., in the Capitol and President's house, see that they perform their several duties, and pay them.

To appoint and oversee the public gardeners and all the laborers in the public grounds, and pay them.

To see that the Potomac, Anacostia, and Benning's bridges are taken care of, kept in proper repair, and the draws properly attended. [The Potomac bridge was taken possession of by the War Department in 1863, but the care of it is expected soon to revert to the Commissioner, who is, by law, its custodian.]

To take care of Pennsylvania avenue and all other streets and avenues improved in whole or in part by Congress.

To see that certain nuisances are abated, when there is money to the credit of the nuisance fund, provided his attention is legally called to them.

To examine and send all transient pauper patients to the hospital who come within the provisions of the acts of Congress appropriating money to take care of such as are sick.

To take care of, sell, and convey all city lots belonging to the United States in the city of Washington, and to take care of, and expend according to law, any money derived from the sale of such lots.

To keep up a constant and somewhat extensive correspondence relative to the official business of his office.

To make an annual report to the Secretary of the Interior to be laid before Congress; and to make special reports to the Secretary or to Congress whenever the same may be called for, at times requiring great research and much labor.

There is a law of the United States requiring that all contracts relating to the public buildings should be formed by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, but of late years it has become almost a dead letter. Some contracts are formed and executed by the Commissioner.

There is probably no office under the Government whose archives are more important than those in the office of the Commissioner of Public Buildings, and there is much care and responsibility required to keep them safe and in proper order.

The Commissioner is required to attend all public receptions at the presidential mansion.

There are many minor duties connected with the office that cannot be specified. They are incidental to other prescribed duties, and are continually occurring.

The Commissioner of Public Buildings is constantly engaged in official duties from early in the day until the usual dinner hour, and a day seldom passes when he is not called upon to perform official duties at his house after office hours.

The place is one of very great responsibility, and of constant labor.

B. B. FRENCH,

Commissioner.

January 31, 1865.

The lighting of the Capitol and President's house, and all the street lamps belonging to the United States, and all repairs and labor incident thereto, are under the Commissioner.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I ask for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. RICE, of Maine, and KELLOGG, of Michigan, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventeen, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to amend the bill by striking out on line two hundred and eighty-eight the word "six" and inserting "eight" in lieu thereof, so that it will read:

For surveying the public lands in Wisconsin, at a rate not exceeding eight dollars per mile, $6,000.

Mr. Chairman, my information is that this survey cannot, under the present prices and the increased expenses of all such work, be accomplished at the rate of six dollars per mile. There is very little of the public land yet remaining unsurveyed in the State of Wisconsin. When that work is completed the general land office for the States of Iowa and Wisconsin can be closed. There are at present no public lands to be surveyed in the State of Iowa, and when the small portion of work remaining to be done in the State of Wisconsin is accomplished, that land office can be closed. It is now being conducted at an expense of $11,000 a year, and it will be economy on the part of the Government to finish up, even at the prices which it is now necessary to pay, the surveys of the public lands of the State of Wisconsin and have that office discontinued which is costing the Government ten or eleven thousand dollars a year. I therefore hope my amendment will be adopted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Unless these lands are very bad lands to survey there is no difficulty in getting them surveyed for six dollars a mile. The Government formerly paid only three dollars per mile.

Mr. SLOAN. At what time?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I do not recollect at what time the price was changed, but I know what was formerly paid in the western country. That was what was paid for surveys in the State of Michigan many years ago, and in other western States.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FARNSWORTH] that my information is that five dollars a mile is the cheapest rate paid for surveying for many years past, and that this additional dollar a mile is not at all commensurate with the general increase of the price of such work. With this small appropriation, costing less than the amount annually paid for the expenses of the surveyor general's office in these two States, we may finish the surveys and have the office discontinued. It is on the ground of economy that I urge the committee to fix a price sufficient to have the surveys completed in the present year, so that the surveyor general's office may be closed, and this large annual expenditure of $11,000 be saved to the Government. I trust the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. DUMONT. I do not understand that the gentleman's amendment increases the appropriation at all. It simply provides that the rate paid shall not exceed eight dollars per mile.

The question was taken on Mr. SLOAN's amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. BENNET. I move to amend on line three hundred and six, by striking out "ten" and inserting "fifteen"; so that it will read:

For surveying the public lands in Colorado Territory at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines.

I see that in the succeeding clauses the rate per mile is increased in the other mining Territories; and there is every reason why Colorado should be classed with them, instead of with the Territories that are not mineral. All the necessities of life cost fully one third more in Colorado than in the Territories lying on the Missouri river. There are more reasons for increasing the surveying rates in Colorado than in New Mexico, for the former is the newer Territory, and its agricultural interests are less developed than those of New Mexico.

There is a further reason why this amendment should be adopted. It will facilitate the survey of the public lands in Colorado. Nine tenths of the settlements in that Territory are of unsurveyed lands. The settlements are far in advance of the surveys, which have gone on very slowly. I think it is the interest of the Government not only to increase the rates paid for surveys, but also to increase the appropriation for the purpose, so that the lands may be the earlier brought into market and sold.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I do not, myself, know what would be a just compensation for this service. The Committee of Ways and Means has taken the estimates sent in by the Department. The only doubt in my mind is whether the rates for Nevada and New Mexico should not be reduced to ten dollars a mile rather than the rates for Colorado increased to fifteen. I know that that would satisfy the gentleman from Colorado, because all that he wants is to have that Territory put on a par with the others. Colorado is a nice smooth Territory where the land is easily surveyed, and where there would not be, probably, such an expenditure in shoe leather and clothing on the part of surveyors as there would be in the wilds of New Mexico and Arizona.

Mr. BENNET. The gentleman's knowledge of Colorado must certainly be very limited if he thinks that it is a smooth Territory. The Rocky mountain range cuts it in two parts, running north and south. A large part of it is mountainous; and it is only in the narrow valleys that surveys for agricultural purposes are made.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not suppose they were going to survey these rocks at all. Colorado is a nice Territory. I like it very well so far as I have seen of it, [laughter:] but I did not suppose they intended to survey these mountains; I supposed it was only the fertile valleys, which are not as numerous as I wish they were, that they wanted to survey. But perhaps it is better the other way, for these rocks contain gold and silver, and if the people once get machinery there, so as to crush the rocks, it will be worth all the rest of the United States put together—these rivers of gold and mountains of silver.

I think, however, that the gentleman from Colorado had better allow these fertile valleys to be surveyed first, at the price estimated for, and when we come to the mountains we will see what can be done. It might be as well to equalize the rates downward, for I do not like Colorado to be worse dealt by than any of the other Territories.

The question was taken on Mr. BENNET's amendment, and it was rejected.

The following clause was read:

For surveying the public lands in Nevada, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $15,000.

Mr. STEVENS. In accordance with the suggestion I made a few moments since, I now move to amend this clause by striking out the word "fifteen" where it first occurs, and inserting the word "twelve" in its place.

Mr. COLE, of California. I hope this amendment will not pass. The sum of fifteen dollars per lineal mile is only a limit upon the surveyor general of the State. There are some portions of land in that State that cannot be surveyed even for that sum. It is true that part of the land can be surveyed at a less rate than that. There are deep gorges and mountain fastnesses over which the lines cannot be run even for that sum; some portions of them may be run for that sum. I think this amendment would work injustice and tend to keep the lands out of the market. I hope it will not pass.

Mr. WORTHINGTON. I hope this amendment will not prevail. I perceive that the same price is proposed for surveying lands in Nevada as is proposed for surveying public lands in the State of California. Now I am content to let it remain as it is. But I think it would be a great hardship and a great injustice to diminish the rate below the sum reported by the committee. It is now cut down to the lowest price, and will do scarcely anything more than pay for the survey of these public lands. I hope, therefore, the amendment will not be adopted.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The following clause was read:

For surveying the public lands in New Mexico, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $5,000.

Mr. PEREA. I move to amend by striking out "$5,000" and inserting "$15,000." I understand the Delegate from Colorado [Mr. BENNET] to make an issue upon the appropriation for New Mexico. It seems to me that he cannot have read the appropriations here. By reading them he will see that Colorado receives an appropriation of $15,000, while New Mexico is given but $5,000. I suppose he really does not object to New Mexico receiving $5,000, while his Territory is to receive the sum of $15,000. New Mexico is paying $150,000 a year into the United States Treasury, while in Colorado, I believe, there is not even a collector of revenue yet; at least so far as I have heard.

Now, we of New Mexico are not asking for immense appropriations here. We from New Mexico are generally modest. Having a population of upward of one hundred thousand inhabitants, we gave up the Territory of Colorado with a population of twelve thousand. Yet we come here and ask for only $5,000, while Nevada asks for $15,000; yet there are as many lands to be surveyed in New Mexico as in Nevada.

Mr. BENNET. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment of the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. PEREA.] I desire to say that I made no issue with him at all. If he so understood me he is entirely mistaken. I only alluded to the fact that while it is proposed to allow ten dollars a mile for surveying in Colorado it was proposed to allow fifteen dollars a mile in New Mexico. Now those two Territories lie side by side in the ranges of the Rocky mountains. New Mexico is a Territory some fifteen or sixteen years old, while Colorado was organized under the act of February 28, 1861. The facilities for living cheaply are not so great in Nevada as in New Mexico. I allude to that only as a reason for making the price of surveying fifteen dollars a mile in Nevada as well as in New Mexico. In regard to the amount of money appropriated for the service, I would say that surveys have not been ordered in Colorado but for two years previous to this appropriation. There is a large amount of land there to be surveyed, and that I suppose is the reason why the Department estimated for $15,000 instead of $5,000 for Colorado Territory. New Mexico has a large amount of private lands, and consequently there is less of the public domain in New Mexico than in Colorado.

Mr. PEREA withdrew his amendment.

The next clause was read, as follows:

For surveying the public lands in California, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township and ten dollars for section lines, $30,000.

Mr. COLE, of California. I move to strike out the words "at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines;" so that the clause will read: "For surveying the public lands in California, $30,000." I deem it my duty to state here that in central portions of the State of California there are large tracts of the public lands that are unsurveyed even to-day, for no other reason in the world than that there have not been sufficient payments provided for their survey. I refer to mountain lands, not such mountain lands as are on this side of the continent, but such as are full of deep gorges that are most difficult to survey. These lands are valuable, nevertheless, for the timber that is on them. There are lands in California that can be surveyed at much less rates than those named in this clause. Under former Administrations appropriations have been made, and have been expended in surveying the Colorado desert, lands that will never be purchased by any persons, lands that are wholly valueless. Those surveys were easily made, and the appropriations were wasted on them. But the lands in California valuable for their timber have been left unsurveyed to this time. A great deal of litigation has resulted from this condition of affairs, growing out of disputes about boundaries, and these public lands have not been brought into market. Now, if this restraint is taken off, leaving the surveyor general for the State at liberty to go on and have these valuable lands surveyed, it will result in a great public benefit.

I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be adopted. I have heard many complaints on this subject. In my own county of Santa Cruz, in the central part of the State, complaints have been made by settlers upon the public lands, as well as others, who desire to have the land surveyed. The complaint is that there is no possibility of surveying those lands under the present restrictions. There is no proposition to increase the appropriation at all.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the amendment will not prevail. If it should, whoever gives out the contracts there might expend the whole appropriation in surveying one fourth of the land that is surveyed by the standard rule.

Mr. COLE, of California. There are in the central part of the State valuable lands which will remain unsurveyed from year to year, unless some such proposition as this be adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. I suppose that they cannot be very difficult to survey.

Mr. COLE, of California. They are very difficult indeed.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, we should certainly name some definite sum by which the surveyor general is to be governed in giving out his contracts. If the gentleman's motion prevails it will leave the sum indefinite; and the whole amount of the appropriation might be expended upon one rancho.

Mr. COLE, of California. We have confidence in our surveyor general. He will do what is right.

Mr. MCBRIDE. I will ask the gentleman from California whether this bill does not provide for increasing the former rates paid for surveying.

Mr. COLE, of California. If it does, the amount is not now sufficient; it does not begin to be sufficient. I think that it is a matter of economy to bring these lands into market. They will be bought for their timber.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to amend by inserting after line three hundred the following:

For surveying the public lands in Idaho Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $15,000.

In examining this bill I find that the Territory of Idaho has been entirely omitted; for what reason I do not know. As a reason for the adoption of this amendment I will state that no Territory, perhaps, belonging to the United States is settling more rapidly than the Territory of Idaho; and in none is there a greater demand for surveys. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. UPSON. Has the Indian title been extinguished?

Mr. WALLACE. It has with regard to a large portion of the lands, but not all.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether an appropriation for this purpose was not made last year.

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEVENS. Has that been expended?

Mr. WALLACE. I am not able to say.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe there is an unexpended balance which the Department thought sufficient. That is my recollection.

Mr. WALLACE. I know that there was a great necessity for the expenditure of that appropriation. Why it should not have been expended I cannot tell.

Mr. STEVENS. It was not done; and there remains an unexpended balance. If such should prove not to be the fact, I would have no objection to the amendment. I suggest that the gentleman had better withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. WALLACE. I withdraw the amendment with the understanding that I shall have an opportunity to offer it hereafter, if there should prove to be no provision in reference to this matter.

Mr. HIGBY. I move to amend by inserting after line three hundred the following:

For surveying the public lands in Montana Territory, at rates not exceeding fifteen dollars per lineal mile for standard lines, twelve dollars for township, and ten dollars for section lines, $10,000.

I introduce this amendment for the sake of making an inquiry. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has stated that there was last year an appropriation of this kind for the Territory of Idaho. It is possible that a similar appropriation may have been made for Montana, and not expended. It is certainly best for the country that a survey of the mineral lands should be made as speedily as possible, so that they may be brought into market.

Mr. STEVENS. I deem that the land ought to be surveyed as fast as the Indian title to it becomes extinguished. But I think that there is an unexpended balance of appropriation for Montana.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Iowa. The gentleman is correct; there is an unexpended balance of appropriation for Montana.

Mr. STEVENS. Then let us use that up before we make another appropriation.

Mr. THAYER. I desire to say that I know there is an unexpended balance of appropriation in regard to Arizona, for I had occasion, as chairman of the Committee on Private Land Claims, to examine into the subject.

Mr. HIGBY. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I think that this matter may be settled now, as I have found the communication for which I was looking. I find that the unexpended balances are as follows: for Arizona, $10,000; for Idaho, $10,000; and for Montana, $10,000. These amounts have been left over from last year. So the three cases seem to be provided for, as that appropriation is good for two years.

Mr. WALLACE. The amount of $10,000 is not enough to meet the wants of Idaho. There is, and has been, a great demand for lands upon which to settle, and the settlers want these lands surveyed, so that they may pay the price to the Government and secure their titles. Unless this appropriation is made that cannot be done. I know the immigration that is flowing into the Territory of Idaho; I know the wants of those people; and I know, sir, that this appropriation is needed.

Mr. KASSON. If they have not been able to expend there, because of the Indian title or other cause, the appropriation of $10,000, I ask whether it is expedient for us to increase the amount so originally appropriated. It seems to me that that is enough until it has been expended. It is known that it does not interfere with the squatters' title, and that their rights will be preserved when the land is surveyed. Of course it is convenient to them to have the land surveyed so as to secure their title, but why appropriate more money when the $10,000 has not been expended?

Mr. WALLACE. The squatters are not interfered with; yet so long as the lands are unsurveyed, and they cannot procure patents from the Government, the settlers are unwilling to go on and make the improvements that they otherwise would make. In order that the lands may be surveyed and these improvements may go on, I ask this appropriation may be made.

The question was taken on Mr. WALLACE's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. BENNET. I move to insert the following:

For collecting statistics of the wealth and extent of the mineral resources of the States and Territories west of the Missouri river, under the direction of the General Land Office, $25,000.

I ask the Clerk to read the letter which I send up.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
GENERAL LAND OFFICE, March 1, 1865.

SIR: In answer to your letter of to-day as to "some special effort" for a small appropriation to obtain data respecting the "immense mineral domain" as basis for a legislative system, I have to state that this office is impressed with its necessity to the public interest, and has brought the matter, time and again, with all the force at command, to the attention of Congress and the country, as shown in our annual reports of 1861, 1862, 1863, and 1864.

We have an auriferous and argentiferous region of a million square miles, interspersed with beds of coal and the useful metals—copper, iron, lead, and tin—and yet are absolutely left without means for taking the very first step for securing a system which shall make this magazine of wealth available to the United States Treasury, and that, too, when the taxing power inexorably invades every individual interest, and even now is inadequate!

Shall the enactment of such a system be deferred for two years longer because means are now denied or withheld to make explorations on the spot, gather up accurate information as to localities, values, local mining usages, so as to enlighten the public mind, submit to Congress a project for the great end in view, and yet not unnecessarily disturb local usages?

Let it be remembered that $1,000,000,000 have already been extracted without a dime of revenue to the Treasury, and that, when the rebellion is crushed, a million and a half of armed men are to be restored to civil pursuits, and what more efficient in solving the problem of their easy business restoration than to open those inviting, magnificent fields of enterprise under a well-devised system which, while giving support to multitudes of individuals, will relieve the nation and diminish taxation?

To prepare the way to this end by personal explorations upon an economical basis of expenditure, and hasten results to be laid before Congress, an appropriation of $25,000 should be at once made, as repeatedly recommended by this office.

With great respect, your obedient servant,
J. M. EDMUNDS,
Commissioner.

Hon. H. P. BENNET, House of Representatives.

Mr. BENNET. Mr. Chairman, this does not create any new office or any new officer, but simply enables the General Land Office with the present officers to make inquiries in reference to the mineral resources of the country where surveys are now being made. It will afford ample and necessary information for the legislation which will be demanded at the hands of Congress at the next session. Every gentleman will admit that statistical information is absolutely necessary with a view to proper action on the subject. I do not ask for a large appropriation, and I hope that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I move to reduce the appropriation to $15,000, in order to say a few words on the subject. The Committee on Territories have fully considered the matter, and we believe that this useful information can be better procured through the efforts of the Commissioner of the General Land Office than in any other way. He has already done a large amount of good, has collected a vast amount of statistical information, has gathered many specimens of ores and minerals, and has done this without expense to the Government. I hope and trust that inasmuch as two committees of the House, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and the Committee on Territories, have recommended this appropriation, it will be adopted. We are looking to these vast Territories for the means of paying our public debt, and therefore let us deal liberally with them. I believe no more judicious thing can be done by this House and by Congress than to pass this appropriation. This officer is utterly unobjectionable, devoted to the interests of the Territories and of the Government as connected with the public lands, and has more information in reference to these matters than anybody else in the whole Government. I trust the amendment will be adopted. I will, however, move to amend by striking out "$25,000" and inserting "$15,000."

Mr. KASSON. I sympathize entirely with the gentleman who last spoke touching the importance of this subject, and the only objection I see to a moderate appropriation for this purpose is that in a miscellaneous appropriation bill, under a general direction simply for the collection of statistics, I fear we do not surround it with proper guarantees to know exactly in what direction the money is to be expended. I can see that it may be required for the transportation of the specimens alluded to, and their collection here in Washington; I can see that it may be wanted to pay somebody to go from one point where he is now, to another point, to make an inquiry touching some reported discovery of coal. I can see also that $3,000 might in this general way be given to a particular man for some information for which he could otherwise get no equivalent. I would like to vote for it if it were in a separate bill, and my only apprehension is that this is not properly guarded.

Mr. RICE, of Maine. I will say that the Committee on Territories have instructed me to report a bill, and I intended to bring it forward but have had no opportunity. A bill of this kind passed the Senate, was referred to our committee, and the committee recommended that it do pass.

I will withdraw my amendment, and offer the following, which I think the gentleman from Colorado will accept as a substitute for his:

To enable the Commissioner of the General Land Office to continue investigations which he has instituted in relation to the mineral resources of the United States, and the minerals, their extent and locality in the public domain, and shall report his doings, as by law required in relation to other business of the General Land Office, $15,000.

Mr. SLOAN. I believe that this amendment is one of very great importance to the public interests of the country. The subject to which this relates has been before the Committee on Public Lands, of which I am a member. We have given attention to it with a view of introducing a bill which should authorize either the Commissioner of Public Lands, or some new bureau to be created, to gather this information which the whole country demands.

I desire to say in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. Kasson,] that considering the information which we have now, or which we might perhaps acquire during the present session, it would be almost impossible to impose any limitation, restriction, or condition to this appropriation that would be intelligent or wise. I deem it far better to allow this money to be expended in the discretion of the Commissioner of Public Lands—a man, as has already been stated, of intelligence and integrity, one who has taken a deep interest in this subject, and who has collected very much information in regard to it. I believe every gentleman upon this floor who is acquainted with this gentleman believes he would expend the money wisely and economically. Give him a small appropriation that he may take the initiatory steps to acquire this information, to digest a plan, comprehensive in its scope, to give the whole country the information which is absolutely required in reference to mineral lands. I believe the proposition made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PIKE] is the proper mode of initiating the acquisition of this information which will ultimately be so valuable to the country.

I therefore hope that the Committee of Ways and Means will accept the amendment which was proposed by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. RICE,] and that they will vote this small appropriation of $15,000 for the furtherance of this important object, and the procuring of correct information in relation to the vast mineral resources of this country. It is better, in my judgment, that we should do that than that the committee should attempt, at this late period of the session, to pass an elaborate bill with restrictions and limitations.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise, in order that we may stop this sort of talk.

Mr. ASHLEY. Let us get a vote on this amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, if we can do so I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. BENNET. I accept, as a substitute for my amendment, that offered by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. RICE.]

The question was taken, and the amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire now to have the question of order finally settled in reference to the provision in relation to the National Academy of Sciences. I find that by the charter granted to them in 1863, they are required to report to Congress. Their report is made in pursuance of their charter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hold in my hand the act organizing this Academy of Sciences. I ask that the second and third sections of it be read, as bearing upon this question. I insist that this appropriation has no authority of law, and that we are not required to publish this report to any further extent than we already have done.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the National Academy of Sciences shall consist of not more than fifty ordinary members, and the said corporation hereby constituted shall have power to make its own organization, including its constitution, by-laws, and rules and regulations; to fill all vacancies created by death, resignation, or otherwise; to provide for the election of foreign and domestic members, the division into classes, and all other matters needful or usual in such institutions, and to report the same to Congress."

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the National Academy of Sciences shall hold an annual meeting at such place in the United States as may be designated, and the Academy shall, whenever called upon by any Department of the Government, investigate, examine, experiment, and report upon any subject of science or art, the actual expense of such investigations, examinations, experiments, and reports to be paid from appropriations which may be made for the purpose; but the Academy shall receive no compensation whatever for any services to the Government of the United States."

Mr. HOLMAN. My point of order is that by the second section they are required to report their organization to Congress; and in the third section there is an express provision that they shall receive no compensation for their services. They have already made a report, which has been published. My point of order is that there is no authority of law for the further publication of their report.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair having examined the subject, overrules the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I hope the amendment will not be adopted. I trust that gentlemen will notice the character of this little report. It is of very little value to the Government, in my humble judgment, although I do not profess to be competent to decide upon such questions. It is simply another of those elements of expenditure which are growing upon the Government day after day. When this institution was organized, I think the debates will show that it was asserted that it would not cost the Government one cent, and now, after their report has been published in the ordinary way, here is an appropriation of $6,000 for a further publication of their work. We have already published the reports which they have made in a volume which I send up to the Clerk's desk; and now we are asked to appropriate $6,000 for its publication.

Sir, I think we had better pension these men at once, instead of deceiving the country by this indirect way of sustaining a certain class of men at the public expense. It would be more honorable, and more consistent with the duty which the Congress of the United States owes to the American people, to put these men upon the pension list rather than to appropriate money for them year after year.

Mr. KERNAN. I would ask the gentleman one question: does he think these men would take pensions and stop? I have not the least idea in the world that they would.

Mr. HOLMAN. Neither have I. My experience is that the more you foster such enterprises the faster your expenses increase. The very first year after the organization of this society we are asked to appropriate, in addition to the ordinary expenses of publication, the sum of $6,000 for such publications as they may see fit to make. It is not in accordance with the duty which the Congress of the United States owes to the American people thus to bolster up particular interests at the expense of the whole people.

Mr. CHANLER. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is entirely mistaken in the character of the institution that he has just assailed, and in the object of the appropriation that he opposes. I do not believe that Congress can favor an institution more creditable to the country, or can do anything more beneficial to the interests of science or the dissemination of general knowledge. There is no deception used in this matter. There is nothing in the National Academy of Sciences that infringes on the rights of any class, or encourages one class to the injury of another. It is a purely scientific body of men, professors of learning in the chief colleges of the country, and men versed in the various departments of science, giving their experience and acquirements gratuitously for the general advancement of human knowledge. There are many questions arising from time to time in the administration of the Government that are elucidated by these means. We can look with pride and admiration at the records made in the history of American science by scientific labors like those of Franklin and other great minds.

Such an institution as this is a necessity for every great Government in the solution of important problems relating to coinage, to the alloys of metals, to commerce, to navigation, to astronomy, and to many matters involving abstruse calculation. Men who devote themselves to such studies are brought here at stated times to compare their views, and, by the collision of intellect, to develop and correct views. The reports of their meetings and the results of their labors and investigations should certainly not be hidden from the people. I look upon it as one of the best indications of the onward progress of our republican Government that we pay as much attention to these high scientific subjects as the older organizations of Government do. I call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the results of such scientific academies in Europe in regard to improving the health, the food, and the comfort of the humbler classes of society, so as to remove from his mind the impression which would certainly not coexist with an accurate knowledge of the facts. It was to such an academy as this that Napoleon referred for advice in relation to the best manner of feeding his armies, the simplest methods of transporting them, and for the scientific details necessary to carry on his great operations. I might debate on the usefulness of such an institution, on its practical benefits to the whole people; but the immediate question is, shall we suppress at this time the publication of the proceedings of this institution in its very infancy, before its capacity has been tested and proved? I hope not.

Mr. KASSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state two or three facts, without indulging in general debate, to show the character of the publications proposed by this society, and to show its relations to the practical business of the country. For example, here is one article that it wishes to publish:

"Note on the changes that have taken place in the bar of Charleston harbor since the sinking of obstacles in the main channel, as developed by the United States coast survey." Another is "On the dimensions and proportions of American soldiers," a subject which is connected, to some extent, with the military expenses of the Government. Another is on "A regulator for maintaining uniform motion, and an apparatus for recording time observations in type." "On the mineral lands of the United States, and the relations of the Government to their management." "On the origin and distribution of petroleum in the United States." I might go on mentioning the character of the papers proposed to be published by this society if time were allowed me to do so. I will cite only one additional fact: that experiments made under the direction of a committee of this Academy on the one article of oil resulted last year in the saving of $40,000 in the expenditures for the light-house establishments of the United States. These are facts known to the Committee of Ways and Means, and which have induced it to recommend this small appropriation in order to perpetuate in type the important discoveries and observations of that national institution.

At the request of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means I move that the committee rise for the purpose of arranging for an evening session.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PIKE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 786) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 772) to provide ways and means for the support of the Government; when the Speaker signed the same.

DAILY RECESS.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House take a recess to-day from half past four till half past seven o'clock, p. m.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House last night passed a joint resolution or bill authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance an additional sum of $250,000 to Paul S. Forbes, under his contract for constructing a steam sloop-of-war.

The SPEAKER. That motion will be entered on the Journal.

Mr. STEVENS. I modify my motion, and now move to rescind the previous order of the House in regard to its daily sessions; and move that to-day and hereafter the House take a recess each day from half past four till half past seven o'clock, p. m., until otherwise ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

PORTAGE LAKE HARBOR, MICHIGAN.

Mr. DRIGGS. I now call up the motion submitted by me some days ago, to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands a bill (H. R. No. 745) granting land to the State of Michigan to aid in building a harbor and ship-canal at Portage lake, Keweenaw Point, Lake Superior.

Mr. COX. I ask to have the bill read. I understand it is a substitute for the bill originally referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Public Lands, on the 16th of February, reported this bill back to the House, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which they asked to have printed, and then it was recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DRIGGS. I can explain the bill in a few moments.

Mr. STEVENS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. Driggs] to let this go over for the present, and have it come up the first thing after we meet this evening.

Mr. DRIGGS. I will agree to that, with that understanding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot say what gentleman will have the floor when the House meets this evening.

Mr. DRIGGS. Then I prefer to go on now. This is a proposition to appropriate two hundred thousand acres of vacant land, in alternate odd sections, to aid in the construction of a harbor and ship-canal at Portage lake, Michigan. This bill has been before the Committee of Public Lands, and I believe has the approbation of every member of that committee. It was not regularly reported to the House, for want of time, the committee having only one hour in which to make reports. I made the motion to recommit the bill, and it is now before the House. It is a very simple proposition, but, in my opinion, one just as important as any measure for local improvement which has passed the House this session. It is a question in which not only Michigan, but the entire lake coast is interested. I have petitions in its favor from the Board of Trade of the city of Detroit, the Board of Trade of the city of Cleveland, the Boards of Trade of the cities of Buffalo and Milwaukee, and I think the Board of Trade of the city of Chicago; and I also hold in my hand joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Michigan asking for this grant; and also the joint resolutions of the State of Minnesota asking an appropriation of land for this purpose. Thus two States unite in making this request. They do not ask one foot of mineral lands; mineral lands are especially excluded from the grant by the provisions of this bill.

I think that explanation must satisfy every one, and I therefore call for the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN called for the reading of the bill at length.

Mr. DRIGGS. I move to suspend the rule by which a member can demand the reading of the bill at length.

The motion was not agreed to; two thirds not voting in the affirmative.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. DRIGGS. I call for the previous question on the motion to reconsider the vote by which this bill was recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The question was upon the motion to reconsider.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 61, noes 31.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to lay the bill on the table.

Upon this motion the House divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 59; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER appointed Messrs. DRIGGS and HOLMAN to act as tellers.

The hour of half past four o'clock, p. m., having arrived, the House took a recess till half past seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock, p. m.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. COBB, by unanimous consent, asked and obtained leave to withdraw from the files the memorials presented by him at the last session for the impeachment of Judge Miller of the United States district court of Wisconsin.

NAVAL COMMITTEE REPORTS.

Mr. GRISWOLD, by unanimous consent, reported, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, adversely upon the petition for the relief of seamen on board the ship Nightingale, the petition of S. D. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, and the petition of Kendrick & Fisher.

The petitions were laid on the table.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Lieutenant Selfridge for compensation for property destroyed on board United States vessels, have directed me to report in favor of granting the relief asked.

The petition was laid on the table.

NOTIFICATION TO PRESIDENT-ELECT.

Mr. WILSON. I rise for the purpose of presenting a privileged report.

The committee appointed by the House to act in conjunction with a similar committee on the part of the Senate, and inform Abraham Lincoln of his election to the office of President of the United States for the term commencing March 4, 1865, have directed me to report that the committee have discharged their duty by waiting on the President-elect and informing him of his election. I ask that his response to the committee may now be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Having served four years in the depths of a great and yet unended national peril, I can view this call to a second term in nowise more flattering to myself than as an expression of the public judgment that I may better finish a difficult work, in which I have labored from the first, than could any one less severely schooled to the task. In this view and with assured reliance on that Almighty Ruler who has so graciously sustained us thus far, and with increased gratitude to the generous people for their continued confidence, I accept the renewed trust with its yet onerous and perplexing duties and responsibilities."

Mr. WILSON. I desire further to say that the committee have not yet received a response from the Vice President-elect, but will communicate it to the House when it is received.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

Mr. HULBURD, by unanimous consent, presented from the Committee on Public Expenditures a report; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HULBURD. I move that thirty-five hundred extra copies of the report just presented be printed.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be referred to the Committee on Printing under the law.

LAND GRANT TO MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned this afternoon, it had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 745) granting land to the State of Michigan to aid in the building of a harbor and ship-canal at Portage Lake, Kewenaw Point, Lake Superior. The question was upon the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to lay the bill on the table. On that question no quorum had voted, and the Chair had ordered tellers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the motion to lay the bill on the table.

The question recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 61, nays 33, not voting 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boyd, Brooks, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Driggs, Dumont, Eldridge, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Knox, Law, Littlejohn, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Amos Myers, Patterson, Perham, Perry, Price, Pruyn, William H. Randall, Schenck, Shannon, Sloan, John B. Steele, Stevens, Stuart, Thayer, Upson, Whitely, Wheeler, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Worthington—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bailey, Broomall, Coffroth, Cox, Dawson, Denison, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Holman, John H. Hubbard, Philip Johnson, Kuffelisch, Long, Middleton, Morrill, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Pendleton, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Thomas, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Chilton A. White, and Winfield—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Albert Anderson, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Boutwell, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanter, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eliot, Farnsworth, Hail, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Herick, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, King, Knapp, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Marcy, McAllister, McBride, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, William H. Miller, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Odell, John O'Neill, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Sweat, Townsend, Tracy, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Joseph W. White, Williams, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—88.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. DRIGGS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. COBB, one of its clerks, notifying the House that that body had concurred in the amendments of the House to Senate bill No. 88, regulating proceedings in criminal cases, and for other purposes; that it had passed without amendment House joint resolution No. 176, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance to Paul S. Forbes $250,000 additional out of the sum to be paid him under his contract for building a steam sloop-of-war; and also that it had passed Senate bill No. 483, to amend an act donating public lands to the States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

SUBSISTENCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to move to take from the Speaker's table the Senate amendments to House bill No. 600, for the better organization of the subsistence department, in order that they may be non-concurred in and sent back to the Senate.

There was no objection, and the amendments were taken up.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that the Senate amendments be non-concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN. I see that the Senate propose to strike out the second section, and I would like to have that explained.

Mr. SCHENCK. As the bill was reported from the House Military Committee it provided that assignments in the subsistence department giving increased rank should be made from among the officers who are holding office by appointment in the volunteer corps. The Senate proposed that at least two thirds from the volunteer corps should be thus assigned, reserving one third for the officers of the regular subsistence department. There are thirty-nine officers of the regular subsistence department, and nearly six hundred in the volunteer corps.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am satisfied.

The Senate amendments were non-concurred in.

COMMITTEE ON THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. GOOCH. I ask to take from the Speaker's table the Senate concurrent resolution in reference to the joint committee on the conduct of the war.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The resolution provides that, in order to enable the joint committee on the conduct of the war to complete their investigation of certain important matters now before them, and which they have not been able to complete by reason of inability to obtain important witnesses, said committee be authorized to continue their sessions for thirty days after the close of the present Congress, and to place their testimony and reports in the hands of the Secretary of the Senate; and further, that the Secretary of the Senate shall cause to be printed of the reports and accompanying testimony of the committee on the conduct of the war five thousand copies for the use of the Senate and ten thousand copies for the use of the House of Representatives of the present Congress.

Mr. GOOCH. I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "sixty days."

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to make it ninety days. I only wish to say that one of a series of western campaigns has been placed before that committee, and I believe that not a single western campaign or a movement of the western armies has been investigated by the committee on the conduct of the war, all they have done having reference to the armies of the East; and, sir, it is deservedly due to the armies of the West that the investigation referred to the committee pertaining to those armies shall be carried out, and I think that ninety days will be sufficient.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would ask the gentleman if he does not think the success of this western campaign is due somewhat to its not being interfered with?

Mr. GARFIELD. That may be true; but I would like to have the report of the committee on the conduct of the war to show that, if it is true.

Mr. GOOCH. I demand the previous question. The previous question was seconded.

Mr. PERRY. I move that the resolution be laid on the table; and upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 80, not voting 53; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, Chandler, Clay, Cox, Dawson, Denison, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hall, Herrick, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knap, Latham, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Nelson, Pendleton, Perry, Prayn, Radford, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Tracy, Ward, Whaley, and Winfield—49.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Ames, Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroi, Rice, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shannon, Sloan, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Townsend, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wheeler, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Worthington—50.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Blair, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cravens, Creswell, Henry Winter Davis, Deming, Donnelly, Driggs, Eden, Farnsworth, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, Ingersoll, Jenckes, William Johnson, Julian, King, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Morrison, Leonard Myers, Noble, John O'Neill, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Starr, John B. Steele, Sweet, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Webster, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—53.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. GANSON. Would it be in order now to ask the Committee on Military Affairs to report in reference to the Old Capitol prison?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I object to any question being asked now.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call for tellers on ordering the main question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania, and Gooch, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 26.

So the main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment to strike out "thirty" and insert "ninety" was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, as amended, was passed.

Mr. GOOCH moved that the vote by which the resolution was passed be reconsidered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MISSOURI AND KENTUCKY WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means with an amendment, a bill (S. No. 359) to reimburse the State of Missouri for moneys expended for the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was that bill referred to the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. It was recommitted to the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object to reporting the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to do so.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to know whether the object be to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union or to put it upon its passage.

Mr. MALLORY. Of course to put it upon its passage. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MALLORY and HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 20.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. MALLORY thereupon reported the bill. The amendment, which was read, appropriates the sum of $2,300,000 to reimburse the State of Kentucky for moneys expended in raising, equipping, and supplying troops for the United States, such sum to be disbursed by the commissioner under the same restrictions and upon the same conditions as are provided for the State of Missouri.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a question of order. The rules were suspended to allow the bill to be reported only. My point of order is that this amendment, being an appropriation, it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated to the House what the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky was; the gentleman from Kentucky also answered the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] stating what his object was.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman stated that he moved to suspend the rules to enable him to report the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. And to put it upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order upon the ground that the rules were suspended in order to allow the committee to report the bill for consideration at the present time.

Mr. MALLORY. The amendment merely places Kentucky on the same footing precisely that the bill places Missouri. The bill authorizes the appointment of commissioners to examine and audit the accounts of Missouri for money expended in raising, arming, and equipping troops called out by the Governor of Missouri and the Federal Government to aid in the suppression of rebellion in Missouri. My amendment provides for just the same thing in relation to Kentucky. In both States men were called out by the State Executive, and then received into the Federal Army and used by the Federal Government. We provide in this bill that an accurate examination of the whole matter shall be had by commissioners appointed by the Government of the United States. Not a cent is to be paid unless those commissioners find, by undoubted evidence, that the money has been advanced by those States. It also provides that the Government shall be credited with the amount the State owes the Government by direct taxes, and the balance, if there be any balance, shall be paid by the State.

I do not know that it is necessary that I should detain the House further. The justice of the case is apparent; and the impossibility of defrauding the Government out of a cent is so well established by the bill that I can see no earthly objection that any man can have to voting for it. If I could I would try to remove it, but I cannot, and therefore I call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MALLORY. I will do so; I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that a bill has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs in reference to the payment of the Missouri State militia, and a report on the subject has been directed by them to be made. I have prepared such a report.

Mr. MALLORY. I must claim the floor.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will indulge me for a very few minutes.

Mr. MALLORY. I will yield for a few minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish only to state the case as the Committee on Military Affairs understood it. The Missouri State militia were raised in pursuance of general order No. 96, which provided that the State militia of Missouri should be received into the service of the United States, and be paid, fed, and clothed, but no mention was made of bounties. They were not to go out of the State of Missouri, as provided by the exact terms of the order, except for the protection of that State. I have the order in my hand.

Mr. LOAN. These men were not connected with this matter.

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, I have the order before me which was sent to me by the Secretary of War in answer to the inquiry of the Military Committee in regard to the Missouri bill now before them. Now, by an act of March 25, 1862, the Secretary of War was ordered to pay these troops raised under this order the same pay and emoluments, including bounty, that other volunteers in the service of the United States received.

Mr. LOAN. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. GARFIELD. Let me get through with my statement. A few weeks subsequently to that a joint resolution was passed by the same Congress ordering the Secretary of War to suspend all payments under the act of March 25, and to appoint three commissioners to go to the State of Missouri and make a full and complete examination of all the claims referred to in the act. The time allowed the commissioners was subsequently extended six months, and they continued their examination and made a full report on all the questions committed to them by the law appointing them. One of the earliest acts that the Thirty-Eighth Congress passed—the third, I think—was to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to pay some $700,000 in full for all claims for pay, subsistence, clothing, and bounties, in the department of the West known as "the department of the Missouri." It was understood at the time that that settlement, made in pursuance of the report of the commissioners, was a settlement in full of all dues to the troops in that department. A law was also passed putting the Kentucky troops upon the same basis as all other volunteers except as to bounty. The bounty was excepted in terms, and now it is proposed that another bill shall be passed doing still more for Missouri troops. This may be perfectly proper, but it is incumbent upon gentlemen from that State to show us what troops these are, whether they are the same that we have at least five times legislated for and appointed commissioners to adjust their claims. I make these remarks with no design to obstruct any just claim of Missouri, but to elicit some explanation of this bill. I think, with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MALLORY,] that we ought to appoint a commission to do as much for the Kentucky troops as we have done for the Missouri troops. But I do not understand how we can be called upon to do any more for the Missouri troops than we have already done without knowing what troops they are, and when, how, and where they have been employed.

These are my questions.

Mr. BLOW. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has certainly not examined the bill he is so harshly criticising, nor do I believe, sir, he has read the Senate report, which so clearly establishes the justice of the claim made by the State of Missouri. The gentleman is mistaken in considering the home guard claim with this bill. He is entirely mistaken in supposing that the laws and orders he has alluded to have any connection with the troops proposed to be paid by this bill. If I can get the undivided attention of the House for a few minutes I will make a statement and show so clearly the justice of its provisions, that I think even the gentleman from Ohio will be satisfied that he is entirely mistaken in every point he has made, as every question he has asked will be fully answered. This bill was introduced in the Senate on the 19th of December last, by Hon. Mr. HENDERSON, and on the same day referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed. Since that time every member of the two Houses from Missouri has watched its progress with an interest which can only be appreciated by those who have lived in the midst of civil strife as we have, know what it has cost to advance the men and money as we do, and have witnessed the steady but inevitable decline of all those blessings which once rendered our State the most attractive portion of our country. On the 18th of January last the bill was ably reported from the Military Committee by Hon. Mr. BROWN to the Senate, and the report ordered to be printed, and on the 9th ultimo, after a brief presentation of its just and simple provisions, was passed by that body unanimously. It came to us, was promptly referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and is now presented by that committee for the favorable consideration of the House. To say that few bills have been more carefully presented, examined, and considered than this, is only to announce the truth. In Missouri we had too much at stake to suffer a single error to be made, and hence the mass of information and evidence presented was such as demanded the confidence and respect which have been awarded.

I beg that the Clerk may read the following

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY F. & J. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION.

FRIDAY, MARCH 3, 1865.

NEW SERIES.....No. 80.

extracts from the debate on the bill. Our Senators have stated the case so compactly that it will occupy but a few moments to obtain a perfect knowledge of it.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Mr. HENDERSON. This bill provides for an appropriation of money, and therefore I know that there will be unwillingness on the part of Senators to pass it, as there has been; and it is proper, it is nothing but right, to examine carefully and critically all measures of this character. I do not come here asking for any bonus to the State of Missouri, or anything that is not perfectly and legally just. There is a report made by my colleague (report No. 107) from the Committee on Military Affairs, where the subject was thoroughly examined. That sets out all the facts connected with this matter. A bill was passed in 1862 to adjust affairs of this character in the State of Missouri, but no adjustment was ever made, and not one dollar has ever been paid under that bill. It provided that the direct tax which had been levied on the State by the act of 1861 should be set off against the moneys appropriated for the payment of our troops.

"The circumstances may be readily stated. In 1861, at the time of the beginning of the Insurrection in the State, we had no Federal troops there, and large numbers of militia were called out, first by General Lyon, and afterward by General Fremont. There was an act passed that provided for the payment of these troops, and that has been settled; but the State convention passed a military bill in the fall of 1861; and in the spring of 1862 another invasion of the State was made under Coffee, Hughes, and various other parties, who had under their command a large force in northern Arkansas. They came into the State in large force, and we found ourselves entirely without the necessary military force to eject them. A provision had been made by which the military commander of the department of Missouri was to be the major general of the State militia. The design of this, the Senate will see, was to have entire and perfect cooperation between the State forces and the United States forces. The design was that the State militia should in no way be used in opposition to the commands of the United States officers. The United States officers called them out. The Senators will see, for instance, on page 14 of the report, what General Schofield says in regard to portions of this force:

"The 'ten provisional regiments' which the Governor organized for continuous service and placed under my command enabled me to relieve an equal force of United States troops, and send them to General Grant. On several occasions I have called out from one to four additional regiments for temporary service to meet the emergencies as they have arisen. With a few exceptions, they have responded with promptness and alacrity, and have done good service.

"As an example illustrating the value of this organization, on the 18th instant I called out the seventh regiment of St. Louis to relieve troops in the city which I wished to send after Shelby. Within six hours after the order was made the whole city was under the guard of this regiment and a few colored recruits, and the old troops were on their way to Jefferson City. The regiment was just as valuable to me, during the short time that its services were required, as a regiment of regular troops would have been."

"Senators will see on pages 9 and 10 of this report the number of regiments that have been called into the field under the militia laws of the State, and the time that they have actually served. There have been at various times as many as seventy or eighty odd regiments called out, because the militia organization in the State is perfect and complete. They have been called into service only at times of actual invasion or uprising in the State, when we could not do without them.

"They have always been called out under the orders of the major general whom the President has sent to take command of that Department. For instance, Senators will see on page 15 that General Curtis, under date of April 23, 1863, says:

"HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE MISSOURI,
"St. Louis, April 23, 1863.

"I desire to strengthen my forces on the Southwestern Branch railroad, and also on the Iron mountain road.

"A formidable rebel force has entered southeast Missouri, which must be immediately repelled.

"I desire you to call out three or four regiments of enrolled militia on each of the three roads for thirty days' service, and that three regiments may be added to the strength of this city.

"I have the honor to be, Governor, your obedient servant,
S. R. CURTIS,
"Major General.

"His Excellency Governor H. R. GAMBLE.

"And the Governor immediately gave the following order:

"St. Louis, April 23, 1863.

"The adjutant general will order General McCormick to call out three regiments for active service—say thirty-second, sixty-fourth, and sixty-eighth. He will order Brigadier General Crawford to call out three regiments for active service, to be embodied at suitable points. He will order Brigadier General Edwards to call into service three regiments of his command. All for thirty days.

"H. R. GAMBLE.

"I have before me the figures showing the money that had been expended by the State up to July last; but General Rosecrans called a large force into the field during the last fall, and in regard to that subject I have no figures. The State of Missouri is now called upon to pay that force. I have no figures either from the quartermaster's department or the pay department in regard to the troops called out by General Rosecrans.

"I will state, further, that General Dodge has called out a large force there very recently, under an order dated January 30, 1865. I notice that in his order he has embodied this provision:

"The troops when called out will be clothed and subsisted by the General Government, and armed, equipped, and paid by the State, as provided by the military bill."

"Though these men have been called out by the Federal authority, the State of Missouri has been required to pay the troops. Not only that, but in the early part of the war they compelled us to supply quartermaster's stores for these troops.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Was any settlement made under the act of 1862?

"Mr. HENDERSON. No further than to adjust the accounts so far as our direct tax was concerned. The Secretary of the Treasury was required, under the act of 1862, to offset our direct tax against the expenditures we had made for the militia.

"Mr. JOHNSON. Is that tax to be deducted out of this payment?

"Mr. HENDERSON. Yes. One of the provisions of the bill is that it shall be deducted. The pay department accounts show that the amount due to us up to July last was $4,005,919 49, and the quartermaster's up to January 1 of last year was $984,314 61, making an actual payment by the State of Missouri of $3,991,234 10. Our direct tax under the act of 1861 was $761,127 33, leaving an amount due of $3,230,106 77; but, as I have stated, these figures do not include the expenses of the organization called out last fall by General Rosecrans.

"Mr. JOHNSON. I want to know whether the appropriation of $4,000,000 made by this bill is in full of all the demands.

"Mr. HENDERSON. Task no more, and I have asked no more because I cannot well do it. I have not the figures from the pay department and the quartermaster's department. The quartermaster's department will be able to send but few figures, because the United States have subsisted the troops that have been called out within the last year, and from the pay department I have no figures since the 1st of July, and have not attempted to include them. I do not want anything unless it be found by the commissioner to be appointed by the United States under this bill that the accounts are just and proper, that the troops were called out as specified in the bill by United States officers, under the command of United States officers, and acted in conjunction with the Federal troops, and acted only when they were absolutely needed, and not a dollar is to be paid out at higher rates than were allowed for the same service by the United States."

Mr. BLOW. Mr. Speaker, the people of Missouri are sound to the core, and have that kind of pride and energy which always commands respect and sympathy. We are no beggars, sir, and do not come here to ask the bounty of our Government, but to pray that justice may be done our loyalty, and that sacrifices for the Union cause may be recognized, at least so far as to repay into our impoverished Treasury the money advanced for furnishing and subsisting troops, under the command and control of the United States.

Perhaps some honorable member who lives in a part of our country where the misery and disaster of the last four years have not penetrated will conclude that we can do without this $4,000,000 for a while longer. If there is such a gentleman in this body I beseech his attention while I state a few facts concerning our material interests alone; for the history of our sufferings, the bravery of our troops, and the earnest tone of loyalty in Missouri are, I trust, impressed upon the nation. We have lost four years of business, and most of this period in three fourths of our State there was no safety, peace, or happiness. We have had some forty counties so thoroughly desolated that I doubt to-day whether there are ten thousand Union men residing in them all. This ruin did not cost the people of Missouri less than $30,000,000 to the 1st of January, 1864, and in a single month last fall, while Price was making his grand raid through the southern and central portions of the State, an additional loss was incurred estimated at $13,000,000. This seems incredible, but is nevertheless a sound estimate. We have emancipated all the slaves in the State—loyalty demands nothing for its portion, and rebels of course are entitled to nothing. In my own county, as I stated the other day, and am proud to repeat on this occasion, much as we have suffered we did not hesitate to tax ourselves $400,000 for bounties to regiments now serving in Tennessee, and in three months afterward advanced our credit for $700,000 more to repair the damages inflicted by Sterling Price on the Pacific railroad, and to extend that iron highway to Kansas; and this great work, running through the very heart and center of Missouri and throwing protection far into the vast Territories to the west of us, will soon be completed by the enlightened liberality of a people who could only indulge it by practicing severe self-denial.

But language, Mr. Speaker, fails to convey any correct idea of how our noble people have suffered, and how bravely they stand up against all the misfortunes heaped upon us. Our State debt to-day, by official statements, amounts to $32,907,549, of which there is due for moneys advanced the Government the following sums:

Amount borrowed by Governor Gamble.....	$150,000
Defense warrants.....	244,279
Union military bonds.....	1,771,036

Amount.....	2,165,309
While there is yet due our soldiers at least.....	1,000,000

Say in all due to-day.....	$3,165,309
----------------------------	-------------

We are, therefore, in pressing need of this sum, and let me say in conclusion that the legislation which enables Missouri to advance to her destiny with sure and rapid strides will be repaid a thousand fold. This civil war has enlarged the mind of the nation, and few so dull as not to see that she is the key to an empire whose lands hold the treasure which is to restore the national credit, redeem the national currency, and over whose vast territory the wealth and travel of the eastern and western continents will in a few years commence a flow which will endure through all coming time. The Legislature of the State in Jefferson City, and the constitutional convention now assembled in St. Louis, have both memorialized Congress, in most earnest terms, to pay the amount now due and which is so necessary to furnish the means of public defense.

I pray you, therefore, to remember that whatever other States are claiming they have not adjusted their accounts as we have, are enjoying prosperity instead of the miserable uncertainty which hangs a dark cloud on every hope and interest we have, and that the relief so eminently due our people, if withheld, may intensify the fears that are now causing thousands to look to other portions of our country where greater safety and protection are afforded to life and property.

My friend from Kentucky has my thanks for the time I have occupied. I could not make my remarks shorter.

Mr. MALLORY. I have promised to yield the floor for a few minutes to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. HALL,] and I now do so.

Mr. HALL. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] is entitled to a specific answer. The House should be satisfied that there is no effort to pay money over again by this bill, or to pay money which is not justly due. I will answer very briefly, specifically, and distinctly the questions which he has asked. The amount appropriated last winter—$800,000, I believe—was to pay for this class of troops. When the President of the United States first called for volunteers we had in Missouri a Governor, C. F. Jackson, who was acting at the time in concert with the rebel government. He refused to supply any troops at the call of the Federal Government. General Lyon was in a strait. Patriotic citizens volunteered their services, and under the name of the home guards, aided General Lyon with troops that were not militia, because the Governor of the State, being himself a traitor, would not supply troops. They were not Federal troops. They were a class of troops unknown to the law, but they rendered valuable services. The $800,000 that was appropriated last winter was to pay these home guards that were called out before the convention of Missouri deposed the traitor Jackson. So much for that.

The Missouri State militia of which the gentleman speaks—ten regiments—were simply volanteers in the United States service. But inasmuch as the State of Missouri herself was the seat of war, it was hard to require men to volunteer to go out of the State. Congress authorized the raising of ten thousand men for service exclusively in the State, and to be paid by the Federal Government. They were United States volunteers doing service in the State; but unlike United States volunteers they were called Missouri State militia. They were under the control of the Federal Government, were paid by the Federal Government, were commanded by Federal officers, and were just as much United States volunteers as any soldiers raised during this war. That is the second class of cases that the gentleman has inquired about, and this class has nothing to do with the class to which this bill relates.

The class to which the bill relates is this. In 1862 the Federal Government had withdrawn most of its forces from the State of Missouri. There was an invasion of the State from Arkansas, and the rebellion also broke out in the State. General Schofield, who was then in command in the State, applied to the Governor to call out the militia. The Governor did so, and placed those troops under the command of General Schofield. They continued under his command, and aided mainly and effectively in repelling the invasion of the State and in putting down the rebel bands in the State. After they had performed that service, General Schofield was called upon to send every man he could spare to Vicksburg. The Governor of the State asked that the militia should be relieved from service, but General Schofield, having sent away the United States troops to Vicksburg, insisted upon keeping the militia in the field. Some of that militia have served two years, and are still in the service, although called out in 1862. They have remained in service at the earnest solicitation of the generals in command—Generals Curtis, Schofield, and Rosecrans—each asking that they be retained. This bill is to authorize the payment of those troops, or of as many of them as may be shown to have been in the service at the request and solicitation and under the orders of the commander of the department. The bill has nothing to do with the other class of militia to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. MALLORY. I must now insist upon the previous question. I have only this to say in reference to the bill, that wherever payments have been made, either in Missouri or Kentucky, it is directed that no allowance shall be made by this bill. It is only where troops have served and have not been paid by the Federal Government that the commission is to allow payment to be made.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask the gentleman a single question.

Mr. MALLORY. I will hear it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield me the floor to move that the bill be referred back to the Committee of Ways and Means with instructions to add a provision to pay Pennsylvania and Indiana troops?

Mr. MALLORY. I cannot yield for that purpose. I must insist on the previous question.

The question being on seconding the previous question, the House divided, and there were—ayes 35, noes 80.

So the House refused to second the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the following amendment as an additional section, to be added to the amendment reported by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] from the Committee of Ways and Means:

That, to reimburse the State of Pennsylvania for expenses paid in calling out the militia of said State during the recent invasion by rebel forces, the sum of $750,000, or so much thereof as may be found necessary, the same having been audited by the proper Department, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. DAWES. I raise a point of order that this amendment has not been considered in Committee of the Whole, nor have the rules been suspended to allow its consideration in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order. This is an amendment proposing to make an appropriation, and the rules not having been suspended, it must first be considered in Committee of the Whole. The rules were suspended only so far as was necessary to allow the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MALLORY] to report an amendment from the Committee of Ways and Means. The amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is not in order.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move to lay this bill and amendment on the table.

Mr. GRIDER. I call for the yeas and nays.

Upon the question of ordering the yeas and nays, the House divided; and there were—ayes 20, noes 93.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay the bill and amendment on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill and amendment were laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. COBB, one of its clerks, announced to the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866.

The message further informed the House that the Senate further insist upon their disagreement to the first, third, fourth, and fifth amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 390) relating to the postal law, and agree to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and have appointed Mr. COLLAMER, Mr. STEWART, and Mr. POMEROY the committee on the part of the Senate.

The message further informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 479) to incorporate a national military and naval asylum for the relief of the totally disabled officers and men of the volunteer forces of the United States; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. KASSON, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, submitted a report.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1866, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the first, second, fifth, twenty-seventh, thirty-fifth, forty-fifth, and forty-eighth amendments of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from their amendments to the bill of the House numbered thirteen, fourteen, fifteen, twenty-eight, and twenty-nine.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the House to their third amendment, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of said amendment of the House, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Provided, however, That any Senator who has already, as a member of the House of Representatives, received a portion of a set of the Congressional Globe, shall only be entitled to receive, as such Senator, the additional volumes required to complete one full set."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the ninth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: add at the end of said amendment the words "so much thereof to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior as may be necessary for the erection of said addition."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the tenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out the word "ninety" and insert in lieu thereof the words "seventy-five."

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendments of the House to their twelfth and twenty-fourth amendments, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with the following amendment: insert in lieu of the words stricken out the words "for legal assistance, and other necessary, and special, and extraordinary expenses in the disposal of private land claims in California, $10,000."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the forty-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: strike out of said amendment all after the word "appropriated," in the eighth line, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and for the purpose of furnishing and fitting up suitable rooms for the office of the Attorney General, if it shall be necessary for him to remove from the Treasury Department, the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary."

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to so much of the amendments of the House to their forty-sixth amendment as is contained in the last two sections of said amendment of the House, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the forty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: add to the end of said amendment the following: "and the sum of $43,000 is hereby appropriated to be added to the contingent fund of the House of Representatives, for the purpose of paying such contingent expenses as may be directed by resolution of the House."

DANIEL CLARK,

IRA HARRIS,

J. W. NESMITH,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN A. KASSON,

R. MALLORY,

H. WINTER DAVIS,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. KASSON. I do not know that it is necessary for me to recite item by item the action of the committee of conference, although I am ready to do so, if it is desired by the House.

Mr. BROOKS. We want to hear it.

Mr. KASSON. Very well. The first amendment of the Senate in which the House did not concur was the clause relating to the reporting of the Congressional Globe on the Senate side, for which the original appropriation was $10,000, and which had been increased by amendment of the Senate to $20,000. It was found that in consequence of an error in the estimate of the clerks of the Senate, $10,000 had been put in the estimates instead of $20,000, for the long session. It was found to be accurate, and was therefore yielded by the committee of the House.

The second item was in relation to paying the publishers of the Globe one cent additional for ever five pages, &c., which is an appropriation required by the existing law. It was made on the Senate side just as it has been made on the House side.

The third item related to providing a complete set of the Congressional Globe to each Senator. The House had amended that, so as to provide that no Senator should receive a set of these books who had received them as a member of the House. The committee of conference recommend in place of that provision one which will allow a Senator to receive enough volumes of the Congressional Globe to make, with those volumes he has previously received as a member of this House, a full set of the Congressional Globe. That was deemed right by the committee of conference.

The next item related to the appropriation of $100 for the removal of the railing in the old Hall of the House of Representatives. It was found necessary to keep that railing up until some other fence was provided, for the preservation of the columns and other valuables in the old Hall of the House. Therefore the committee of the House receded from that amendment, preferring to allow that fence-railing to remain there during the vacation.

The next amendment related to the printing establishment, the appropriation for the additional building and Adams printing presses, of which the estimate was for eight. The Committee on Printing of the Senate, and a part at least of the House committee, had urged the matter as a question of economy upon both Houses. More careful estimates, and a reexamination of the Superintendent of Public Printing, satisfied the committee of conference that it was a measure required for an economical and reliable administration of the public printing, and actually necessary for satisfying the demand upon that office for some time to come.

It was found, for example, that the Agricultural Report could not be issued, except with great delay, without some additional facilities. It is desirable that we should be enabled in future to distribute this and other documents during the session. In that amendment, therefore, the committee concurred, with an amendment.

The next amendment related to the cost of lithographing and engraving. Both committees receded from the former amendment; and we took the basis of the actual expenditure during the last session of Congress, which was $75,000, and added that amount to the other appropriations for the next year.

In reference to the extension of the Library the Senate concurred in the amendment of the House.

The next amendment related to the publication of the laws of the United States in pamphlet form. This appropriation was made to defray the expense of printing the laws by Little & Brown, now going on, and was necessary to provide for the next fiscal year the payment for the publication by them of the laws of this session. The Senate, therefore, receded upon that point. The Senate had reduced the appropriation in consequence of striking out the appropriation for the publication of this pamphlet edition of the laws by Little & Brown, and the conference restored it. I ought to remark that this firm are now publishing the laws at a less cost than that at which the Public Printer can possibly do it, by reason of a contract made prior to the rise in the price of paper. The conference resulted in the restoration of the action of the House on that subject.

The next amendment related to the appropriation for the House for judiciary expenses. In this the Senate concurred.

The next amendment related to the expenses in the disposition of land-claims in California. On this both Houses receded, and they appropriated for the use of the office of the Attorney General $10,000, in lieu of $20,000, as proposed in the original bill, to be disbursed by him in the administration of the interests of the Government in California in connection with contested land-claims there.

The next point of difference related to the salary of the circuit judge of the Pacific circuit, and upon the showing made to the committee of conference they agreed with the proposition of the Senate to allow the amount of $1,000 additional for his expenses in traveling over his largely increased district and also coming to Washington—a difference, by the way, that was recognized in the original law.

The next point in reference to which a difference occurred related to the repairing of the courthouse at St. Augustine, Florida. The House refused that appropriation, and the Senate receded from their action.

The next question related to the treasurer's office at Boston. On that also the Senate receded and concurred in the action of the House.

The next related to the note-printing presses of the Treasury Department. It was found that the present Secretary of the Treasury had himself prepared and submitted to the Senate the amendment which was adopted by that body and in which this House did not concur. It was found, however, that the proposition was so guarded in respect to expenditure, providing for paying simply for what the Government has taken and is using, payment to be made only when the title to the presses and their use was conferred fully upon the United States, that the conference committee concurred in the action of the Senate, as a matter of simple justice.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. In order that this matter may be clearly understood, I hope the gentleman will have read the different propositions—the House proposition and the Senate proposition.

Mr. KASSON. The Clerk will read them if it is desired.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Strike out the following:

Provided, That no further expenditures shall be made for the experimental system of hydrostatic printing by the Treasury Department until such experiments shall have been definitely authorized by law, and a distinct appropriation made therefor.

And insert these words:

Provided, That the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to examine and adjust the accounts of Stewart Gwynne for printing presses, machinery, material, and labor furnished and supplied to the Treasury Department, and for expenditures under the authority of the Secretary, and to award to him such sum as may be equitably his due, to be paid from the appropriation for the expenses of national loans: Provided further, That for items furnished or supplied under contract, no greater sum than the contract price shall be allowed: And provided further, That before any payment shall be made, the said Stewart Gwynne shall, in such form as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, fully convey and secure to the United States the right to use said presses and any additional number thereof, with their machinery and future improvements, in the Treasury building or any other buildings directed by the Secretary, for any and all printing the Government may desire for its own use and purposes.

Mr. KASSON. I will state that my colleague on the committee of conference, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] has examined personally this matter and thoroughly, and I ask him to explain it more fully.

Mr. WILSON. I ask my colleague whether the committee, in determining this report in reference to printing took into consideration that in the loan bill one per cent. was appropriated for printing purposes?

Mr. KASSON. That is for another item of printing, the printing of bonds, &c. I yield now to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I will endeavor to make this matter plain in a very few words. Mr. Gwynne was an employe, not exactly an office-holder, but an employe of the Treasury Department, for the purpose of executing under the authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury to print certain portions of the money authorized by the Government of the United States. He proposed to Secretary Chase a particular system of printing the money. That form was adopted by Secretary Chase. Mr. Gwynne was authorized to contract for requisite machinery to print the money, that which day by day we use, and which passes from hand to hand. Whether wisely or unwisely, it was done under the order of the Secretary of the Treasury in execution of a law of Congress, and was as legal as any other form of executing that law. All that the bill now proposes is that the expenses incurred for the machinery which was contracted for in Mr. Gwynne's name by the authority and with the assent of the Secretary of the Treasury, which has been accepted by the Secretary of the Treasury, which is to-day in operation in the Treasury Department, which is to-day printing the money which is being printed under the act of Congress, shall be paid. The amendment proposes, and all what the committee of conference has agreed to is, that the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended should be paid as having been contracted under his order, and it shall have the sanction of the House.

My friend from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] will be familiar with the subject, because he was a member of the investigating committee by which this was one of the subjects considered, and whether wise or unwise he will remember that every attempt to show there was no legality in the transaction entirely failed. Everything done is now sanctioned by the former letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which is among the papers. I think no other explanation is now needed.

Mr. KASSON. I pass to the next point, in relation to providing accommodations for the Attorney General's office and for officers and employes of the State Department, if necessary, arising from the extension of the Treasury building over the site of the State Department, which it is anticipated will take place during the next year. In lieu of the arrangement proposed by the Senate, which seemed to compel the Attorney General to go to the Interior Department, where he did not wish to go, and where they do not want him, we have substituted a small appropriation for fitting up and furnishing, if necessary, an office for the Attorney General when it shall be required.

The next amendment related to the equalization of the salaries of the Assistant Secretaries. The majority of the conference committee thought that it was just, and concurred in the Senate amendment.

The next amendment related to the deficiency bill, in which the House had non-concurred pro forma, but the items of which had received its approval.

The last point was one on which a serious difference had existed between the two Houses. In lieu of the resolution proposed by the House and rejected by the Senate, the conference committee finally agreed to the resolution which was read at the conclusion of the report, providing for an addition to the contingent fund of the House, to be disposed of in payment of contingent expenses as may be directed by resolution of the House. This is all I have to say. The bill is a very long one; a great deal of difficulty attended the settlement of its provisions; and as the time for engrossing it is very short I am compelled to ask the attention of the House to it as early as possible. I therefore feel constrained to demand the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope it will not be seconded. I want to discuss this printing matter a little.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. KASSON. I yield to answer any question which gentlemen may wish to propose.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask the gentleman whether this question of hydraulic presses is not the same that was discussed by this House, and voted down three to one, some time ago?

Mr. KASSON. Not upon the same facts. The facts now ascertained by gentlemen who have been appointed committees by the Senate, and those who have been on committees from the House, show that this experiment has approved itself, and that the Treasury Department cannot dispense with it. It is now the simple question of the payment of an honest debt.

Mr. BROOKS. I have to say in reply that there is not a practical printer in the country who would attempt to use these presses for any such purpose. And if they work well it is only when a Senator or a member of Congress comes in to see them, and break down in ten or fifteen minutes afterward. I have also to say that this is an attempt to ingraft a private bill on a general appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. I was aware that the gentleman from New York had committed himself by a former report touching that part of the Treasury Department, and I do not expect to be able to convert him upon the testimony of any sub-committees, or committees of both Houses. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BROOKS. I call for tellers.

Tellers were refused.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 53, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Ashley, Baxter, Blaine, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, Freeman, Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Deming, Dixon, Briggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Frank, Garfield, Goach, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Knox, Law, Littlejohn, Loan, Longyear, Mallory, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Patterson, Perham, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Shannon, Smithers, Stevens, Stuart, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Ward, William B. Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, Worthington, and Yeaman—87.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Beaman, Brooks, Chandler, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Dawes, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, English, Finck, Ganson, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Philip Johnson, Kalfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Le Blond, Long, Marcy, Middleton, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, Orth, Pendleton, Perry, Pike, Radford, Rogers, Ross, Scott, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Sweat, Thomas, Townsend, Elihu B. Washburne, Chilton A. White, and Wilson—53.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Anderson, Baily, Blair, Brandegee, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Cravens, Creswell, Donnelly, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hotchkiss, Hubbard, Hutchins, William Johnson, Julian, Lazer, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, John O'Neill, Prayn, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Van Valkenburg, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—42.

So the report was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON moved that the vote by which the report was agreed to be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, from the committee of conference on the Army appropriation bill, reported that the committee on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, having met, after full and free conference, had agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses that the Senate recede from their fourth amendment; that the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the second and third amendments of the Senate; that the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same; that the House recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments, as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the words "any railroads" and insert in lieu the words "the Illinois Central railroad;" and strike out all of said amendment after the word "States" line five, and that the Senate agree to the same as so modified.

The report was signed by Messrs. COWAN and WILSON, managers on the part of the Senate, and by Messrs. STEVENS and WASHBURN, of Illinois, managers on the part of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. The only matter in which the House feels any interest, connected with this report, is that which relates to payments to railroads to which land grants have been made upon condition of their carrying the troops and munitions of war of the United States free of toll. Now, sir, the House inserted a general provision against all railroads. We find that only one single one of the roads is paying sufficiently to require that provision, and that is the Illinois Central railroad. We have therefore amended the provision so as to confine it to the Illinois Central railroad.

I move that the report be adopted, and demand the previous question.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. As I was a member of this committee of conference, and as I could not concur with the committee, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me for a few moments while I explain the reasons why I refused to concur.

Mr. STEVENS. For that purpose I will yield, certainly.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I was not able to agree with the majority of the committee of conference in this report, and I ask the attention of the House while I briefly state the reasons for that disagreement.

The House will recollect that some time since when this bill was pending in the Committee of the Whole we had some controversy as to the proviso added to the bill which prohibited the payment of any portion of the money appropriated by the bill to any of the land-grant railroads. It struck me then that the provision was wrong and ought not to be ingrafted on the bill. Reflection since that controversy has only confirmed me in the correctness of the views that I then entertained. I feel certain, whatever may be the law of the question, that nobody anticipated when these grants were made the condition of things that now exists in our country, or no company would have accepted a grant of this kind and undertaken to build the road year after year when the Government of the United States was to take possession of it and compel the company to furnish the rolling stock and operate the road.

Mr. Speaker, it is not the first time in the history of legislation that men have been mistaken as to the construction of a law, and those gentlemen who seem so confident that they are correct in their construction of these grants may possibly be mistaken. Very eminent jurists have differed in opinion concerning it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania seems to think that no man can doubt but what the true construction of these acts is that the railroad companies are bound to do all the business of the Government, and furnish the rolling stock and the men to operate the road just so long as the Government of the United States may desire it for the transportation of troops and munitions of war. But while that is his opinion, other eminent lawyers in the country have taken a different view. The Secretary of War, when this question was first presented to his Department, took a different view of it, and I have been informed, I do not know whether truly or not, that the then Attorney General of the United States took a different view of it. I know that the question was at any rate waived by the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States, and that the Illinois Central Railroad Company entered into a contract with the Government to carry their troops and munitions of war. And, sir, in a debate which occurred in the Senate the other day that contract was presented, and is to be found in the Daily Globe of February 22. By the terms of that contract the Illinois Central Railroad Company agreed with the Government that they would carry troops and munitions of war at a reduction of thirty-three and a half per cent. upon their ordinary charges. Since that time they have been doing the business of the Government, as their contract required them to do, at the reduced price. This House, however, ingrafted a provision on the bill which prohibits the payment of any portion of the money appropriated by this bill to any land-grant railroad company, and they did it under a clause which has found its way into all these grants, and which reads as follows:

"The same shall be and remain a public highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from toll or other charge for the transportation of any property or troops of the United States."

I may be permitted to say that this is a transcript, as far as it goes, from certain grants to turnpike roads and canals. Now, I presume that no one will contend that where the Government has granted lands in this manner to a canal, it was ever contemplated that those to whom the grant was made should find the boats and men to man them.

But it is said that a railroad grant is different, that a railroad comprises not only the road-bed, but also the rolling stock of the company and the men to operate it, and that therefore the railroad is not complete until it is furnished with cars, rolling stock, and men to work it. I repeat that there may be yet some doubt on that question. It is said that the road would be useless to the Government without the rolling stock and without the men to work it. No such thing, sir. The road-bed itself, with the rails, is of vast importance to the Government. The Government has the right to take and use the railroad for the transportation of troops and munitions of war under the provisions of the charter; and this it may do without any material interference with the regular business of the road. It is sometimes said that it is impossible for the Government to run cars on the road for the transportation of troops and munitions of war without constant danger of collision. There is no such danger. If the Government see fit to put cars on the road and run them, it can do so by regulating the time-table with the company. There need be no conflict.

But, again, Mr. Speaker, it is said that the rolling stock and the force to operate it must be placed under the control of the Government, and that the company is not entitled to receive anything for transporting troops or munitions of war. If that construction of the law be correct I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what there is to prevent this company from withdrawing from its road all the rolling stock, and where would be the remedy of the Government? The company has the right to do it. It is its own property, and it can do with it as it sees fit. Unless there were something in the charter positively requiring the company to furnish the rolling stock and to man it, it does seem to me that it is a forced construction of the law to say that the company is required to furnish all this.

But it may be said that the Government derives no benefit from the road if the rolling stock is not furnished to it. Let us see. This is a great thoroughfare, a great highway between the lakes and the mouth of the Ohio, on which the Government may transport its troops and munitions of war much cheaper and easier than if there was no road there. It would be of vast benefit to the Government if the Government should see fit to take it and operate it at its own charge.

Mr. Speaker, the Government has received compensation fourfold the value of the lands granted to the Illinois Central railroad. This was a grant of about two and a half million acres of land to the State of Illinois. The land was at the time in a wild state—most of it prairie land. There was no settlement on it, and nothing to induce settlement on it. It was then, and had been for years and years, in the market at $1 25 per acre. The Government granted each alternate section within a given space to the State of Illinois, requiring at the same time that the reserved sections should not be sold at less than $2 50 per acre. The State granted these lands to the Illinois Central Railroad Company which undertook to construct the work. The lands have become very valuable, but their increased value has been in consequence of the opening of the railroad, which afforded facilities for reaching the market. The consequence is that the land which was then a desert is now blossoming like a garden. It also enabled the Government to dispose of the reserved sections of land not at $1 25 an acre but at $2 50 an acre. Many sections brought more than that; for the land was offered at public auction, and in the land district in which I reside I know tract after tract that sold for from five to seven dollars an acre, and this within three years after the grant was made; so that this Government has received its equivalent for the grant in the rapid sale of the reserved sections at enhanced prices. The Government has been receiving from the time that road went into operation consideration for the grant in the transportation of troops and munitions of war. Since the breaking out of the rebellion the Government has saved by the contract with the Illinois Central over half a million dollars; so that it is constantly receiving, every time it transfers men, munitions of war, or provender for its artillery or cavalry horses, a consideration for this grant in the reduction that is made in the ordinary charges, in the contract made with the company.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown that the Government has received consideration for that grant. Then I ask, upon what principle of equity can you adopt this report of the conference committee? If the construction is correct which is placed upon this railroad grant by the Government, by my colleague on the conference committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] then I ask, why make a distinction between the Illinois Central Railroad Company and other railroads which received similar grants? Why not include them all? Is it because it is determined to adhere to the law? Is it because it is so "nominated in the bond?" If that be the reason, then I ask again, why make a distinction between the Illinois Central Company and other roads which have received land grants from the General Government? It is an unjust distinction between these roads, and cannot be defended upon the ground upon which it is placed by the committee.

It is said they make this distinction because the Illinois Central Railroad Company is able to bear it. Now, why is it able to bear it? Simply because by their energy and by the expenditure of their capital they have made that road valuable, and have opened up what was a wilderness to a dense population. And they are transferring along their line daily millions of tons of produce raised in a region of country which, without their skill, energy, and capital, would have still been a desert. I repeat that if they are sticking upon the legal question they ought to apply it to all the railroads.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask my colleague on the conference committee [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] if he has not already occupied a full share of my time?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I feel under a thousand obligations to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] But this is a question in which I feel a deep interest as a citizen of the State of Illinois. While I regret that I trespass upon the time of the gentleman and upon the time of the House, it does seem to me that this company is entitled to be heard here, and not thus be singled out as a mark for those who desire to break down one of the most important interests in the Northwest; certainly the most important in my State.

Mr. STEVENS. I must take the floor again. I will yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Illinois on my left, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will not argue the legal question which has been presented here by my colleague, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN.] I will not, in justice to the House, do so, because not only has this Congress passed upon it unanimously by its Judiciary Committee, but the last Congress passed upon this question upon the able and conclusive report of its Judiciary Committee. They decided that those railroad companies built by grants of land were bound to carry the property and troops of the United States free of all toll and other charge. So far as that is concerned, that is the law of this House, and I will not now argue that question.

I will speak for a moment upon the point raised by the report of the committee of conference, without arguing the legal question. The original proposition offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] was that in the cases of all roads to which a grant of land had been made there should be no more money paid to them for the transportation of the troops and property of the United States. It was that proposition, in that broad sense, which was objected to by the Senate, upon this ground: that while such might be the law, yet it would operate harshly upon, not the Illinois Central Railroad Company—that bloated, and pampered, and merciless monopoly, and one of the most stupendous franchises the world has ever known—but it would operate harshly and unjustly upon the railroads in other States, the new roads, as it were, which are not fairly under way. They therefore struck out the whole provision. The question then came before the committee of conference for them to settle. In that state of the case that committee determined that they would make the provision apply only to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and let the War Department go on and pay all those other roads for transportation, if it should see fit. The proposition of the conference committee does not propose to interfere with them. But they do propose that no more shall be paid to the Illinois Central Railroad Company.

They propose that for these reasons: that company has already been paid out of the money of the people, and without warrant of law, the sum of $552,000, although this House has unanimously passed two resolutions directing the Secretary of War not to pay that company another cent, and to take measures to collect back the money already paid. And why should they be paid? And why should we not pay them any more? The reasons which apply to the other roads do not apply to the Illinois Central railroad. I can prove to this House that the Illinois Central Railroad Company is vastly better off to-day than it would have been if there had been no war, even had they carried these freights, these troops, and property of the United States free, as they were bound by the law to do. I have been fortunate enough to get hold of a report this company made of its business for 1863. And let me heresay I do not know why my colleague [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] should feel such a particular interest in this road. It is not owned by the people of Illinois, or by any part of the people of Illinois. It is not controlled by those living in Illinois. Among the list of directors published on the back of this report of the road there are only two or three names of persons who live in that State. The president of the road lives in the city of New York. It is a road that is owned, I believe, by British bondholders. And my colleague and myself have no particular interest in the people who own and control that monopoly so far as guarding the interests of our constituents is concerned.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Will my colleague yield to me one moment, simply that I may reply to that last point?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did not interrupt my colleague in his remarks, and do not want to be interrupted myself.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. It is true, I believe, that most of this stock is owned in Europe. We had to go there to get men to build that road.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to call attention to some facts in regard to this road which my colleague cannot gainsay. I was fortunate enough to get, by a sort of "flank movement," one of the reports of the company, and I could get only one. When the president of the road was here a short time ago, lobbying and button-holing members in order that he might prevent Congress from interfering with a further raid upon the Treasury, I asked him to furnish me with all the reports of the company as necessary to assist members of Congress to judge in order to discharge their duties in this regard. He has neglected to do so, and I have not been able to get those documents. But I will show by the report that I have what has been the business of the road for one year, at least, since the war commenced. This report shows what has been the business of the road in 1863, as compared with the year 1862.

In 1862, while this war was going on, the amount of receipts for passengers was, in round numbers, $900,000. In the year 1863 the receipts of this road for passengers were more than fifteen hundred thousand dollars, and that, too, was independent of what the Government paid to the company. Hence I say that this road has increased its business immensely in consequence of the war by the increase of business which the war has brought. The statement in regard to the freight business exhibits very nearly the same proportion—an increase of thirty-three per cent.

I asked the president of the road to let me see the report for the year 1864. I wanted it that I might show Congress what equitable claim this company have upon Congress to take this additional amount of money out of the Treasury. He put me off with the statement that the report had not been published; but I have seen in the newspapers a statement, which I have no doubt is correct, showing the amount of the earnings of that road for the year 1864, and they are absolutely enormous. According to this statement the earnings of the road from May to October were $3,363,000, making at the rate of nearly seven million dollars for the year!

But, sir, what else is shown by this report? Do gentlemen understand what they are doing when they propose to tax our constituents still further for the benefit of this corporation? Sir, I believe I am the only member of this House who has, I may say, in one respect, the misfortune to live upon the line of this road. Gentlemen around me who reside in States where the rate of fare on railroads is limited by law may not have had the same experience that I have had. There is no limitation of the kind in the charter of the Illinois Central railroad. When I travel on that road, I pay, as do my constituents, as local fare, six cents per mile, and sometimes more than that; and the charge on freight is in proportion.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. If my colleague will yield to me a moment, I desire to state that the rate of travel on the Illinois Central railroad is four cents per mile. My colleague has doubtless taken a ride between local stations, when the charge is higher, as it is on all roads.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I said "the local fare;" and I know what I state to be true, because I have paid the fare myself.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Did the gentleman pay six cents local fare? or did he pay four cents local fare with an addition because he did not buy a ticket at the office?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, sir. Let me tell the gentleman that from Galena to Scalesmound is a distance of twelve miles, and when you go to the office at Galena to buy a ticket you are charged seventy-five cents. How would you like that, living as you do on the line of the New York Central railroad? How would your constituents like it?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. In our State the rate of fare is limited by law to two and a half cents per mile.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And I trust that there will be virtue enough in the New York Legislature to refuse to remove that restriction.

Now let us look further at this report. Let us see what amount of the fertile and beautiful lands of our own prairie State are held by this company, who are putting them up to the people who want to emigrate to Illinois at fifteen and twenty dollars per acre. They say that there are one million two hundred and eighty-two thousand acres remaining of that land; and that during the last year their cash receipts for lands were $6,749,000, contracts, $9,914,000, making $16,663,000 that this company was to have for that one year from their lands alone. This is the poor, suffering, half-starved corporation for which the gentleman pleads. A poor corporation! Let us look at the income of this abused, stinted railroad company.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Will my colleague have the candor to say what the construction of the road has cost, and also what the rolling stock has cost?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I suppose that they cost as much and no more than other roads of the same length have had to pay.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. Will my colleague yield to me to make a statement?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hold the floor at the pleasure of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, then, hurry on. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will hurry on. I will read the result of the income account of this road. Let us see what it is for 1863. There is $453,000 for a balance. The net collection from lands amounted in 1863, principal and interest, to $1,278,000, and the net income from traffic amounts to $2,118,000, making the gross amount of $3,862,000.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I hope that my colleague will yield to make a statement in regard to that. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hold the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he declines to permit me to yield.

I will give a little more information to my colleague, who seems to feel a great interest in this matter, as I certainly do. The president of the road in his report uses language like this, that it is worthy of note that when the interest due on many of the contracts is made up the total results of sales of half the lands will exceed $17,000,000, the value placed upon the entire grant of lands ten years ago. Ten years ago they placed an estimate of $17,000,000 upon the whole of the lands!

A MEMBER. It was a regular oil transaction. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Yes, sir, that company has "struck ile."

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I ask my colleague to yield to me.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot let the gentleman have the floor more than five minutes longer.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to say that that company expended $19,000,000 in laying the road-bed and putting down the rails, and that it has now $12,000,000 of rolling stock in operation. And it has paid into the treasury of Illinois $400,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I have no desire to say anything further on the subject. I think I have brought the attention of the House to the claim that this railroad has to induce us to tax our constituents as they have taxed them over half a million dollars already by the money they have wrung from the Treasury. I make the prediction that if we permit this thing to go on, the amount this company will eventually get will amount to more than a million dollars. Sir, I deny our right to take this amount of the money of our constituents to pay this unjust and unjustifiable and impudent demand of this company. Let us save our money to pay our brave soldiers in the field instead of voting it as a gratuity to a mammoth monopoly that is grinding to the earth every interest of my State along the line of the road.

Mr. STEVENS. I have made up my mind after examination that the present stockholders never paid a dollar for the stock—that is, all they paid has been reimbursed—and they have land now worth $25,000,000 which they will put into their pockets when it is sold. They can carry the Government troops and munitions of war and have a net profit of twenty per cent. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 37, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ames, Ancona, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Boyd, Broomall, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deming, Dixon, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eliot, English, Finch, Frank, Ganson, Garfield, Griswold, Harrington, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Jenckes, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Knox, Loan, Longyear, Marvin, McBride, McClurg, Middleton, Samuel F. Miller, Moorhead, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Worthington—78.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Arnold, Clay, Coffroth, Cox, Thomas T. Davis, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Grinnell, Ingersoll, Philip Johnson, Kernan, Knapp, Le Blond, Littlejohn, Long, Morrill, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Odell, Patterson, Pendleton, Pruyn, James S. Rollins, Ross, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Stuart, Sweet, Townsend, William B. Washburn, and Chilton A. White—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Anderson, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cravens, Creswell, Denison, Donnelly, Gooch, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Charles M. Harris, Hotchkiss, Hutchins, William Johnson, Julian, Kaibfeisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, King, Law, Lazear, Mallory, Marcy, McAllister, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, William H. Miller, Nelson, John O'Neill, Perry, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Sloan, Smith, Spalding, Starr, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Ward, Webster, Wheeler, Joseph W. White, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—67.

So the report was adopted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved that the vote by which the report was adopted be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution and bill of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 176) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance to Paul S. Forbes $250,000 additional out of the sum to be paid him under his contract for building a steam screw sloop-of-war; and

An act (H. R. No. 800) to establish the office of Solicitor and Naval Judge Advocate.

MISCELLANEOUS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the miscellaneous appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PIKE in the chair), and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 786) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and for other purposes; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, to insert the following:

For publishing the annual report of the National Academy of Sciences made to Congress under the act approved March 3, 1863, $6,000.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN and ASHLEY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 80, noes 16.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHLEY. I move to amend by inserting after line three hundred and twenty-eight, the following:

That from and after the passage of this act the chief justice, and the associate justices of the supreme court of the Territory of Colorado shall each receive the same salary now paid to each of the judges of the Territories of New Mexico, Utah, Arizona, Idaho, and Montana.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a point of order. The salaries of these judges are fixed by law at a certain sum. If this appropriation pass the law will be changed. This is not one of the departments of the Government to be carried on.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and rules out the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I move to amend by inserting after line three hundred and thirty-one, the following:

For protecting and continuing the work on the Potomac aqueduct, $100,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

I introduce this amendment because I believe it to be due to the public interests of this city. The Potomac aqueduct, upon which we have expended a large amount of money, has never yet accomplished the purpose for which it was designed, and for which the expenditure already incurred has been laid out. I am told here incidentally that it never will. I do not know whether it ever will or not. It never will unless Congress shall appropriate the necessary funds for the completion of that work.

A MEMBER. How much will it cost?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. It may cost a hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand dollars. But, sir, I am not unmindful of the fact that the people of this metropolis have now no water fit for consumption, except that which comes from the springs in the city, and I fear very much that unless we can supply them with water from the Potomac purer than that which now flows below the High Falls they will be drinking something else more deleterious, and I do not know but members of Congress may get into the habit of doing the same thing.

Now, sir, the object of the Potomac aqueduct was to furnish the city of Washington with pure water from the Potomac, above the High Falls, but the expenditure already incurred has not been sufficient to complete the work for making the conduit from the dam below those falls down to the reservoir of the city.

Mr. HULBURD. What was the last appropriation last year?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. The last appropriation was $150,000, I believe. I believe all but $30,000 and odd have been expended in that work, and that over $30,000 was expended, under the language of the bill, under the interpretation of Senator MORRILL and the interpretation of the Secretary of the Interior, in paying liabilities already then existing, and which were a charge upon that fund by the very letter and words of the bill. That was $150,000; and I understand it has all been expended except $37,000 for that specific purpose, and that some money has been expended for the fees of arbitrators and other expenses incidental to the prosecution of the work, about the policy and justice of which I have nothing to say. I do not know whether there has been any misappropriation of money or not. All that I know is that the Secretary of the Interior is charged with the supervision of the disbursement of this fund. It is his duty to pay it according to law, and if we appropriate the fund and he refuses or neglects to pay it in conformity with law he is responsible to law, and I would hold him to his responsibility.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to ascertain from the gentleman from New York whether, in the present condition of the reservoir, when the gates are opened, the water will run in or out.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. That is a matter with which I have nothing to do. This appropriation is for the purpose of completing the aqueduct to bring the water around the reservoir to the city.

In my own judgment the construction of that reservoir was a magnificent failure. I think it very likely that there have been other failures in connection with this work. But I hold it to be the interest and the policy of the Government not to fail again, but to go on and furnish the metropolis with pure and wholesome water for the consumption of its inhabitants.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. How much money has been expended in the payment of arbitrators?

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Seventeen thousand five hundred dollars have been expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in the payment of arbitrators and expenses of witnesses and other expenses incident to important arbitrations arising under contracts for this work. I have no doubt as to the policy, expediency, and justice of this appropriation. The amount thus expended was expended under the provisions of the law directing the Secretary of the Interior to pay existing liabilities upon the work.

Now, sir, there may have been corruption even, there may have been wrong; but I ask the House if that is any reason why we should not furnish to the citizens of this metropolis this necessary beverage for health and domestic uses? It seems to me that we should be wrong in saying that no more shall be expended, and that a work partially completed shall be suffered to go to decay. And I desire to know why the Committee of Ways and Means, charged with the administration of the finances of the country and knowing the necessity of an appropriation for this work, have not reported to this House some appropriation for the purpose of completing this work.

Mr. PRICE. I oppose the amendment. I have a very distinct recollection that last session they asked for an appropriation of $150,000 to complete this aqueduct. I remember that it was disclosed in the discussion of that matter that the $100,000 expended prior to that time had been expended in making a reservoir, into which the water was to be let from the Potomac; but during its construction some water gathered in it, and when they opened the gates, instead of the Potomac water flowing into the reservoir the water in the reservoir flowed into the Potomac. [Laughter.] We were then asked to appropriate $150,000 for the purpose of correcting the error or mistake which had been made by the engineers who constructed the work. That appropriation was made for the purpose of correcting past errors and giving to the people of this metropolis a beverage conducive to health and happiness.

And now they come and ask $100,000 more to "complete" the reservoir again. I am tired, for one, of completing this aqueduct. It never will be completed. It is always doing and never done, and I for one am opposed to making any such further appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York inquires why the Committee of Ways and Means did not recommend an appropriation for the completion of this reservoir and aqueduct. For one I am ready to answer the question. On a thorough examination of the engineer and of the Department the committee became dissatisfied with the vast expenditure of money for this purpose, and was unwilling to recommend an appropriation of another dollar until the whole matter should be thoroughly investigated. There was no time this session to do that.

Mr. KASSON. I inquire of the Chair whether the five minutes of the gentleman from New York are yet terminated.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I presume not.

Mr. KASSON. I should be glad to use part of his remaining time in answering his question.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I give way.

Mr. KASSON. I want to ask the gentleman from New York, who spoke about the danger of the work already constructed being lost, if he can name any specific danger that exists. I want also to answer the question he put as to the reason why the Committee of Ways and Means did not recommend an appropriation this session. During the last session the Committee of Ways and Means, at somebody's expense, I believe, went up and examined this work all the way to the Great Falls of the Potomac; and we found that the statement of the engineer was tolerably correct; that by the appropriation made last session he could conduct the real water of the Potomac around the reservoir which takes in the wash of the surrounding hills, and could give pure water to the city. They also wanted some clause put in about paying extra liabilities. That unfortunate clause was adopted, not in reference to any arbitration of awards, but to facilitate the actual, necessary, and immediate work.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommend an appropriation in good faith, believing that good faith was used in the representations made, and that pure water would be brought into the city. It is now said that it has not been done, and that it still requires $100,000 to complete it. It seemed to the Committee of Ways and Means that there is so much doubt hanging over the disbursement of the appropriation for this purpose that it could not in good faith to the House recommend an appropriation of an additional $100,000 which might not yet result in the accomplishing the purpose of the work.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether the necessity for pure water for this metropolis is any less now than it was one year ago?

Mr. KASSON. I answer, sir, that I think there is a great deal more necessity for it now.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Very well, then.

Mr. GRINNELL. Whisky is higher. [Laughter.]

Mr. KASSON. There is more necessity for it, as the prices of other ingredients in drink are increased. [Laughter.] But I am not at all certain that we would get it for this $100,000; for we should have to appropriate it on the same basis identically as we made the appropriation last year when we were disappointed.

Mr. DAVIS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, if the parties charged with the construction of the work have failed to perform their duty, it is competent for the House to interfere and to say that the work shall be constructed under another construction and another supervision. All that I insist upon here is that we shall give the people of this metropolis pure water to use; and it is no answer for us to make for refusing to do it that some contractor has failed to do his work, or has squandered the money appropriated for the purpose.

Mr. PRUYN. Mr. Chairman, as the facts of this matter are not fully understood, I should like to make a brief statement to the committee. Last year estimates were laid before Congress showing that it was necessary to appropriate a little over two hundred thousand dollars to complete the work. The House allowed only $150,000. The estimate now is that $72,000 would be required to complete the work, which is only $22,000 in excess of the estimate of last year. That is all there is of this thing, if I understand it.

Mr. PRICE. The title of the law of last year is this: "To provide for the supervision, repair, liabilities, and completion of the Washington aqueduct." If that does not cover all the ground, then I do not understand language.

Mr. PRUYN. That is all very true that the act of Congress used that language. I am now referring to what we were told by the engineer this would cost, and I am comparing the estimate with the amount appropriated, in order to show that the charge of wasteful extravagance or of extravagance of any kind in regard to this matter arises from some misapprehension on the part of the Committee of Ways and Means.

We were told last year that this work would require $200,000. We appropriated $150,000, and it turns out now that the whole excess required over the estimate of last year is $22,000 more. It is thought by some of my associates on the Committee of Ways and Means that part of the appropriation was used to pay legal expenses in connection with the aqueduct. Judge Curtis, late of Boston, and four others, I think, five in all, were appointed arbitrators in regard to certain claims arising in reference to taking the water at High Falls. Those arbitrators were paid from two thousand to twenty-five hundred dollars each, making, with the charges of the counsel, Mr. Bradley, some seventeen thousand dollars, which the Secretary of the Interior thought himself authorized to pay. Those were debts due by the United States, and it is no matter whether the money to pay them was taken out of one appropriation or another; we owed them and they ought to have been paid.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not desire to throw any imputation upon the integrity of the Secretary of the Interior, although I think he committed a great error of judgment in paying these claims. But I would ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. PRUYN] whether he thinks that a stale claim that has been before Congress for years and refused by committees of Congress was one that the Secretary of the Interior ought to have paid under the term of "liabilities" on account of this aqueduct.

Mr. KERNAN. And a claim that was offered for sale over and over again for $3,000.

Mr. PRUYN. I only know this, that the proper officer of the Government asked those men to agree to act as arbitrators in this matter, that the Government was found to be indebted to this amount, and that it was paid out of this appropriation.

Mr. MORRILL. Does the gentleman suppose that a single member of Congress understood by this word "liabilities" that this stale claim would be paid out of that appropriation?

Mr. PRUYN. I do not know about its being a stale claim, for I was not here before. I know that the term "liabilities" is a very broad one, that these arbitrators deemed the claim to be a just one, and that an honorable Senator of the United States construed the term "liabilities" in the appropriation to include this claim. And another thing: if the committee meant to exclude any class of liabilities or claims they should have said so. But they used a broad term which in my judgment covered all these cases.

Here is a great national work, a work of the greatest importance to the interests of the public, to all our public buildings in Washington, to the health of the inhabitants of Washington, and, if you please, to the health of members of Congress; and the sum now asked for the purpose of finishing this work is comparatively but a little more than was estimated for last year. I am told that the water of the Potomac has never yet been brought into this city, excepting, I believe, to a very small extent at the time of a high flood; and I do trust that unless we have made up our minds to abandon this important work, after having already expended so much money upon it, we will vote this small amount for its completion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to recall to the attention of the House the circumstances under which the law approved July 4, 1864, was passed; I think I have a pretty clear recollection of them. I then supposed that the denouement would come in a reasonable time, but I confess I did not expect it would come quite so soon. I have been here in Congress for some years. I have seen immense sums of money appropriated for this work, year after year. At last, I believe, we put in some proviso that no more money should be appropriated for this purpose, and we also rejected some old claims. When this appropriation was proposed at the last session, I was advised of the true state of facts, and was told what would be the result if it was passed; and I resisted it by every parliamentary maneuver of which I was master. Of course I was beaten; there could not be got enough to give us the tellers on ordering the yeas and nays. The bill was passed making an appropriation for this work of $150,000. We were told, over and over again, that that would be enough to complete the work. My honorable friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] I recollect, made this distinct statement, that unless that appropriation was made the soldiers in the hospitals in this city would not have water to drink. And under the appeals which were made, and upon the express understanding and the asseveration that the amount then proposed would complete the work, and that we would not be called upon for another dollar, the bill was passed.

Now these men come in here, after having used a part of that appropriation in the payment of old bogus claims, as I believe them to be—some of them having been before Congress and rejected as unjust—they now come in here and ask that we shall appropriate $100,000 more. I hope it will not be given. I am very glad the Committee of Ways and Means seem to have got to the bottom of this matter, and have refused to recommend this appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say a few words upon this subject, and then I will ask for a vote upon it. Last year, having expended some $3,000,000 upon this work, the committee thought they would stop making appropriations for it. We were taken, at somebody's expense, very politely all along up the work. For my part I could not see where a half a million had been honestly expended. But what did we find? Three miles out there was a dam built across a valley between two hills, where there was a small run, and forty acres of the surrounding country, including barnyards and stables, were drained into that reservoir. From the reservoir down was a conduit. The people here had supposed that they had been drinking the water of the Potomac. I can't say that I liked it; I could not tell what it was like, and I eschewed it pretty much as my friend here [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois] does other liquors, compounds, and mixtures. [Laughter.] We found the water in that reservoir to be about eight feet deep. We inquired a little into the history of it, for no report shows the fact, and found that there had been a tunnel brought from the Potomac at the falls into the upper end of this reservoir, near the "White House," coming out down at the gateway. The fact appeared upon cross examination, and was admitted, that when it was opened into this reservoir to let the water of the Potomac in, it drained the whole reservoir into the Potomac and muddied that stream, and they were obliged to put at the upper end of the reservoir a gate, which was there when we examined the work, to keep the water from running back into the Potomac. We therefore thought it better to stop all these reservoirs. They had made arrangements for the expenditure of $3,000,000 more for reservoirs. We put an end to that plan. We concluded that it was best to construct a conduit which would avoid this reservoir altogether, so that we could get the Potomac water without its passing through this mud-hole. We inquired of the engineers there as to the expense of this arrangement, and they assured us that $150,000 would do it. We included an appropriation for this purpose in a bill which we reported. We were told that there were some bills unpaid, for work, horses, carts, &c., and we were asked to put the appropriation in such a shape that those charges could be paid. Nobody ever said a word about outstanding claims for fees. We were foolish enough, therefore, to put the appropriation in a form which would allow these charges, small, as we supposed, to be paid. The result is, that instead of applying that appropriation of $150,000 for the work which we contemplated, a large portion has been paid out for purposes for which it was never appropriated.

Mr. MORRILL. Can the gentleman state whether the contract was given to the lowest bidder?

Mr. STEVENS. I am coming to that.

They paid out of that appropriation an old claim of some very respectable lawyers, amounting to seventeen or eighteen thousand dollars, for what? For having examined the damages and awarded immense sums to the riparian owners above and below the Great Falls, entirely ignoring the established principle of American law that in our great rivers the tide-water does not limit the eminent domain of the Government, and that the riparian owners, instead of owning the bed of the river and the water of the river, own only to low-water mark. I had supposed that to be the common law of America; I suppose that no lawyer here will deny that it is. But there was awarded to these people I do not know how much, perhaps a million or two of dollars. The lawyers who some years ago made this award, charged for their services $17,000. No Congress would ever pay this claim; but under the provision which I have mentioned, designed for the payment of a few poor workmen, these lawyers received $17,000.

When the contract was to be given out for the conduit between the White House and the Gate House, bids were put in by parties whom the engineer admitted to be responsible in every sense of the word. When we asked him, "Did you give the contract to the lowest bidder?" he answered, "We gave it upon the lowest bid." That is, instead of giving it to the lowest bidder they took the lowest bid, and gave it at that rate to certain favored contractors.

Sir, I for one shall never vote a dollar for this work until it gets into other hands not less honest than those that now control it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to know who it was that gave out this work in that manner.

Mr. STEVENS. I believe the name of the engineer was Seymour.

I now move that debate be closed on this section.

The motion was agreed to.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. DAVIS, of New York, and it was rejected.

Mr. DUMONT moved to amend by adding the following:

For fencing in, repair and completion of the United States court-house and post office at Indianapolis, Indiana, and paving the sidewalk in front of the same, the sum of $5,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PRICE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration House bill No. 786, making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1866, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

An then, on motion of Mr. ANCONA, (at twenty minutes past eleven o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 2, 1865.

Prayer by Rev. B. B. EMORY, of Washington, District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. GRIMES, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FOSTER presented a petition of Mrs. Mary E. Fitzpatrick, praying for a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of persons engaged in the business of buying and selling, refining, clarifying, and rectifying wines and other liquors in the city of New York, praying that the present tax of fifty cents per gallon levied upon manufactured wines may be removed and a tax of five per cent. upon sales be substituted; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CHANDLER presented resolutions of the Legislature of Michigan in favor of a grant of land for the endowment of a mining school in that State; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. SUMNER, from the select committee on slavery and freedmen, to whom were referred the resolutions of the constitutional convention of West Virginia, in favor of an appropriation to aid that State in emancipating the slaves therein, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of officers of United States volunteers holding positions in the colored organization in Louisiana, praying for the abolition of slavery, and that colored men may be admitted to all the civil and political rights of white men, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred two petitions of citizens of Berrien county, Michigan, praying that one or more of the southern States may be set apart as a home for colored people, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying that colored soldiers may be placed on the same footing in all respects as white soldiers, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of Richard Foster, praying that Congress grant him the means to purchase a cork leg and enable him to attend school six months at the colored college in Oberlin city, Ohio, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred a petition of citizens of the United States, and a petition of citizens of Ohio, praying for an amendment of the Constitution of the United States more fully recognizing the obligations of the Christian religion, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred two memorials of Norman Wiard, praying that the invention and fabrication of ordnance may be opened to public competition, have directed me to ask to be discharged from their further consideration. The Senator from Ohio, the chairman of the committee on the conduct of the war, submitted a very voluminous report on this subject which was before the Committee on Naval Affairs, but which has not yet been printed, and it is therefore desirable that the matter should lie over.

The committee were discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred three petitions of captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders on the active list of the United States Navy, praying for a restoration of the pay allowed to their respective grades prior to the passage of the act "to establish and equalize the grades of line officers of the Navy," approved July 16, 1862, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 605) to increase the pay of midshipmen and others, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the American Medical Association, praying for an increase of the rank and pay of surgeons in the Navy, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York relating to a general tax on the sales of merchandise; to a ship-canal uniting Lakes Erie and Ontario; to the establishment of a line of steamers from San Francisco to Japan and China; and to fast-sailing ships of the Navy, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of R. B. Forbes, praying that the Secretary of the Navy may be authorized to purchase the steamship Meteor, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred a petition of officers of the United States Government employed in the Washington navy-yard, and a petition of acting assistant surgeons attached to the Mississippi squadron, praying for an increase of compensation, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 749) providing for the confinement of juvenile offenders against the laws of the United States in houses of refuge, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. DIXON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of E. M. Dennison, crier of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, praying for an increase of compensation, reported a bill (S. No. 484) regulating the compensation of the crier of the supreme court of the District of Columbia; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 729) to amend the act relating to officers employed in the examination of imported merchandise in the district of New York, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of the president and secretary of the Board of Commissioners of the Soldiers' National Cemetery Association, praying for an appropriation to aid in the erection of a monument to the memory of the soldiers who fell in the battle of Gettysburg, submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 566) for the relief of Francis Patterson, reported it without amendment, and submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 357) for the relief of Olivia W. Cannon, widow of Joseph S. Cannon, late a midshipman in the United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FOSTER. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 790) for the relief of Henrietta O. Gardner, have directed me to report it without amendment, and with a recommendation that the bill do not pass. The petitioner is no doubt meritorious, and her husband was a meritorious officer; but he was in the revenue service, and it is deemed contrary to the policy of the Government to pension those who are engaged in the civil service of the Government, or to pension their widows in case of their death.

REBECCA SCOTT.

Mr. FOSTER. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 436) granting a pension to Rebecca Scott, widow of Major John B. Scott, late of the United States Army, have directed me to report the same back with an amendment, and recommend its passage. The amendment will require to be acted upon by the House. It merely changes the time when the pension is to commence, making it from the time of the application here instead of going back as the House bill does. I think the case a meritorious one. If it passes the Senate now, it may receive the action of the House and become a law; and as the bill consists of but three lines I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow it to be acted upon at the present time.

Mr. COLLAMER. For three or four mornings I have endeavored to call the attention of the Senate to the annual post route bill; and I cannot but say that I feel it to be my duty to insist that a preference shall be given to that bill over any private bill whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) Objection being made, the bill cannot be considered.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of the United States praying for an amendment of the Constitution more fully recognizing the obligations of the Christian religion, have directed me to report it back, and ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

In making this report I desire to state that the committee instructed me to make a report a few days ago in reference to some petitions both for and against this amendment to the Constitution, and I observe that it is reported in the newspapers that the Committee on the Judiciary reported against the recognition of God in the Constitution. The Committee on the Judiciary reported no such thing. The committee simply asked to be discharged from the consideration of the memorials both for and against the amendment of the Constitution as proposed, they being of the opinion that it was unnecessary and injudicious, at this time, at any rate, to make such an amendment. The committee believe that the Constitution of the United States does recognize the existence of a Supreme Being. It requires every officer to take an oath; and what is an oath but a promise corroborated or confirmed by an appeal to the Supreme Being? It also contains a clause providing that Congress shall make no law prohibiting a free exercise of religion, thereby recognizing the right of religion. The committee considered that such an amendment of the Constitution as was prayed for by those memorialists was unnecessary; and it is for that reason the committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of this memorial.

The motion to discharge the committee was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 649) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1866, and additional appropriations for the current fiscal year.

PRIVILEGES OF THE SENATE.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a privileged question, and I will state it by reading a resolution that I propose to submit:

Resolved, That the letter of G. V. Fox, accompanying the answer of the Secretary of the Navy to a resolution of inquiry of the Senate, be not received by the Senate, it being irrelevant to the subject-matter of inquiry.

I will read the first paragraph of that letter, so that the Senate may know what it is:

"Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy:
"Sir: As part of your reply to the resolution of the Senate of February 3, 1865, in response to the allegations of Hon. JOHN P. HALE against me, in advocating said resolution I beg leave to submit the following statement."

And then follows a statement of about seventy pages of autobiography of Mr. Fox, stating how much sea service he has seen, and that it is more than some of the admirals now in command of squadrons, and vindicating the wisdom of his measure for relieving Fort Sumter. I think the Senate ought to take some action upon it, and as it is late in the session I shall be content if the Senate will simply rescind the order to print the document. If I make a speech I have to pay for its publication out of my own pocket, and I do not think it is right for the Senate of the United States to print Mr. Fox's answer to my speech as a public document; and I think it is an abuse of the privileges of the Secretary to send such a paper in here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONNESS. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the resolution cannot be considered to-day.

Mr. HALE. Does a question of privilege go over on a single objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be introduced as a question of privilege; but it cannot be considered on the same day if objection is made.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will consent to allow the order to print the document to be rescinded I shall be content.

Mr. CONNESS. I do not sufficiently understand the question to do that. It appears to me, from the reading of the resolution itself, that it is a very improper resolution, and I am not prepared to vote upon it.

Mr. HALE. I do not want a vote upon it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and it cannot be considered.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLARK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Josiah O. Armes. I think it will take but a moment.

Mr. CONNESS. Will the Senator permit me to say one word upon a matter of privilege before that bill is taken up?

Mr. CLARK. Certainly.

Mr. CONNESS. I rise to a matter of privilege, not concerning myself, but concerning, as I now believe, a faithful public servant. About the 16th or 17th of January, it will be remembered, a bill or resolution was introduced by the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] concerning trade in the rebel States, and there was considerable comment, made by myself among others, touching Treasury agents; and I read an extract from a letter received from an attorney at New York, named Hale, which concerned and involved Colonel Heaton, Treasury agent at Newbern, North Carolina. I hold in my hand a letter from that gentleman from which I desire to read one paragraph, in order that it may go into the Globe.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to inquire what is before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is addressing the Chair on a question of privilege.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to know what question of privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has stated it.

Mr. CONNESS. I submit to the Chair whether it is entitled to consideration. I have stated it, I think, clearly; and I have never heard of such an interference as this before.

Mr. COWAN. I take it that is not a question of privilege. I understood this Senate to refuse to the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. LANE] the very same privilege at the last session that is now claimed by the Senator from California; that is, the privilege of defending some individual not connected with the Senate in any way whatever.

Mr. CONNESS. I am connected with the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from California state the question of privilege?

Mr. CONNESS. The question is this: I now believe that I have misrepresented on this floor (of course innocently) a faithful public servant. I desire to do him justice, so that the report of what I shall say may go into the Globe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from California has a right to make the explanation.

Mr. CONNESS. Now, I hope the Senators who have objected are satisfied. I will read a single paragraph from a letter of Colonel Heaton, an agent of the Treasury Department at Newbern, North Carolina. He says:

"The charges of this attorney of my being in collusion with Mr. Dibble, and being a partner with him in his profits, I brand as infamously and unqualifiedly false. There is no truth in the assertion. I have never been heretofore, and am not now, a sharer of profits with Dibble or any other man, in any manner whatever, directly or indirectly."

That is all that I shall trouble the Senate with. I wish simply to say, in addition, that I believe Colonel Heaton to be a faithful public servant and a high-minded gentleman.

JOSIAH O. ARMES.

Mr. CLARK. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill to which I called attention a moment ago. It is a House bill, and I think it will take but a few moments.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 161) for the relief of Josiah O. Armes, which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Josiah O. Armes the sum of $9,500, in full for damages sustained by him in consequence of the burning of his buildings and the destruction of his property at Anandale, Fairfax county, Virginia, by the United States troops.

Mr. CLARK. I ask the Secretary to read the report of the committee. It is very short and will give a statement of the claim as succinctly as I can do it.

The Secretary read the following report:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred bill H. R. No. 161, entitled "An act for the relief of Josiah O. Armes," with the accompanying petition and documents, respectfully report:

At the breaking out of the present rebellion, Josiah O. Armes, the claimant, was the owner and in possession of a valuable house and out-buildings at Anandale, Fairfax county, Virginia. The house was a valuable one, and all the testimony in the case tends to show it to have been worth twelve or fourteen thousand dollars. It was built of stone, three stories high, with a cupola on top, fourteen feet high, with windows for lighting the stairway beneath. The house was octagonal in form, and about two hundred feet in circumference. There were two verandas extending around it, well latticed, and supported by two tiers of columns. The roof of the house was covered with tin, and the cornice was large and heavy. The house contained thirty rooms, some of which were large, including seven parlors. The building of the house was commenced in 1856 and completed in 1860, and was intended for a female seminary. There were in the house twenty-eight windows, and the rooms were well ventilated. The walls were fourteen inches in thickness, and there were four firmly-built brick chimneys. The foundation was good, and the wood-work painted, outside and in.

The master-builder of the house testifies that, from his knowledge, at the time, it cost the said Armes $10,000. There were attached to it a servants' house, a granary, barns, sheds, and carriage-house.

The last of November or the first of December, 1861, this house and buildings were destroyed by order of Colonel R. J. Beige, of the sixty-eighth regiment New York volunteers.

Mr. Armes had been driven out from the house before its destruction; and the country about it seems to have been a sort of debatable or skirmish ground—sometimes held by Union troops and sometimes by the rebels. Mr. Armes was, and is, a thoroughly loyal citizen. In the commencement of the war he was of service to our troops in giving information of the movement and situation of the rebels; and General Heintzelman, in a letter submitted to the committee, acknowledges the valuable aid he afforded.

At or about the time the property was destroyed by order of Colonel Beige, the buildings seem to have been used by the rebel troops both as an observatory of the movements of the Union troops and as a stronghold from which they fired upon our men as occasion offered. To prevent its being longer so used Colonel Beige ordered it, as a military necessity, to be destroyed. General Heintzelman, in a letter dated January 18, 1862, says he heard of the matter at the time that the buildings were burned by our troops, and it was a military necessity. He also adds, that "the mother" (meaning Mrs. Armes, the wife of the claimant, and mother of a young man then in our Army) "came in one dark night last summer to give us information at the risk of her life."

The committee have not been able to obtain the evidence of Colonel Beige, who ordered the property to be destroyed, for the reason that he has left the service, and his place of residence has not been ascertained. There is, however, the testimony of several persons, officers in and members of his regiment, who say that they heard Colonel Beige give the order for the destruction of the property at the time it was burned.

The House of Representatives have reported a bill for the relief of Mr. Armes, to the amount of $9,500, and the committee are satisfied that the property was of that value, and more; that it was destroyed by the Union troops as a military necessity, under order of their commander; they therefore recommend the passage of the House bill.

Mr. Armes is an aged man; he is utterly impoverished by the destruction of this property; he is patriotic, having had a son in the Union Army, and having exerted himself to aid the Union cause in various ways. His family was driven from their home, and the wife who risked her life to bring information to our troops in the darkness of the night is since dead. The case appeals strongly to our sympathies, but equally and more so to our sense of justice.

Mr. CLARK. As there was considerable noise in the Chamber, and perhaps all Senators did not listen to the reading of this report, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments to state the merits of the claim as it appeared to the committee.

This bill was passed at the last session by the House of Representatives, appropriating to this Mr. Armes $9,500 for the destruction of his house. The Committee on Claims of the Senate examined the claim to some extent at the last session, but were not entirely satisfied as to two points: first, the value of the house; and second, the order for its destruction by the officer in command of our forces. It lay over until this session, when the committee again took up the claim and examined it; and further proof was produced showing that the house was of more value, and by witnesses entirely competent in the judgment of the committee, and so competent and so conclusive as to bring the committee to a unanimous conclusion in regard to it that the house was of more value than stated in that report. The committee, however, did not increase the amount appropriated by the House bill.

As to the other point: from evidence from the War Department, from evidence from General Heintzelman, from evidence of persons who heard the order given—it was a verbal order—the committee had no doubt in coming to the conclusion that the house was destroyed as a military necessity by our troops. It had been used as a look-out, and a sort of stone fortification. It was a stone house, into which the rebels sometimes got, and fired upon our men. It became necessary to destroy it, and it was destroyed.

In regard to this claimant there is no doubt at all of his (I might say) almost undying loyalty; his devoted loyalty to the Government. At the breaking out of the rebellion, and while he maintained himself at this place, he was constantly employed in conveying information to our armies, and his services are recognized in a letter, in his own handwriting, of General Heintzelman. When it became necessary on one occasion that our troops should have some information that was in his possession, his wife left her house at midnight and went and conveyed the information to our troops. She has since died. He has a son in the Union army now before the fortifications at Richmond and Petersburg who has behaved so gallantly that the attention of the War Department has been called to his distinguished services. This man is aged; he is utterly impoverished; his whole property has been burned down by the action of the Government, voluntarily and with clear information as to what they were doing; and it seems nothing more than fair, in the opinion of the committee, that this claim should be paid. I do not desire to take up the time of the Senate; but I think these facts are undisputed, and the merit of the claim is equally so.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Claims in what this claim is different from a thousand other claims that may be presented within ten miles of Washington for property destroyed during the prosecution of this war against the rebels.

Mr. CLARK. It is impossible for me to tell how it differs from claims that I have not examined. I have examined this claim, and upon the merits of this claim alone I desire to base the action of the Senate. There may be other claims equally meritorious. If they are so, when they come before the Senate I shall be ready to give my vote for them. I desire to act upon this claim as a claim by itself. It may involve others, but the fact that it may involve others, if this is just, is no reason why we should not pay it.

Mr. HARLAN. I desire to ask another question: whether Congress has, up to this time, made appropriations to pay damages for property destroyed by the Army within the rebel districts.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator means to inquire as to this war, I do not know that they have; I do not understand that they have; but if he means to inquire as to the past action of the Government, they have repeatedly done it. The books are full of cases of payments for property destroyed within the enemy's lines; I might say within the territory that was occupied by the enemy afterward, and about the same time perhaps; and that is as far as I should go.

Mr. FOSTER. The Government pays for property where the destruction is caused by order of our commanding officer—not where it is destroyed by the ravages of war generally. In that case, people must take the consequences; but if a citizen's property is so situated that it may be made use of by the enemy, and it is destroyed by an order of our commanding officer, the Government should pay for it.

Mr. HARLAN. I think that is probably true as a question of law within the loyal districts; but I am not sure but that the decisions of the Supreme Court on kindred subjects would establish the principle that the property of loyal men destroyed within rebel districts, where it was subject to the control of the rebel authorities, does not involve any liability of the belligerent party who destroys it. My objection is not, however, to the merits of this particular claim. We have up to this time, I think, made no approprition to pay any claim for property destroyed during the continuance of this war within the limits of the rebel districts, and I am not certain that we have paid any claim within the loyal districts. There has doubtless been hundreds of millions of property destroyed within the rebel districts during the last four years. Is it prudent for Congress at this time to set a precedent to commence the payment of this class of claims? Our Army has not been paid for nearly six months last past. If the revenue laws that are now enforced and those that are in contemplation should enable the Government to realize all the funds contemplated by the Committee on Finance, I suppose we shall not receive through the medium of taxation more than one half of the amount necessary to prosecute this war during the coming year. The Secretary of the Treasury will be compelled to go into the market with the credit of the Government for the purpose of raising $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 to defray the expenses of the Government during the coming fiscal year. Is it prudent for Congress, in the face of these facts, to commence the payment of a class of claims that will involve in the end, if this precedent shall be followed, hundreds of millions more? I would prefer to make a donation to this man for his patriotic services rendered to the Army, if he has rendered such services, as I think is probable from the reading of the report, than to say we will pay him $9,000 or $1,000 or $1 as remuneration for property destroyed.

I move that this bill, and all prior orders, be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. CLARK. I hope the bill will not be postponed. I hope Senators will bear in mind that this bill has been passed by the House of Representatives, and if it goes over now it will hardly be acted upon at the present session. I beg Senators to bear in mind also how I am engaged with the Committee on Finance and the business of the Senate. For the past week, I may say, I have been obliged to sit upon the Committee on Finance in the hours of the session of the Senate, by their permission; and I feel, as there are appropriation bills yet to be brought before the Senate, that this is the only opportunity that will be allowed me to take charge of this bill. I shall feel if it is postponed now that it goes by for the session; and I ask the yeas and nays on that motion, that we may determine the fate of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COWAN. I hope that this bill will be postponed. I do not look upon it as a question of law or as a question as to the custom of the Government heretofore in paying this class of claims. I think it has always been done. But we are told now that $1,000,000,000 of claims of this character are looking us in the face; and it then becomes a question of policy whether we had not better, for the purpose of preserving that which we have, to refuse payment of these claims at the present time, and not jeopard the whole by attempting to do justice to a part. This is the entering wedge; and if we pay for the destruction of this property, we cannot refuse to pay other claims equally meritorious. There have been no payments made I think, as yet, even for the destruction of property within the loyal States under military orders.

Mr. CLARK. I will say in answer to that that this claimant, Mr. Ames, is a very aged man; and since this house has been destroyed he has been without a home and been obliged to subsist upon the charity of his friends. If you postpone his case in order that you may act upon others, he perhaps will die from starvation or neglect. He appeals strongly to the charity—no, sir, not to the charity, but to the justice of the Senate, that a man who has been made houseless in the service of the country shall not be turned out and delayed that we may act upon a thousand others beside.

Mr. BROWN. I will inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Claims whether he did not a few days ago bring to the attention of the Senate claims which were presumed to be meritorious for damages sustained by loyal citizens in loyal States, and ask the decision of the Senate as to whether it was advisable to take up such cases and pass upon such claims at this time, and whether the decision of the Senate was not adverse to that consideration?

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will allow me, I will state to him exactly how that was; and instead of being adverse, the decision of the Senate was in favor of it. I brought before the Senate the case of Cobb & Company, of Indiana; and for the purpose of ascertaining what was the opinion of the Senate on that question, we divided the claim into two parts: that part of the claim which embraced goods which the Government had contracted for, and that part of the claim which referred particularly to military damage. The committee proposed to strike out of the bill that part which referred to military damage, and the Senate refused to concur and would not adopt the amendment, thus keeping the claim for military damage in the bill. The bill has not been finally acted upon, and is still before the Senate, and no further judgment has been passed upon it; but the Senate did say they would not except the military damage from the rest of the case; and so far as the action of the Senate went, it was in favor of allowing for the military damage.

Mr. BROWN. I did not so understand the decision of the Senate.

Mr. CARLILE. I have but a remark to make. I do not think the passage of this bill can establish a precedent by which the large amount of money referred to by the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Pennsylvania will be drawn from the Treasury. It will be remembered that this is not an ordinary case of damage resulting from the occupation of a country by the Army.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will allow me, as we are taking up the time of the Senate with this claim, I suggest to him, unless it is very necessary that he should debate it, to allow it to come to a vote.

Mr. CARLILE. I have no objection, and did not intend to discuss it further except to corroborate the statement of the chairman of the Committee on Claims that if this bill is postponed, I am satisfied the party whom it is designed to benefit, and who has this just claim on this Government, will not live to another Congress to receive justice.

Mr. HENDERSON. Before the vote is taken I wish to say one word. I will vote for no specific claim for damages until the loyal citizens of my State are provided for. We attempted at the last session to get a bill through for the purpose of adjudicating claims of this sort, but we could not succeed in doing it. I will pay the claim of no man until a general bill is passed. Why, sir, there are numbers of loyal men in Missouri who have had property destroyed and quartermasters' stores owing to the evacuation of certain towns in that State, but we can get no damages. Individuals have had their houses burned because they were in the way of the defense of a town. Numerous instances of that sort occurred in the town of Lexington, the town of Glasgow, and many other places. Such instances occurred last fall; and yet we can get no damages. We cannot get one dollar from the Treasury of the United States to pay the troops that were called out in the State of Missouri, and we were compelled to pay them ourselves. I will vote for no bill of this character.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to postpone all prior orders and take up the Indian appropriation bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. POWELL. I hope that motion will not be agreed to. Let us have until twelve o'clock to dispose of the morning business. I have a little bill that I have been trying to get up for some time. I hope the appropriation bill will be allowed to lie over for the present.

Several SENATORS. Vote! vote!

Mr. WILSON. I am ready to come to a vote if a vote is to be had; but we have reports to make and business concerning the nation to transact, and I want time to do it, and I do not think the time should be taken up with this private bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. Is it in order to move to amend the motion of the Senator from Iowa so as to postpone this bill and take up the post route bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not.

Mr. HARLAN. It seems to be the pleasure of Senators here to proceed with the morning business; and therefore, with the consent of the Senate, I will withdraw my motion to postpone, and now move to lay this subject on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the motion to postpone may be withdrawn, the yeas and nays having been ordered upon it. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CLARK. On the last motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 16, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Cowan, Doolittle, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Morgan, Nesmith, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Wilson, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Carlile, Clark, Conness, Davis, Dixon, Farwell, Foot, Foster, Harris, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, McDougall, Morrill, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, and Wiley—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Collamer, Grimes, Harding, Lane of Kansas, Richardson, Saulsbury, and Wilkinson—7.

So the Senate refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. It is to strike out all after the word "that," where it first occurs, and to insert the following:

For special service rendered to the United States by Josiah O. Ames, there be paid to him, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $9,500.

Mr. CLARK. I hope that amendment will not be agreed to. It appropriates the same sum for a different reason; and we may as well stand upon the truth and the fact that we destroyed this man's property, and ought to pay him for it. He did render service to the Government; but the claim is based upon the property which our officers ordered to be destroyed. We have paid for property taken in districts which have been in rebellion time and again.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I voted to lay this bill on the table, for I feel a very decided apprehension that if we enter upon the policy of paying for property destroyed in the course of this war, even if destroyed by the express order of our commanders, we shall involve ourselves in the greatest difficulty. In the first place, I do not think that Congress is a competent tribunal to hear the evidence in these cases and to pass upon these claims; and if Congress should undertake to enter upon them, and they should be in session every day for the three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, they could not perform the physical labor that would be necessary to examine all the claims that would be presented, and decide them justly.

But, sir, there is this other question which presses upon me. Even if this claim is a just claim against the Government of the United States, to be assumed and paid, another question arises, the question of our ability to pay in our existing circumstances.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator allow me to ask him, with the utmost kindness, to allow us to vote? I desire that we may pass upon this claim, but I do not wish to take up time.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I never speak against time, but I must say that I have serious apprehensions of the result that will follow from the passage of this bill. I will conclude all that I have to say, and all I desire to say upon it, by saying that I look upon war, like pestilence, and famine, and earthquake, and the lightning, that destroy men and destroy their property, as the act of God; it is not within the control of man himself, and the Government cannot be responsible for all the damages which will result from these great calamities that come upon a people.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope this bill will not pass the Senate. If it does I shall look upon it as one of the most dangerous precedents that was ever set by the Senate of the United States. We are to-day throwing our bonds upon the market by hundreds and almost thousands of millions of dollars. A doubt has been raised, not only in the moneyed circles of this country, but throughout the world, whether this nation will ever pay its liabilities. Let that doubt once be settled and you will see gold fall from 200 to 110 in ten days. Let the moneyed centers of Europe become satisfied that our bonds are good, and you will see a hundred millions of gold coming with the speed of steam and the wind across the Atlantic to be invested in the best paying security on earth. But if you pass this bill, if you set this precedent, if you say to every rebel and every loyal man and every man throughout the South by the passage of this bill, that you intend to pay for every dollar of property that has been destroyed by order of our generals, you will give a more fatal blow to the credit of your Government than by any other act that you can perform in this body during this session. I should look upon the passage of this bill as a national calamity, and one which we cannot afford at this time to bring upon our heads. It will do more to shake the faith of your own citizens and of the moneyed centers of the world in the credit of your securities than any other act you could perform.

I hope, therefore, that this bill will not pass. I hope that no such dangerous precedent will be set. If it is deemed best by the Senate to make a gratuity to this individual for patriotic services, in God's name let it be made; but set no such dangerous precedent as this, which will stare us in the face for one hundred years to come. We will not hear the last of this precedent during the life of any member of this body. It will stare us in the face, and not only us but our children and our children's children, day after day, week after week, month after month, and year after year. Others believe that we are in justice and in law bound to pay for the destruction of any property within the enemy's lines. If we do pay it let it be done as a gratuity, and not as a just claim against the Government, until the question has been settled whether it be or be not a claim against the Government. I hope the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be adopted, and then that the bill will be defeated even after that. I call for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POWELL. I desire to set a precedent, such as the Senator from Michigan thinks ought not to obtain here. There can be no doubt but that the claim presented by the chairman of the Committee on Claims is a just and equitable claim against this Government. I want no precedent set here of the Government repudiating or failing to pay an honest and just claim. There is no principle better settled than that property of a loyal citizen destroyed by our Army should be paid for. This case is clearly made out, and it is proven that the claimant is a loyal man and has rendered efficient service to the Union cause, and that this property was destroyed by one of our commanders in the field. There is no principle of law better settled than that cases of that class, where Government officers destroy property as a military necessity, are paid by the Government.

I cannot concur with my friend from Missouri who said a moment ago that he would vote for no private claim until justice was done to the loyal men in Missouri. I well remember the zeal and ability with which that Senator cooperated with us here to have a law passed for the purpose of providing for the payment of such claims in the border States. I drew up at very great labor a bill which I thought covered the whole case.

Mr. HENDERSON. I supported it.

Mr. POWELL. The Senator from Missouri says he supported it. That is true; and I supported propositions brought forward by him. I sent that bill to the Committee on the Judiciary and they reported against the whole of it except two sections giving us some little relief, and it was passed in that shape. I very much regretted then that we could not get a general law. But, sir, I cannot vote against an honest and just and lawful claim when it is presented here because Congress, in my judgment, is derelict to its duty, or fails to perform its duty in passing a general law. I will vote for this case; and I think the precedent that would be set by the Government failing to pay a just debt properly made out would be much more detrimental and injurious to the credit of the Government than its payment.

Mr. NESMITH. I move to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio by striking out "$9,500" and inserting "$1,000."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have steadily voted against all these claims which have been presented; and I have done so often, I confess, with very great regret. My sympathies are with this individual. I have heard something of his case. I think it is a very hard one. But it has seemed to me that while the war was pending it was improper to take up the cases of individual citizens in the rebel districts, and pay for their property which has been lost or destroyed by the casualties of the war; that we must first subdue the rebellion; ascertain whether we are to hold this country; whether this Union is to be restored. We are in a struggle now with an enemy seeking to overthrow the Government and dismember the Union. The strife is not yet over. Hundreds of thousands of our men are in the field. They have been unpaid for months. We are struggling in every way to raise the means to pay the soldiers who are fighting our battles and to determine the question whether our Government is to be preserved. While this struggle is upon us, while these patriotic soldiers are suffering for their pay, while their families are suffering, we propose to go into an investigation of the damage that has been done to persons in these rebel districts, and to commence that investigation by a committee of our own body! A Committee on Claims of the Congress of the United States is sitting down to investigate the thousands and hundreds of thousands of claims that may be presented here from all the States whither our armies have marched!

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will allow me to say that the Committee on Claims consider nothing except what the Senate order them to consider.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am aware that in one sense that is true; but the right of petition extends to every person; and the only order the Senate ever makes for the Committee on Claims to consider these matters is this: when a petition comes in here it is presented, and as a matter of course, without any vote of the Senate, either for or against it, it is referred to the Committee on Claims, and it becomes their duty, in pursuance of the order of the Senate referring it, to examine it.

Mr. CLARK. This was a bill from the other House, referred to us for the very purpose of considering it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well; it makes no difference in which House it is presented. It came there under the form of a petition, I presume. These claims usually come in the form of petitions. I care not in which House it was presented, nor is it material at all to the just disposition of the question now pending before us. It seems to me we must first subdue the rebellion before attempting to consider these cases. That we will hereafter have to pay in some particular cases, I doubt not; but, sir, when the time does come that we have to investigate the claims of these loyal persons in the rebel districts who have suffered in consequence of the acts of our own armies, we must have some better tribunal to make that examination than a committee of Congress with the hurry that we all know is upon them; we must have some tribunal that counter testimony can be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY.) The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call for the special order, the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. CLARK. With the permission of the Senate, I will not attempt to antagonize this claim with public business; but I hope before the session closes the Senate will give me an opportunity of taking it up and passing it.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WILSON. I move to pass over temporarily the order of the day that comes up at this hour with a view to take up the House joint resolution defining the meaning of the law in regard to officers' servants. I desire to propose an amendment to it, upon which I think we can act in a very short time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope we shall proceed with the tax bill, which I suppose can be passed in that very short time.

Mr. WILSON. I have no idea that we can pass the tax bill in a short time this morning. I sat here last night until one o'clock endeavoring to dispose of it. I think we can pass the joint resolution which I desire to take up in twenty minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts move to postpone the special order, or to pass it over informally?

Mr. SHERMAN. I call for the regular order of business unless it is postponed by vote of the Senate. The easiest and quickest way to get along is to dispose of that.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to have this resolution taken up with a view of offering an amendment to it which contains some provisions that are important to be acted upon in the House of Representatives, in regard to clothing our soldiers and other matters. I think it can be acted upon in twenty minutes; and if the Senator will allow the tax bill to be passed over informally for twenty or twenty-five minutes and this resolution cannot be disposed of in that time, I will let it go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] has a bill just as important which he wishes to take up. I think we shall expedite business by getting on regularly. I think we can pass the tax bill in a very short time.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to make a single remark to the honorable Senator from New Hampshire. He said a few moments ago that he thought the public business should be considered in preference to private bills. I think so too; but after I had stated that I desired to take up the post road bill, which is a matter of public business, he got a regular vote of this Senate to prefer a private claim. That is all I have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864, is now before the Senate.

Mr. COWAN. With the leave of the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance, I desire to call up the report of the committee of conference upon the Army appropriation bill, in order that it may be disposed of.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a matter of privilege.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending 30th of June, 1866, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the bill (H. R. No. 683) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending 30th of June, 1866, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the second and third amendments of the Senate.

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the sixth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

That the House of the Senate, and agree to the same with amendments as follows: in line three of said amendment strike out the words "any railroad" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the Illinois Central railroad;" and strike out all of said amendment after the word "States" in line five; and that the Senate agree to the same as so modified.

EDGAR COWAN,
HENRY WILSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
THADDEUS STEVENS,
E. B. WASHBURN,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I feel it my duty to object to the adoption of this report of the committee of conference; not that I desire to defeat the Army appropriation bill, nor do I suppose that that will be the result if we should refuse to agree to this report. Another committee would be appointed, and I trust would arrive at a just conclusion. If I can get the attention of the Senate for a very few minutes I think I can satisfy them that this is one of the most unjust propositions ever submitted to the American Senate; and that, if it should be adopted, the effect would be to discredit the public securities more than any act ever passed by Congress.

It will be remembered by the Senate that a few days ago a discussion took place upon a proposition which came to us in connection with the Army bill, that no part of the money appropriated by the bill should be used for the payment of the transportation of the property or troops of the United States. That proviso read in this way:

Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be used for the purpose of paying any railroad company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States, where such company may have accepted a grant of land from Congress upon condition of furnishing said transportation free of toll or other charge, except in such cases as have been modified by act of Congress.

In the discussion of that proposition it was a matter of some disagreement in the Senate as to what the meaning of the act of Congress making these donations of land was. Some insisted that by the terms of the act these railroad companies undertook to furnish the machinery and rolling stock and the men to transport the property and troops of the United States without any charge whatever. Others, and that was my opinion, insisted that the law which declares that these roads shall be a public highway for the use of the United States simply made them highways for the use of the Government in the same way that turnpike roads and canals were made highways for the use of the Government, which the Government might use without paying anything for the use of the road. This was the construction which had been put upon these acts by the Government. The Government, it seems, had agreed with all these land-grant railroad companies to pay them two thirds of the amount which it paid to other railroad companies; that is, sixty-six and two thirds per cent. Those who insisted that the companies were bound to transport, under the law, free of expense, conceded that when these land grants were made it could not have been in the contemplation of Congress or anybody else that such a state of things should exist as we now see in the country; and that, at any rate, it was no more than equitable or just to these companies to make the arrangement with them by which they were to receive one third less than other railroad companies; and the Senate by a vote of, I think, some five to one rejected this proviso.

The bill went to a committee of conference. Notwithstanding this decided vote of the Senate, what does our committee of conference do? With a vote, if I remember aright, of five to one against this provision, the committee of conference go out and agree to the provision in the most objectionable shape you can imagine. What do you suppose they do? They strike out of the proviso all roads but one; and they say that all the land-grant railroads shall be paid excepting one; and as to that one no money appropriated by this act shall be used for the purpose of paying for the transportation of troops. Upon what principle can you make such an invidious distinction as this? The language of the acts of Congress which granted these lands to the railroad companies is precisely the same. I inquired of one of the committee of conference why they disregarded the vote of the Senate and agreed to such a proposition as this, why they made this invidious distinction, upon what principle, and I suppose he will answer to the Senate what I may be permitted here to say was his answer to me, that this company was rich and the others were poor, this company can afford it, and the others cannot. Suppose that is so, does this great Government deal thus with parties? If a man by his thrift, his enterprise, and his industry, has husbanded his resources, is that a reason for punishing him? If a railroad company has managed its affairs well and prosperously, is that a reason for exacting the pound of flesh from it, while a company that has not managed its affairs so well is not to have meted out to it the same even-handed justice?

I ask Senators, what is the obligation which these companies incurred when they accepted the land grant? I stated the other day that when the Government of the United States gave these lands to these companies they doubled the price of the land which they did not donate. The particular company which is excepted by this bill, and to which nothing is to be paid for transporting the troops and property of the United States, is the Illinois Central Railroad Company. That is the principal company in my State. What was the donation of land to that company? The Government of the United States donated to the State of Illinois every alternate section of land along the line of the proposed road, doubling the price of the other alternate section which it held. These lands had been in the market for years, some of them for a quarter of a century, and no purchaser had been found at $1 25 an acre. The Government gave half of them to the State of Illinois to build this road, and doubled the price of the other half. The other half which the Government held, in consequence of the building of this road has been sold at $2 50, and there has been paid into your Treasury just as much money, and at a much earlier day than you would have received it but for this grant. Then where is this great donation? The Government of the United States has been benefited by the early sale of its lands. The people of Illinois and the whole country have been benefited by the construction of this road, which has cost, let me say, as I understand, $30,000,000.

Again, sir, what was this land worth? There were about three million acres given to the railroad company, which was held at $1 25 an acre, so that it was worth between three and four million dollars; and yet the rolling stock upon the Illinois Central railroad cost, I understand, between eleven and twelve million dollars; and you propose to take it and use the whole of it without paying for it. In addition to receiving double price for your lands, I am informed that this company has transported the property of the Government of the United States since this war began to an extent which if paid for as other railroads are paid, would amount to $500,000 more than they have received. Suppose you have got the power; suppose the construction of this law be as Senators contend, and you have the power, are you going to grind to the earth a company in this way? Can any company exist and do this?

I wish to say in this connection that I have not, and never did have, any connection with this Illinois Central Railroad Company. I scarcely know one of its officers. I do not think I know by sight three of the officers connected with the road. I oppose this proposition not from any sympathy that I have with the Illinois Central Railroad Company more than with any other railroad company; but I wish to do justice to that company as well as to all other companies.

Now, sir, there can be no sort of foundation for this discrimination. I wish the Senate to notice how this proviso will read as the committee of conference have agreed to it. I will read it; and I hope Senators will pay attention to it:

Provided, That no money appropriated by this act shall be used for the purpose of paying the Illinois Central Railroad Company for the transportation of property or troops of the United States.

That is the whole of it. No reason is given. It is simply a proviso put upon an appropriation bill, for the purpose of forcing it through Congress, it would seem, providing that no money shall be paid to the Illinois Central Railroad Company for the transportation of the troops or property of the United States. Why not? You do not say here that it is a land-grant company; you have stricken all that out; and the proviso now reads that a certain railroad company in the United States shall have no pay whatever for transporting the property of the United States. That is the report of the committee of conference. Is it possible that the Senate, understanding this, can do such an act?

What will be the effect upon your other securities? I said that I was informed that $30,000,000 had been invested in this enterprise. What will be the value of its stock when you legislate in this way? What will be the value of the stock of the other land-grant roads? What do you say by this bill? You say to every one of the land-grant companies—and I ask my friends from the new States to observe this—"The moment your road is completed, and you are able to bear it, you shall not have a dollar from the Government of the United States for all this work." How many bonds do you think you can sell with such a provision as that adopted as the legislation of Congress? I should like to know how many bonds you expect to sell going to the world with such a provision as that.

I am astonished that this report should be brought in here. In the first place, this provision has no business on an appropriation bill; it does not belong to it. If you want to legislate on this subject do it on a separate bill, and not on an appropriation bill in this way. Here is an unjust discrimination, an invidious distinction, put as a proviso to an appropriation bill, that a certain railroad company shall not be paid for doing the work of the Government.

But it is said this company is wealthy. I think it is immaterial whether it is or not; but let me ask my friend from Pennsylvania who made this report, how does he know that this company is rich? I suppose he has seen some report that the Illinois Central Railroad Company has made of the extent of its business and its receipts. If he would consult the Senator from New York, [Mr. MORGAN,] he would tell him that it would be dangerous to invest in a railroad company on a report made and casually examined. It would take an expert weeks to look into all the machinery of these railroad companies. The dividends this company has declared do not show it to be so very rich. It never declared a dollar of dividend, I understand, until within the last two or three years. The value of its stock, I think, is about 112, or somewhere along there; I do not know the precise sum.

Mr. HOWE. One hundred and eighteen.

Mr. TRUMBULL. My friend from Wisconsin says 118; but that is in the currency of the country, of course. It has never paid any dividends, I understand, until within two or three years, and the average dividends during that time have not been more than six per cent.; and I apprehend those dividends, like the dividends of most railroad companies, have been just as much as the ability of the company would enable them to make for the purpose of keeping up the stock and the credit of the company.

If you pass this bill, with this provision in it, you will stop this great work. An officer of the company informs me—I am not posted in regard to these statistics—that the Illinois Central Railroad Company cannot do this work for the Government for nothing. It is the great road leading north and south over which your supplies go. The army of the Southwest receives a great portion of its supplies over the Illinois Central railroad; and I understand that the whole rolling stock of that road for weeks at a time has been used by the Government for the purpose of transporting supplies to the Army. Chicago is the great grain-purchasing market. The oats and corn and forage for that army go over this road.

As I said before, it makes no difference whether the road is rich or poor. The Government of the United States can legislate upon no such principle, and make an invidious distinction against a company because it is prosperous or because it is not prosperous. It cannot stand upon such a position; and let me say to my friends of the Committee on Finance that such legislation as this will do more to strike down the credit of your Government than all the tax bills you can pass during the remaining days of the session will do to support it. I trust, sir, that the Senate will refuse to concur in this report, and that we shall have another committee of conference to carry out the views of the Senate as heretofore expressed.

Mr. COWAN. In the first place, Mr. President, it is proper to consider what my honorable friend from Illinois in his very able and elaborate argument constantly keeps out of sight; and that is, that by the terms of the creation of this corporation it bound itself by the contract to do this work for the General Government. Let that be remembered. This is not a matter of grace or a matter of favor, but it is a matter of right upon which the Government of the United States stands in its dealings with this corporation in Illinois. To give any other construction to that contract than the one given by the Senate the other day, as I understood most of those who addressed themselves to that question, is not to make the contract avail, but to destroy it. If it be a contract at all, and if it have any meaning, then this road bound itself when the emergency arose, the contingency happened, that it would carry the troops and munitions of war of the United States free of charge. Why should not the United States insist upon it? Is there any reason which can be given? There is no reason unless it is that the company is unable to comply with the terms of its contract. As I understand, there are several land-grant roads in the same situation, and they came forward and said, "It is true we are bound by the obligation of this contract; but at present, in the imperfect condition of our roads, we are not able to comply with it;" and therefore the Government advanced to them a certain sum. The Illinois Central railroad came in in precisely that way, and they are now receiving from the Government, not full pay for carrying the troops and munitions of war of the United States, but they are receiving four ninths of the whole amount paid to other roads. For instance, all the railroads joined together and agreed to carry for the Government for two thirds of the ordinary fare, in consideration of the quantity, and in consideration of the whole cargoes required to be transported by the Government. Then the land-grant railroads came forward, and they said they would be satisfied with two thirds of that amount, which would be four ninths, and that with that they could keep themselves in running order.

The Illinois Central railroad at the present time is capable of performing its contract beyond any doubt or question. Why? Because its receipts are shown to be this last year something over seven million dollars, and the amount of fare and freight that it received from the United States is not half a million dollars, and therefore that which it receives from the United States is not one fourteenth of the whole. Does anybody believe that by taking away that one fourteenth it will stop, that it will transfer its road to the Government of the United States, and allow the Government to work it? Nobody can possibly believe it.

It is said this is discriminating against the rich. Is not that exactly what every creditor does? If half a dozen men are indebted to A, one of whom is able to pay at any time, he enforces his claim against him. What right has he to say, "You should make all those people pay?" It does not lie in his mouth to say that. It is enough for the creditor to say, "I choose to enforce my contract against you, and when it suits my pleasure I shall enforce it against the others; and if I do not it is none of your business."

The United States have given to this road (and it is all the capital, I believe, that ever was invested in it) some two or three million acres of land. It did not sell the land; but it went into the money market and hypothecated its lands and procured money upon which to start the road and build a portion of it, and then began to sell its lands. It has already sold over seventeen million dollars' worth of those lands, and it has over thirty million dollars' worth still in the market, not desiring to sell, and not desiring even now to sell its mortgages. It is in such a good condition that it does not want to take legal-tender currency for mortgages, because that currency has depreciated fifty cents on the dollar. It would rather extend the time of those mortgages for ten years than allow the mortgagors to pay in the present currency, and from a very prudent reason: it advanced the money, and it expects to realize on its lands; and it does not declare very large dividends for the same reason. The dividend goes to pay for the construction account. It expects to realize eventually in the sale of the lands.

The next question to be asked is, where is this corporation? I understand there is not half a dozen citizens of Illinois who have the smallest interest in it; that perhaps there are not twenty American citizens that have the smallest interest in it. This stock is owned almost entirely abroad, almost every dollar of it. Why, then, should it not keep its contracts with this Government when it is able to keep them?

But it is said we receive our information as to its resources from its reports. Suppose that to be true. It cannot come upon this floor and allege the falsehood of those reports, and their inflated nature, for the purpose of urging us to discredit them. They are good as against itself at least.

Then, Mr. President, the question comes back to this: here is a road which has contracted to carry our troops and our munitions of war free of charge. It is able to do so without injury to itself. Shall we in this crisis insist upon its performing its contract? That is the whole of it. Have we four hundred and fifty or five hundred thousand dollars annually to give away to this corporation, (even supposing we made it account afterward,) almost entirely foreign in its nature, with its enormous wealth and its enormous capital; or shall we simply stand upon the ordinary equal footing of justice which exists between man and man, and say to them "Do that which you have contracted to do?"

As to the other and feebler roads we may need them hereafter; and if we should need to use them in some future war, when they are built, when they are in running order, when they have $12,000,000 of rolling stock upon their roads, I should not wonder if we should enforce our contracts against them.

But it is said we will ruin the sale of the stock in the market in New York, and thereby ruin, I suppose, the sale of five-twenties or seven-thirties. I really do not see any connection between the two. If by withdrawing four or five hundred thousand dollars from this company we reduce its stock,

(and we shall not reduce it one per cent. by this means,) how that will affect the credit of the Federal Government I do not know; but I do know that if we save $500,000 by this operation, if we show to capitalists that we are determined to make people stand upon their contracts in this wise, we will raise our credit just so much. Instead of injuring the Federal credit, we will improve it. I do not know of anything that would be so well calculated to destroy the credit of this Government as to pay people for doing that which they had contracted to do for nothing or for a former consideration.

But it is said this railroad has enhanced the value of these lands. Mr. President, that is an old railroad dodge. No railroad enhances the value of the lands. It is the progressive march of civilization that enhances their value, and the railroad is merely a part of that. If the pioneer did not precede the railroad, if the farmer did not precede it, if trade and travel did not precede it, the railroad would be worth nothing; and the railroad only comes upon the heels of those who carry the flag of civilization, and are its advance guards. But suppose it did; if it has enhanced the value of our lands, we paid for it; and we paid them exactly what they asked. It was their bargain; and if we made a good bargain, so far as the lands are concerned, they cannot complain, because they now hold lands they have in reserve at twenty dollars an acre—fifteen dollars for the lowest and twenty dollars for the highest. I do not see, therefore, that there is any reason in the world why we should not now at this time say to this Illinois Central railroad, as the giant of these land-grant corporations, as the one with Atlantean shoulders broad enough to bear the burden, "You must bear it."

Not a reason can be given why this contract should not be enforced, but there are thousands why it should. When there is machinery at work all over the nation wringing out of the rich and poor money in every conceivable form and shape, I should like to know why this gigantic corporation, that paid the other day to the State of Illinois taxes upon seven millions of receipts, should not perform its contracts. The Senator from Illinois says it is invidious. I suppose it will soon become invidious in this country, and particularly in Congress, for the Government of the United States to insist upon the performance of contracts as against anybody. We make a bargain, and then we must release it and forego all the advantages of it; and we must do that in a crisis of the country's history which is unparalleled, and which I hope may never be paralleled.

I trust, therefore, that the Senate will concur in this report. This was the only difficulty there was between the two Houses. If the report is concurred in I do not think there will be the least danger of having the smallest difficulty with the Illinois Central railroad on that behalf. If they can get rid of this burden of course they have a right to do it, and they have a right to have arguments made on this floor to show us why we should do it; but if we can enforce our contract it is our duty to do it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The honorable member from Pennsylvania seems to have been very clear—

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest, in order to save time, whether this report had not better be sent to another committee of conference, as the speediest way of getting at it. This controversy will lead to a debate for hours, and we shall make no progress.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. SHERMAN. As there is a disagreement about it, I trust it will be sent to another committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, let us have a vote directly on that question.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I hope the vote will be taken, and I trust we will vote it down, and appoint another committee.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I trust we may, for to adopt this proposition would be an outrage and act of legislative tyranny.

Mr. COWAN. I call for the yeas and nays on concurring in the report.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. POWELL. I do not think the report of this committee of conference ought to be adopted by the Senate. It strikes me the arrangement made by the Secretary of War with the railways that received land grants is just and equitable. I do not believe the condition under which the railroads accepted the land grants was ever intended to apply in times like these. If it were strictly executed upon these roads it would ruin every railroad that has accepted a land grant. Hence I am willing and desire to continue the arrangement made by the Secretary of War with these corporations. That seems to be the general proposition entertained by the committee of conference, because they do not interrupt that arrangement with any of the roads except one. The roads that have received land grants are very numerous. Nearly all the northern and northwestern roads have had more or less land grants. The committee have singled out the Illinois Central railroad and proposed to make them carry the immense transportation of the Government for nothing, and not allow them to receive any pay, while they allow all the other land-grant railroads in the country to receive compensation upon the basis of the agreement made by the Secretary of War with them. This kind of legislation is certainly wrong. We insulate the Illinois Central road simply because its affairs have been managed skillfully and properly, and because the corporation has more wealth than other roads. Had it been managed badly perhaps it would have had no wealth by this time. I think we should give them a premium for their management rather than otherwise. I think the proposition is very unjust, and should not be adopted by the Senate. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will vote down this report and ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. MORRILL. I feel pretty liberal this morning, having been essentially whipped last night, and I suppose I feel the better for it. [Laughter.] I rise particularly to congratulate my friend from Illinois upon the appreciation which he seems to have this morning of the impropriety of general legislation on a particular subject. I thought so last night; but he seemed to feel quite otherwise. He voted as coolly and as deliberately to place upon a specific measure of finance a matter of general legislation as if it never was likely to be commended to his lips. I thought it was wrong then, and I think so now. Therefore I am quite willing, and think I shall vote, to send this back to a committee of conference. But I rose simply to congratulate my friend that he has at last got an illustration which makes him sensible of the propriety of keeping this kind of legislation from these bills.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, if I know myself I have never voted for a measure because it was in my State, or against it because it was out of my State; and the Illinois Central railroad is no more to me than the fishing bounties. It has never been a favorite with me. I have had no connection with it; and for fear somebody should make such a speech as the Senator from Maine has made I took occasion to say that I do not know by sight three men belonging to that company, though I have lived in the State of Illinois before it was started and ever since. I have no feeling about it as an Illinois measure at all, if I know myself; but I think this is an unjust proposition.

Mr. MORRILL. It was far from any purpose of mine to ascribe anything of the sort to the Senator; and I am sure nothing of that sort can be inferred from what I said; but I do know this: that interests over which we feel a particular care are more likely to give us a particular solicitude than those which are remote; and the difference between this subject and the one we had under consideration last night is not so great as that the interest the honorable Senator takes in it could be accounted for on any other principle. If I understand it, we can afford to be a little liberal on this occasion. We saved $400,000 last night, and the Senator from Pennsylvania says that this will not cost us more than $400,000; and so we make a clean thing of it if we release this Illinois Central road from its contract; for that is the question. We release it from this contract, and therefore give it $400,000, and we make a clean thing of it, because we have taken that amount from a national policy. If that is the judgment of the Senate, I do not stand here to complain; and I am inclined to think, as the Senator from Illinois is so anxious on this subject, I shall vote to have the matter recommitteed to the committee, with a view of seeing whether there is any reason in that direction.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Collamer, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Grimes, Nesmith, Sherman, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Wade, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Carlile, Clark, Conness, Davis, Farwell, Foot, Hale, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howe, Johnson, Lane of Indiana, Lane of Kansas, McDougall, Morgan, Nye, Pomeroy, Powell, Ramsey, Riddle, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wilkinson, Willey, and Wright—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Buckalew, Chandler, Harding, Harlan, Howard, Morrill, Richardson, and Saulsbury—8.

So the report of the committee of conference was non-concurred in.

On motion by Mr. TRUMBULL, it was

Resolved, That the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the said bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and upon its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the sixth amendment of the Senate thereto; and that it ask a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President; and

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Messrs. TRUMBULL, FARWELL, and POWELL.

CONDITION OF THE INDIAN TRIBES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. No. 89) directing inquiry into the condition of the Indian tribes, and their treatment by the civil and military authorities, reported a recommendation that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said resolution, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said resolution; and

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, it was

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said resolution, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President; and

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. DOOLITTLE, Mr. HARLAN, and Mr. BROWN.

CREDENTIALS.

Mr. POWELL presented the credentials of Hon. JAMES GUTHRIE, chosen a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March, 1865; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have received and been requested to file with the Secretary of the Senate a certificate, under the seal of the State of Louisiana, of the election of Michael Hahn as a Senator of the United States, from the State of Louisiana, for six years from the 4th of March next. It seems to be a certificate of the proceedings of the election, and as it is somewhat lengthy, perhaps it is not necessary to read it. I move that it be laid on the table and filed.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the reception of that paper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from Kentucky objects to the reception of the paper. It is necessary, then, to take the sense of the Senate upon the question.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am willing to take the sense of the Senate as to whether it shall be received and put on file.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object to its being interposed here where it may create division and involve debate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We can vote without debate. If there is any debate I will not press it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senator from Kentucky can have no objection to its lying on the table for consideration at the next session.

Mr. DAVIS. I have no objection to its lying on the table; but I object to the Senate receiving the paper.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is all there is of it. It is only asked that it be laid on the table. It is liable to be called up at some future time.

Mr. DAVIS. I object to the Senate receiving that paper for any purpose whatever.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move that the motion be laid on the table, and that carries with it the whole of the papers and all the other motions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois moves to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to receive the paper just presented.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 178) to authorize the continuation of the joint Committee on Commerce of the Senate and House of Representatives after the 4th day of March, 1865, to complete their investigations and make their report on the subject of trade with the rebellious States, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PORTAGE LAKE SHIP-CANAL.

The bill (H. R. No. 745) granting land to the State of Michigan to aid in building a harbor and ship-canal at Portage lake, Keweenaw Point, on Lake Superior, was read twice by its title.

Mr. HOWARD. I really hope that bill will not be referred. I wish the Senate would grant me the favor to take it up now and pass it. It is a matter which is to cost the Government nothing whatever, and will be a great accommodation to the people of my State.

Mr. SHERMAN. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, it cannot be considered.

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the Senator from Ohio will withdraw his objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I make a standing objection. I insist on the order of business, and I have the right to do it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to make an appeal to the Senator from Ohio. This bill occupies a peculiar position—

Mr. SHERMAN. I object, and state my objection, and after that there is no debate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the bill being objected to, it is not debatable.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I merely wish to state that the Legislature of Michigan is about to adjourn, and if this bill is to pass at all it should pass at once. It provides for a very important work. The Senate committee are unanimous on the subject, and it ought to be passed before the Legislature of Michigan adjourns.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate is out of order. Objection being made, the bill cannot be considered.

Mr. HOWARD. I appeal to the Senator from Ohio to allow the bill to be considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have objected. There is no use of appealing to me. This tax bill must be passed as well as the Senator's bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This debate is entirely out of order. The special order is now before the Senate.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 744) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," approved June 30, 1864; the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. POWELL to the amendment of the Committee on Finance. The amendment of the Committee on Finance was to add the following as a new section:

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That, in lieu of the present rates of postage on letters, there shall be charged, from and after the 1st day of July next, for every single letter in manuscript, or paper of any kind in which information shall be asked for or communicated in writing, or by signs or marks, conveyed in the mails, five cents; and for a double or other multiple letter there shall be charged an increased rate according to the present rates, five cents being computed the unit instead of three cents.

Mr. POWELL proposed to amend the amendment by adding the following:

And that from and after the 1st day of June, 1865, all acts or parts of acts granting or allowing the franking privilege be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the amendment, and declared that the yeas appeared to have it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate probably is not aware of the question. The amendment of the committee is to increase the rate of postage from three to five cents. I wish to leave that matter substantially to the honorable Senator from Vermont, who is at the head of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I am satisfied that this increase is demanded by the exigencies of the public service. The Post Office Department will be in arrear from one to three million dollars next year, and perhaps a larger sum, if the jurisdiction of the Post Office Department should be extended over the rebel States. This measure was intended to cover that deficiency. If the honorable Senator from Vermont says that he thinks it would be unwise to make this legislation, we do not propose to press it; although I think the measure is demanded, and the Committee on Finance, with scarcely an exception—

Mr. CLARK. There was one certainly.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then with the exception of the Senator, reported this as an amendment, with a view to increase our revenue from the Post Office service.

Mr. POWELL. I think the best method to relieve the Post Office Department would be to repeal the franking privilege. I have no doubt that this Government loses, one way or another, at least three or four million dollars by the exercise of this franking privilege. It has been very much abused. I think if we should repeal the franking privilege and allow the cheap postage to continue it would be much better for the country; and hence I offered the amendment that I did; and if that had carried I would have offered another amendment giving the franking privilege to a limited extent, and so modified this section as to reduce the postage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CONNESS. Has that amendment been amended?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. CONNESS. I have but a word to say upon this amendment. I had great doubts in the committee as to its wisdom. The worst feature of it is, that it looks like taking a backward step; for when postage has been reduced it has always been regarded as a forward step; a step in the right direction; the encouragement of correspondence; the cheapening of it to that end. The worst feature of this amendment is that it proposes really to take a backward step. I would sooner endeavor to obtain the same amount of revenue from almost any other source; and if we retain the amendment we have already adopted taxing sales, I think we shall get a sufficient revenue without pressing this amendment.

Mr. CLARK. In addition to what the Senator from California has said, that this is a step in the backward direction, I do not believe that the present is a proper time to increase the postage. Senators should remember the vast number of people who are now in the Army and away from their homes, and the immense Army correspondence that is carried on. I suggest, therefore, whether we ought to double the postage at this time, and whether we had better not raise our two cents in some other way.

Mr. COLLAMER. As I have been appealed to on this subject, I desire to say a few words upon it. I have no settled opinions that I should wish the Senate to take upon this subject. In the first place, it is somewhat problematical whether you would raise very much more revenue by increasing the postage to five cents. The general notion has been that an increase of postage decreases the amount of correspondence, though not perhaps in precisely the same ratio. I have no doubt that increasing the postage from three to five cents would diminish the amount of correspondence somewhat; precisely how much I cannot say. The difficulty now is the condition of affairs in the country at this time. The condition of affairs in the country at this time in relation to our money is such that we cannot tell precisely how the people appreciate it. It is undoubtedly true that five cents is not any more now than the three-cent postage was when we laid it. It probably is not as much; but it certainly is not any more. It therefore is not, really and strictly speaking, an increase, only as it increases with the condition of the circulation. I am rather inclined to think that raising it to five cents would increase the revenue somewhat. I do not think it would diminish the amount of correspondence precisely in proportion to the amount which is laid upon the postage. I do not believe in the doctrine that the lower your postage the more you will receive. I do not think if you carry it down to two cents that you would get any more letters to make it up. It seems to me that that mode of reasoning has its limitations.
